Schedule 2

SPECIFIC FUNCTIONS OF THE ADVISORY COMMITTEE

The Attorney-General: I beg to move amendment No. 111, in page 86, line 40, at end insert—

'Persons with special needs

. In discharging its functions under this Schedule, the Advisory Committee shall have regard to the need for the efficient provision of legal services for persons who face special difficulties in making use of those services, including in particular special difficulties in expressing themselves or in understanding.'.

The effect of the amendment is to require the advisory committee to have regard to the needs of the disadvantaged, particularly the less articulate, when carrying out its functions under schedule 2. It has been tabled in response to amendments tabled in both another place and in Committee. I gave an undertaking that we would consider them with every sympathy. The amendment is the result that I am happy to bring forward.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 4

AUTHORISATION AND APPROVAL

Amendments made: No. 170, in page 90, line 22, leave out sub-paragraph (6).

No. 171, in page 92, line 46, leave out sub-paragraph (6).—[The Attorney-General.]

THE AUTHORISED CONVEYANCING PRACTITIONERS BOARD

Amendment made: No. 112, in page 96, line 7, leave out

'he has been adjudged bankrupt'

and insert

'a bankruptcy order has been made against him'. [The Attorney-General.]

Mr. Temple-Morris: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Amendment No. 5 is grouped with amendment No. 139. Amendment No. 5 was not moved but I had hoped to speak to amendment No. 139.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I made it quite clear that amendment No. 5 was an Opposition amendment. I paused and asked if it was to be moved. No one moved it and I cannot go back to it.

Mr. Vaz: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I think that you were referring to amendment No. 5, not to amendment No. 139.

Madam Deputy Speaker: No. The hon. Gentleman cannot get away with that. I made it quite clear what I was doing. Amendment No. 5 is an Opposition amendment. I asked if it was to be moved and no one did so. We have now moved on.

THE CONVEYANCING OMBUDSMAN SCHEME

The Attorney-General: I beg to move amendment No. 52, in page 99, line 43, after 'by' insert

',or inconvenience or distress has been caused to,'.

The amendment extends the grounds on which the conveyancing ombudsman will be able to make compensation orders to include inconvenience and distress as well as loss. In Committee, I expressed the hope that we would be able to meet the representations that were made and the amendment is the result.

Order for Third Reading read.

12.8 am

The Attorney-General: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I express my warm appreciation to all hon. Members, and in particular to the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris), the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser), the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), and all those from the Back Benches on both sides of the House who have contributed greatly to the success of the parliamentary handling of the Bill. The Bill takes an important place in the Government's strategy of encouraging competition and the widening of choice, particularly the widening of choice for those who are customers here for legal services. I believe that the parliamentary process has worked very well because of the assiduity of hon. Members. I hope that, in turn, they feel that the Government have listened and responded constructively in many instances, although not in as many as they would have wished, to suggestions to improve the Bill. I am grateful for all that has been done.

I realise that the Bill has occasioned a great deal of approval in the country, but also a certain amount of anxiety. Each of those reactions has been well founded. I believe that much of the anxiety has been dispelled. The Bill will take its place as a constructive measure.

12.10 am

Mr. John Morris: If I am forgiven anything in this House, I am sure that I shall be forgiven my brevity on this occasion. I endorse the Attorney-General's thanks to the Committee for its consideration. I thank the Law Officers and the Lord Chancellor for their courtesy and explanations at all times. I am especially grateful for the work done by Lord Mischcon and his team in the other place.

The improvement of the Bill was necessary because of the severe criticism levelled at it.We have not objected to extending rights of audience. I was anxious that the power should not be enshrined solely in the bosom of a political Minister, even though he be the Lord High Chancellor. Now that the judges have a new and important role, we are anxious that the aims of the Bill are carried out. I am confident that they will be. If there is any breakdown, we shall have to return to the matter later and consider it afresh, but I am sure that that will not be necessary.

One of the sad omissions from the Bill is that it has no enhancement for legal aid. The professions are concerned about profitability in that area. I fear that one day we shall have to return to that.

Mr. Temple-Morris: This is broadly a good Bill which will result in a more balanced profession. Perhaps all those who have been closely associated with the Bill would agree that it is as important for that which has been discussed but is not in the Bill as for that which is in the Bill following our discussions.

During its progress, the Bill has been improved in relation to consumer safeguards in conveyancing. However, the danger to the small solicitor—other than in Scotland where that has been overtly recognised—remains and must be monitored. We shall also have to monitor how the rights of audience work. There remains concern about the designated judges. Indeed, I had intended briefly to air that concern, had I spoken to the amendment which I did not succeed in moving a few moments ago.

I am sure that many people will carefully watch what happens with the new authorised conveyancers and the consumer interests relating to them. They should be no obstruction—I do not suggest that they will be—to solicitors' rights of audience in the higher courts.

I welcome the role of the ombudsman and hope that increasingly the administration of the courts will be considered by that gentleman.

I thank the Front-Bench spokesmen for both the Government and the Opposition for the spirit of courtesy that has prevailed during the passage of the Bill.

12.13 am

Mr. Alex Carlile: I thank the Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General for their courtesy and co-operation. I also thank their officials, to whom all members of the Committee had access during the Committee stage, which was extremely helpful.

I make no apology for saying that I still view the future of the legal profession with trepidation. It is essential for our constitutional safeguards and for the liberties of the citizen that there should be a strong and independent Bar in England and Wales. I hope that, through the process of consultation and reasonable argument, we have ensured that when the machinery set up by the Bill comes to consider the future of the profession it, too, will bear in mind the need for that strong, independent Bar as part of our legal establishment.

With that in mind, I wish the Bill a fair wind, although I suspect that we shall argue some of the issues time and time again.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed, with amendments.

PROCEDURE

Motion made,

That this House agrees with the recommendations contained in the First Report of the Select Committee on Procedure of this Session (House of Commons Paper No. 379).

Hon. Members: Object.

QUESTIONS TO MEMBERS, ETC.

Motion made

That with effect from the beginning of the next Session of Parliament Standing Order No. 17 (Questions to Members) and Standing Order No. 18 (Notices of Motions, amendments and questions) be repealed and the following Standing Orders be made—

Time for taking Questions

(1)—Questions shall be taken on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, after private business has been disposed of.

(2) No question shall be taken after half-past three o'clock, except questions which have not appeared on the paper but which are in Mr Speaker's opinion of an urgent character and relate either to matters of public importance or to the arrangement of business.

(3) Any questions tabled for written answer on a day on which the House does not sit by reason of the continuance of a previous sitting shall be deemed to be questions for written answer on the next sitting day and shall appear on the Order Paper for that day.

Notices of Questions, Motions and Amendments

(2) A notice of a question, or of an amendment to a motion standing on the Order Paper for which no day has been fixed or of the addition of a name in support of such a motion or amendment, which is given after half-past ten o'clock in the evening shall be treated for all purposes as if it were a notice handed in after the rising of the House.

(3) A Member shall indicate on the notice of any question whether it is for oral, written or priority written answer.

(4) Where a Member has indicated that a question is for priority written answer the Minister shall cause an answer to be given to the Member on the date for which notice has been given, provided that the requirement of notice shall be the same for such questions as that prescribed in this order for questions for oral answer.

(5) Notice of a question for oral answer may not be given on a day earlier than ten sitting days before the day for answer, provided that, where that earliest day would otherwise fall on a Friday, the earliest day on which such notice may be given will instead be the previous sitting day.

(6) Notice of any question for oral answer must appear at latest on the notice paper circulated two days (excluding Saturday and Sunday) before that on which an answer is desired.

(7) When it is proposed that the House shall adjourn for a period of less than four days, any day during that period (other than a Saturday or Sunday) shall be counted as a sitting day for the purpose of calculating the period in paragraph (5) of this order.

(8) When notice shall have been given of a Motion for the adjournment of the House for more than three days Mr. Speaker may cause to have printed and circulated with the Vote a memorandum superseding the provisions of paragraphs (5) and (6) of this order and instead setting out the earliest day on which notice of questions for oral answer may be given for each of the first ten sitting days after that adjournment, provided that each such day shall as far as practicable fall on the same day of the week as that on which the question is to be answered and shall not be fewer than fourteen days before the day for answer; and also setting out the latest day for notice of questions for oral answer on each of the first two sitting days following that adjournment provided that each such day shall not be fewer than two days (excluding Saturday and Sunday) before the day for answer.

Hon. Members: Object.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Motion made,

That Mr. Peter Lilley be discharged from the Committee of Public Accounts and Mr. Francis Maude be added to the Committee.

Hon. Members: Object.

Humberside (Boundary Commission Investigation)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Wood.]

12.14 am

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): It is a pleasure and a privilege to address the House on the day of the appointment to Government of my hon. Friends the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton), for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) and for Leeds, North-East (Mr. Kirkhope), all of whom I am delighted to see in their rightful places on the Treasury Bench. I wish them all a long and distinguished career, and I wish them well in their new, arduous and onerous responsibilities.

I remind the House that the reason for this debate was the excellent decision of my right hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley) who in 1989, as Secretary of State for the Environment, was so concerned about the strong feeling against the existence of Humberside county council that, exceptionally, he ordered the Local Government Boundary Commission for England to consider the case for that county's abolition.

My right hon. Friend was moved to take that decision because he had received about 7,000 representations from the people of the ill-loved county of Humberside expressing their opposition. He took the view that it was right and proper for the Boundary Commission to consider whether the people concerned should revert to residing in their rightful counties of Yorkshire and Lincolnshire.

The commission's interim report did not, sadly, accord with the wishes of my constituents. Just three weeks ago, on 5 July, my hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell) initiated an Adjournment debate on the same issue. He drew attention to the guidelines given to the Boundary Commission, whose interim review published on 7 March states in paragraph 47, on page 13, that there are three strands to any consideration of boundaries. As the commission approaches the task of drafting its final report, I take this opportunity to remind it of its terms of reference, and that the three strands that it is obliged to take into account are:

"whether the boundary accords with the wishes of the local inhabitants;

(ii) whether it reflects the pattern of community life; and

(iii) whether it is conducive to the effective operation of local government or any associated services."

On the first test, there is no doubt that the majority of my constituents—and, I suspect, those of Glanford and Scunthorpe and of Great Grimsby—wish to return to the county of Lincolnshire, as that most likely to reflect "the pattern of commmunity life".

Lincolnshire has a natural boundary in the form of the river Humber estuary. The old country of the east riding of Yorkshire was the other county which had the river Humber as a natural boundary. The residents of south Humberside look to Lincoln and to the county of Lincolnshire as the county with which they identify.

Our experience of living under the dreaded county of Humberside over the past 15 years with regard to whether it is "conducive to the effective operation of local government"

is that the county of Humberside fails that test. The community charge in the county of Humberside is about £100 higher than it is in the county of Lincolnshire. Lincolnshire can deliver its local government services—eduacation, social services, roads and all the ancillary services—at a cost to the charge payer that is £100 less than the charge in the county of Humberside. That test proves conclusively that Lincolnshire is the county which is most conducive to the effective operation of local government for my constituents.

I remind my hon. Friend the Minister, who was kind enough to reply to the debate three weeks ago that the hatred of my constituents for the county of Humberside is virtually total. The unhappiness about the concept of Humberside which persists among many of its residents 15 years after its creation shows that now is the time to urge the Local Government Boundary Commission for England to consider the strength of local feeling. I fully accept that it is probably unlikely that my hon. Friend the Minister can add much more to what he said three weeks ago, but I hope that he will assure me and my constituents today that he will draw the attention of the Boundary Commission to the strength of feeling that I am expressing on behalf of my constituents.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will draw to the commission's attention the fact that I was elected by the people and speak for them. My voice on their behalf must be considered when the commission produces its final report. This is the appropriate time to urge the Boundary Commission to accept the challenge thrown down by my right hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury. At this point in the sad history of the county of Humberside, people's confidence in the county has been sapped. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to pass on my views.

I am delighted to see that my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller), a Yorkshire Member, is present in the Chamber. He has told me that he would like to support my comments and I will now allow him to substantiate some of my points.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): I wish to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) on initiating this debate and I agree with everything that he has said.

As my hon. Friend pointed out, my hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell) initiated a debate on this subject on 5 July. He spoke in similar terms and argued for the abolition of Humberside, for the creation of a new county of East Yorkshire and for the return of South Humberside to Lincolnshire. The fact that we have had a second debate so soon after the first, shows the strength of feeling about this.

Both debates have been initiated by hon. Members representing constituencies south of the river Humber. Lest it be thought that the strength of feeling is greater in the areas that were formerly unashamedly in Lincolnshire, I remind the House that the Local Government Boundary Commission for England found that the strength of feeling —or outrage as I would describe it—about their incorporation in Humberside is even greater among those who live to the north of the estuary.

Although I represent a constituency in West Yorkshire which is quite a long way from Humberside, I speak as a native Yorkshireman and a member of the Yorkshire Society. I have no trouble in understanding why the changes that came about in 1974 have never been accepted. Those who drew purely artificial lines on the map to create this concoction cannot easily be forgiven.

Some think that the problem of assuaging traditional loyalties could be resolved either if Humberside changed its name, although it is difficult to think of an alternative, or if postal addresses were altered. That argument is similar to that put by those who argued for the new administrative counties at the time of the passage of the Local Government Act 1972. They claimed that there was no problem because people would still be able to retain their traditional counties. Most of those on the north side of the estuary still feel themselves to be Yorkshire people, but know that something significant has been taken from them by the creation and continuation of a new administrative county for which they feel no affection and little, if any, loyalty.

The Boundary Commission considered issues under the two heads of convenience of administration and traditional loyalties as well as patterns of community life. On the first, it concluded that a reversion to more traditional boundaries would be "no better able to provide effective and convenient local government than the present Humberside County Council."

At no point did the commission suggest that local government would be any worse. Not surprisingly, it found that there were too many imponderables to make a judgment as to whether there would be an improvement or a deterioration. The main issue, therefore, related to the transitional inconvenience of a further disruption in local government.

When it comes to the preferences of the people as a whole rather than those of people with a stake in the status quo, there is no doubt about how they feel. When asked for their opinion, 62 per cent. of all residents wanted a change from the present county. On the north bank, 64 per cent. stated a wish to see some sort of Yorkshire solution. Many, like me, felt that the answer could be the creation of a new East Yorkshire county, including Selby, although that issue has not exercised most people's minds at this stage. Curiously, a reason why the Boundary Commission seemed to come down against that option was that the present boundary between York and Selby is unsatisfactory. Surely, more urgent attention could be given to that matter if necessary, rather than leaving it until the Humberside issue has been resolved.

The Boundary Commission rather airily dismissed the deep feelings of people for Yorkshire and Lincolnshire, stating:

"Such loyalties should be able to co-exist with support for Humberside as an administrative unit."

Unfortunately, that statement is out of touch with reality. After many years, the survey carried out on behalf of the Boundary Commission shows that only just over a third of the people of Humberside would support the retention of the county. That being so, I find an element of perversity in the Commission's conclusion, especially bearing in mind the strong lead given by my right hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley), the former Secretary of State for the Environment. I accept that it is difficult for any group of people to reach one decision and then to come to a contrary one.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes, I appreciate that my hon. Friend the Minister cannot say anything substantive today. I realise that the law does not allow my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to reach a conclusion off his own bat. Rather, he must endorse or refuse one presented to him by the Boundary Commission. I can only say, with a great deal of support from those who still think of themselves as Yorkshire or Lincolnshire people, that I hope even now that there will be a recognition that a decision to go back to something like the ancient Yorkshire and Lincolnshire which existed before 1974 would be enthusiastically applauded not only in the present Humberside but far outside the existing boundaries of that unloved teenager.

11.29 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory): It was no surprise to me that my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) chose this subject. I have been aware of his strong feelings on the issue. He has never been one to be shy about making his views known, particularly when his constituents are concerned. He set out his case against the present county structure with his usual skill and exuberance, and he was supported in that by some additional points by my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller), who gave his views from a slightly different perspective—from West Yorkshire. On 5 July I answered a debate initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell). I recall that my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes intervened on that occasion as well.

It might be appropriate if I set out a little of the background, because the present boundary review takes place in a more general framework. I shall then comment more specifically on the Humberside review.

Until 1972, the review of local government boundaries was somewhat haphazard and intermittent. There were periods of great change interspersed with periods when little happened. In 1972, it was thought that a new system would be appropriate. There was general agreement that it should not be possible for the Government of the day to make changes as they saw fit, because that would introduce the temptation to change electoral boundaries for political convenience.

I believe that Governor Gerry of Massachussetts was the first politician who fell victim to the temptation to alter boundaries to suit his political ends. I understand that he designed a constituency which looked rather like a salamander. Someone thought that it should be called a gerrymander, so he gave his name to a political system and it passed into our language.

In 1972, the then right hon. Member for Crosby, the late Graham Page, wisely wished to protect his successors as Ministers for Local Government from the temptation to follow in Governor Gerry's steps. He designed a system which ensures that changes can be made when they are desirable for "effective and convenient local government."

Those words appear in the Local Government Act 1972, which also imposes constraints upon the Secretary of State of the time in initiating such changes.

Effective and convenient local government has three components, to which reference has been made—first, whether the proposed boundaries reflect the wishes of the majority of the local residents; secondly, whether the alterations would provide more efficient services at county or district level; thirdly, whether they would better reflect the pattern of community life.

[Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory]

Under the Local Government Act 1972, the Local Government Boundary Commission for England was set up. It is a small, expert body of people who review local government boundaries throughout the country and form a view of what will make for effective and convenient local government. The legislation provides for the commission to take the Government's views into account. That is done by way of Department of the Environment circulars. The legislation also provides for local people to be given every opportunity to have their say, both before the proposals are submitted to the Secretary of State and afterwards.

A very important feature of the system is that the Secretary of State can only work within the framework of the commission's recommendations. He can either accept its recommendations or reject them. He can accept them with some modifications, but what he cannot do, and has no power to do, is to devise changes of his own and come up with something quite different from the commission's recommendations.

My hon. Friend mentioned the role played by my right hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley) on Humberside. The guidelines for the first Humberside review laid down that the abolition of the county council or any principal authority should not be recommended. However, after the Commission recommended that there should not be a major change on Humberside, a large number of people took issue with the report. Over 7,000 representations were received. My hon. Friend mentioned that figure.

In the light of that response, my right hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury decided that the commission should have a further look at the question, without the previous constraints. He therefore directed the comission to carry out a further review and to take a completely fresh look at the question. It was able to consider the abolition of Humberside county council and the division of the county in whatever way seemed appropriate, and that remains the position. As I told my hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey earlier this month, we now await the commission's report on its further review.

We know that the commission is carrying out careful and thorough studies of all aspects of the question. It has told me that its consideration of all the questions involved is proving somewhat more difficult than expected. Nevertheless, I should prefer the commission to take a careful, considered and painstaking look at every aspect of these possible boundary changes rather than trying to meet an artificial deadline.

My hon. Friends know that the Government cannot express an opinion at this stage. I have listened carefully to what they have said today and I shall draw the Boundary Commission's attention to the debate. It is right that it should be made aware of expressions of opinion in the House.

Mr. Waller: Is my hon. Friend aware that when a debate on this issue took place recently in the other place all who spoke in it expressed very much the same sort of view as has been expressed in this House?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Yes, I have read the report of that debate, and Lord Hesketh sent the report of the debate to the Boundary Commission, so the chairman and the members of the commission are also aware of it.

At this time I can express no views on the merits of the case, but I await the commission's report with interest. In conclusion, I repeat that I will ensure that the commission is made aware of the views that have been expressed today.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-one minutes to One o'clock.

PRESENTATION OF BILL

MINISTERIAL AND OTHER OFFICES (PENSIONS AND SALARIES)

9.34 am

Mr. Speaker: Second Reading, what day?

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should have thought that a Bill involving pensions would be presented before most hon. Members had left for their constituencies. Much opinion has been voiced, especially by Opposition Members, since last night when we knew that the Bill would be presented. Having been subject to some pressure by Opposition Members, one might have thought that the Leader of the House would have considered presenting the Bill either earlier or after the end of the recess. Presenting it before the start of the recess, knowing that most hon. Members are away——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is purely a formal presentation. It happens regularly. We have yet to have the Second Reading, when the hon. Gentleman can object and put his points of view.

Mr. Powell: I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker. However, surely hon. Members, with a Bill which affects them, should be consulted about when the Bill would be presented. I am given to understand that what we would refer to as our shop steward for pensions and other issues that concern hon. Members has had consultations with the Leader of the House. Unfortunately, he cannot be here this morning, but if he had been, he would have made these objections himself. The Leader of the House should have given some consideration to this matter and should not have presented the Bill until after the recess.

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Sir Geoffrey Howe): I can understand the hon. Gentleman's interest in this matter, which is why I have kept in touch with the representatives of the major parties, including the trustees who are closely interested in it. Everyone has been anxious that the matter should come forward as soon as possible so that it could be debated and brought to a conclusion in the overspill. It is for that reason alone that we thought it right to secure the publication of the Bill today so that hon. Members might have the benefit of studying the matter throughout the recess. If I had postponed the Bill's introduction until the overspill, I might legitimately have been exposed to some criticism.

Perhaps I may have a word with the hon. Gentleman afterwards. As I have said, I have kept in touch with the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), who presides over the trustees, and others, and it is in accordance with the general wish that the Bill has been published today, so that it may be considered during the overspill.

BILL PRESENTED

MINISTERIAL AND OTHER OFFICES (PENSIONS AND SALARIES):

Sir Geoffrey Howe, supported by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, presented (under Standing Order No. 48 (Procedure upon Bills whose main object is to create a charge upon the public revenue)) a Bill to make new provision with respect to the pensions payable to or in respect of persons who have held the office of Prime Minister and First Lord of the Treasury, Speaker of the House of Commons or Lord Chancellor; to relate the salary of the Lord Chancellor to that of the Lord Chief Justice; and to provide for the making of grants to persons ceasing to hold ministerial and certain other offices and the payment of an allowance to persons holding those offices who are members of the House of Lords: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Monday 15 October and to be printed. FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Ordered,

That Mr. Peter Temple-Morris be discharged from the Foreign Affairs Committee and Mr. William Powell be added to the Committee. [Sir Marcus Fox, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

PETITION

Kirklees and Bradford (Boundary Proposals)

9.38 am

Mrs. Elizabeth Peacock (Batley and Spen): I beg leave to present a petition signed by some 2,160 of my constituents in Batley and Spen, opposing the local government Boundary Commission proposals to move the boundary between Kirklees and Bradford to the line of the M62 motorway.

The main effect of the proposals would be to move the communities of Birkenshaw, East Brierley, Oakenshaw, Hartshead and Scholes from the Kirklees metropolitan district council to Bradford city council. That is not acceptable to the residents of the villages, or to others in my constituency who would be affected by the changes. The Boundary Commission for England cannot ignore historical and family ties when boundaries are drawn on maps. Local preference and tradition must be taken into consideration.

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your honourable House will request the Secretary of State for the Environment to reject the Boundary Commission proposals.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Young Offenders (Secure Units)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Goodlad.]

9.39 am

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): I want to focus attention on a need that exists throughout the country, although I shall demonstrate it in the light of Welsh experience and a recent sad episode of which many hon. Members are aware. The hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) is here, as it involved his constituent.

I want to emphasise the need to ensure that 15 and 16-year-olds who are certified as unruly by a magistrates court should not go to prison. I shall argue the case and demonstrate that there is virtual unanimity in support of that argument. No one suggests that young people should not be punished. Much of the argument involves the type of secure accommodation that should be available for young people.

I shall quote from the House of Commons Expenditure Committee which puts the case more clearly and effectively than I could:

> "We condemn in the strongest possible terms the use of certificates of unruliness as a means of achieving secure accommodation. We recommend that the practice of remanding young persons to adult prisons should cease forthwith; alternative arrangements must be made."

It is clear and unequivocal and most of us would probably agree with it, but that report was published in 1975 and we are still waiting for action on it. We are still consulting on the problem in England and Wales 15 years on. The recent sad case illustrates the cost that is being incurred.

In the past 20 years, six 15 and 16-year-olds have died in prisons to which they should not have been sent. In the past couple of weeks, there was the youngest ever suicide in a prison in the United Kingdom. A 15-year-old, Philip Knight, committed suicide in Swansea prison. He should not have been there in the first place. He was sent there only because nowhere else could be found for him. There was no adequately secure place available at the time. There is a major gap in provision throughout the country; in Wales it is a complete gap. We have just three small units, two of which have two cells each and the third has three cells. The Government have dismissed those units as unacceptable and suitable only for confining youngsters for a maximum of seven days.

The young lad who committed suicide had been in Swansea prison for three weeks. On the day he committed suicide, he had gone to court for sentencing. He and the prison authorities expected that that was the last he would see of the inside of Swansea prison. It was expected that he would be sent to suitable secure accommodation for young people aged 15 or 16. However, he was sent back to prison because no suitable accommodation could be found.

The hon. Member for Pembroke has asked whether he could have a few minutes of this Adjournment debate. I am willing to agree with that if he should catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, as the case involves his constituent. We all recognise that questions need to be asked. It is not for us to take over the coroner's role, but we should put down some markers.

The governor of the prison and his staff, the prison officers, were every bit as angry as the hon. Member for Pembroke and I that the young lad was sent to Swansea prison. In a broadcast that the prison governor and I did together and in other interviews, the prison governor has made it clear that prisons are not intended for young people of that age. In the past nine months there have already been two suicides at Swansea prison involving young offenders aged between 17 and 21, so it was the third suicide in that time, but the only one involving a youngster in that age group.

It is even sadder that the lad was still in prison although apparently he had made an attempt earlier to commit suicide. It seems that he had cut his wrists about a week before he eventually hanged himself. One is bound to ask with what he cut his wrists when he was supposed to be in a secure prison. What did he use, and why was it available? He then went to the prison hospital where there was an overnight guard because, as is normal in prisons, there was no overnight medical attendant. It has been suggested that the guard did not even have a key. I understand that, according to normal prison procedures, under special watch B, which involves a prisoner being watched every 15 minutes, a sealed package containing the key is available for whoever is on duty overnight, but it has been suggested that no key was available, yet the youngster had already made one attempt on his life and might have needed instant attention.

In view of the immaturity of the boy, why was he not placed under special watch A, which involves constant supervision? Not only had the youngster attempted suicide in prison, but, according to reports, he was suspected of trying to commit suicide before he was even sent to prison. It has been suggested to me by people with great experience in the prison service that, although special watch A—the constant watch facility—is available in theory, it is virtually never used simply because it costs so much, the lack of resources and staffing levels. Yet constant supervision is essentially what a 15-year-old should have had after a suicide attempt when clearly he was in a severe emotional condition, having returned from court that day after sentencing and having expected not to be sent back to the prison.

I emphasise that the criticisms that I am making and the questions that I am asking relate to the system. I am not in any way pointing fingers at individuals. I received a sad letter from someone who retired from the prison service some time ago in which he said that even now, many years later, he still worries about suicides of adult prisoners within the prison and wonders whether more could have been done to save their lives. In this case we are entitled to ask why the system was not operating more efficiently. The individuals involved were operating the system as they were required to do, but it was not enough.

The tragic death of a youngster took place 15 years after the House of Commons Select Committee on Expenditure made its conclusive recommendation that youngsters under the unruliness certificate—that put Philip Knight into Swansea prison—should not be placed in prisons in future. An even sadder twist to the tale is that on 17 January 1989 the clerk to the magistrates in Haverfordwest, the area from which the young boy came, wrote to Dyfed county council and copied the letter to the Lord Chancellor and the Home Office. He did that because he knows that the scale of provision required would be too large for a county such as Dyfed to undertake. In that letter he said:

"It is highly desirable that secure accommodation be available so as to prevent the offender running away and sometimes even adding a further list of offences to those which he or she already faces."

Referring to young offenders, the letter goes on:

"They are sometimes being committed to custodial sentences or remanded to remand centres or prisons in circumstances where perhaps a custodial sentence or remand would otherwise not have been ordered if secure residential council accommodation had been available."

Therefore, that letter anticipated events and 18 months earlier the clerk to the magistrates in this lad's area had drawn the attention of the county, the Home Office and the Lord Chancellor to the gap in provision.

The Lord Chancellor's Department forwarded the correspondence to the Welsh Office which replied to the letter. The reply is dated 20 February 1989 and is from a Mr. B. J. Collins. It reads:

"Your letter of 18 January addressed to the Lord Chancellor's Department and concerning secure accommodation in Dyfed has been passed to the Welsh Office for attention. Accordingly, we are currently undertaking a study of the scale and nature of secure accommodation in Wales."

That was more than a year and a half ago.

Yesterday I saw the Secretary of State for Wales and asked him about the result of that study. I had a telephone call from him just before I came into the Chamber. He told me that the study, which started 18 months ago, has now been completed, and a consultative document is with the directors of social services. Therefore, 15 years after the original Committee recommendation and 18 months after the attention of the Welsh Office, the Home Office and the Lord Chancellor had been drawn to the gap in provision, we have a consultative document. The result of that consultation is not expected before April 1991. One can hardly accuse anybody of undue haste in the way in which they are trying to deal with the problem. There is an appalling lack of urgency and almost a lack of awareness.

I had an incredible answer a week ago from the Welsh Office. On 19 July I was told by a Welsh Office Minister:

"We have not received any representations which call for the provision of a secure unit for young offenders."—[Official Report, 19 July 1990; Vol. 176, c. 662.]

That is despite having received the correspondence forwarded from the Lord Chancellor's Department and having allegedly set up a study 18 months ago.

That is what the hon. Member for Pembroke and I face in dealing with the problem in Wales. However, it is not just a Welsh problem, and that is why a Department of Health Minister has been courteous enough to attend the debate instead of his Welsh counterpart. The problem in Wales is reflected throughout the country.

In October 1989 the Minister for Health, the hon. Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley), produced a discussion document. I am not criticising her because it was recognised long before her ministerial appointment that she had a keen interest in social need. She pursued that interest when she was appointed a Minister. The document was for England and Wales and was entitled "Secure Accommodation in Community Homes". The Government's policy is stated. They say:

"The Government accept that the use of secure accommodation remains necessary for a relatively small proportion of young people because they are a major risk to themselves or other people. The policy view of the Department is that the secure placement must be a last resort, never because no other placement is available at the relevant time."

Yet Philip Knight was in Swansea prison because no other place was available at the relevant time.

The Government are trying to shuffle a responsibility that should be theirs on to the councils. There remains a legitimate Government interest in the extent of the national stock of secure accommodation in its scale and location. I do not think that any of us would dissent from that proposition. However, it runs contrary to some of the points that arise later in the document.

The Government are clear about the type of provision they recommend. They rule out the type of accommodation already available in Wales. They said:

"If greater impact is to be made in reducing the number of juveniles remanded to custody, secure facilities need to be made accessible for those parts of the country which are presently under resourced. Such new units should provide a minimum of eight places or multiples of eight and up to a maximum of 24 places."

The Government point to the inadequate nature of the small existing secure units which provide between two and six placces. There are many of those in England, but in Wales we have only units within the unacceptable category.

The document goes on to say that, because of the limitations of size, they provide a poor quality of life, inhibit the staff in providing the quality of care that they strive to attain and are totally unsuited to the task of holding young people for more than a limited period. That unsuitability is recognised by the seven-day rule that applies to holding people.

The accommodation that is condemned in the document is the only type of accommodation available in Wales. In fact, for other accommodation we have to go foraging in England, but England has its own problems of trying to find suitable accommodation for its young people. The Government say, "Because these units of eight are too big for one county council social services department's requirements, we need a multi-council approach." In the document, there is a long screed giving the reasons for a regional basis, a regional bed bank and regional databases. It says:

"The Department's Regional Social Services Inspectorate should play an active enabling role in bringing together local authorities within regions to develop coherent local strategy."

That is all very well, but the Government abandoned the regional approach in 1982.

We in Wales have to send our youngsters to England. Mid-Glamorgan sent four to England last year and still cannot place two youngsters. Clwyd uses Hindley, Gwent sometimes has to place young people as far away as county Durham, and of course there are Cardiff and Swansea prisons.

The point that emerges from the document is the uneven spread throughout England and Wales of units with a minimum of eight places, which the Government say we need. The Government will provide only capital grant aid, not running cost aid, and they are even withdrawing some of the capital aid for converting existing units. Far from being more helpful, they are being less helpful.

The problem is exacerbated—I do not say this in a party-political sense because it is a financial reality—by the financial constraints of the poll tax. Authorities facing capping are reluctant to take on the capital and running-cost commitment of units whose occupancy rate is less than 80 per cent., yet the Government say, "We will not meet the running costs of these units because it is the responsibility of local authorities."

It is worth bearing in mind that it costs the Home Office about £1,000 a week to keep a youngster in prison. It agrees with councils that they should not be in prison but says, "We want you to bear the cost of providing accommodation." Where is the legitimate Government interest in the national stock of accommodation and its location and in meeting the running costs of these units?

The Government emphasise in the document the need for central initiatives, central co-ordination and central planning provision, and although they can provide all those functions they are dodging their responsibility. The National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders, the Howard League for Penal Reform, prison governors, councils, social services departments and even common sense are against youngsters of this age group being kept in prison, yet 15 years after a categoric recommendation of a Select Committee we are still consulting and talking, and no one is doing anything.

10.3 am

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) and my hon. Friend the Minister for allowing me two or three minutes to raise the important case of Philip Knight, who hanged himself in Swansea prison on Friday 13 July.

Philip, who was 15, had been sentenced by the magistrates court and had arrived at prison earlier that day. He was seen alive at 9.30 pm but when he was seen again at 10 pm he was found hanging in his cell. Unfortunately, attempts to revive him failed and he was adjudged dead on arrival at Singleton hospital.

The bald facts of the tragic case of Philip Knight raise considerable worries about how young juvenile offenders are treated by the prison system and how potential suicide cases such as Philip Knight are supervised. As the right hon. Member for Swansea, West said, he had previously attempted to commit suicide by trying to slash his wrist. The first question that we must ask, although I recognise the difficulties for the prison service, is how young people and other prison inmates are assessed as a suicide risk and supervised when they arrive in prison.

The treatment of suicide-risk cases is set out in Home Office circular instruction 29/1989, which states that special procedures must be followed for a potential suicide or a high-risk suicide case. As the right hon. Gentleman said, this can be 30 minutes observation, 15 minutes observation or, in high-risk cases, continuous supervision.

The question that I want to ask on behalf of my late constituent's parents is, why was there not continuous supervision of Philip Knight as he had already attempted to commit suicide?

Circular instruction 20/1989 provides suitable instructions that should be followed by the prison service. It is of particular concern, first, that a youngster of this age should be in an adult prison and, secondly, that, given his history, he was not under supervision. I hope that the Home Office, in conjunction with the Department of Health and the Welsh Office, which is responsible for such matters in Wales, will seriously consider this case and any lessons that can be learned in the light of the coroner's inquest and what additional co-ordination is necessary to ensure that tragic cases do not occur in the future.

10.6 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): The issue raised by the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) and discussed by my hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) is of considerable importance for the treatment of young people charged with offences. The Government do not dispute the seriousness of the issues that they have raised.

The right hon. Member for Swansea, West began by quoting the report of a Select Committe in 1975, which emphasised the unsatisfactory nature of the certificate of unruliness procedure. The Select Committee recognised that juveniles on remand should not be committed to prison. That is not in dispute; indeed, the Government are as committed as the Select Committee and the right hon. Gentleman to the phasing out of the remand of juveniles to prison department establishments as soon as resources permit. That statement of policy was made not in 1975, when the Government were not in a position to make a statement on policy, but in a report to Parliament on social services for children in England and Wales between 1979 and 1981. As a statement of policy, there is no division between the right hon. Gentleman, my hon. Friend and the Government. We are committed to the elimination of this admittedly unsatisfactory procedure.

Wherever possible, local authorities strive to provide accommodation within the child care system for alleged juvenile offenders on remand. In the present circumstances, however, that is not always practicable and, regrettably, some young people are remanded to a prison department establishment while awaiting trial or sentence. We acknowledge that this is the least desirable of all the options, and none of us would wish it to be used, except where no other option is viable.

Strict criteria govern the use of penal establishments for such people. Over the years, this route has been progressively closed to all remanded girls under 17 and boys under 15. Only juvenile males aged 15 and 16 can now be placed in penal establishments on remand. This is a significant advance on the position when the Select Committee reported in 1975. They must either have committed alleged offences carrying a maximum sentence of 14 years or more in the case of an adult or have been charged with a crime of violence or have a previous conviction for such a crime. I emphasise that the Government remain committed to the complete abolition of penal remand for juveniles as soon as resources permit.

The right hon. Member for Swansea, West and my hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke referred to the case of Philip Knight and cited it as an example of the continued operation of this admittedly unsatisfactory procedure. Clearly I cannot disagree in general terms with the proposition that Philip Knight should not, in an ideal world, have found himself admitted to the prison. The specific questions which have been asked about his case are the subject of an inquiry by Dyfed social services department, which will make a report to the social services inspectorate in Wales. I am sure that the right hon. Member for Swansea, West recognises that it would be inappropriate for me to discuss any of the specific circumstances surrounding that tragic case.

In response to the points raised by the right hon. Member for Swansea, West and my hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke, I should like to comment on the general development of policy in penal establishments in England and Wales for the reduction of the risk of inmates committing suicide. The prison service is constantly looking to improve its suicide prevention strategy. Present initiatives include a planned trial for the use of closed circuit television, the continuation of the family ties programme, a proposed experiment at Winchester prison in the use of card phones by remand prisoners and a pilot scheme to reduce routine censorship in category B establishments. The risk of suicide is acknowledged to be and clearly is a problem in penal establishments. Serious work is being done to eliminate the risk of people committing suicide, particularly juveniles, whom we acknowledge should not be there in the first place.

The core of the charge made by the right hon. Member for Swansea, West is perhaps summed up in his phrase that progress towards the achievement of the ideal objective defined by the Select Committee in 1975 has not been going forward with "undue haste". The right hon. Gentleman quoted the discussion documents issued by the Welsh Office and by my Department as evidence that we were more interested in talking about the problem than in resolving it. I do not accept that charge. To some extent, the right hon. Gentleman misses the point of the discussion documents.

He went on to say that the core of the problem is that the Government are not providing sufficient resources for the development of a network of secure units. The Government do not believe that the solution lies necessarily in the creation of more and more secure units. The discussion documents were directed to the questions of establishing the scale of need of secure units, how we can use the units that exist more effectively, and how we can eliminate the unnecessary remar ' juveniles to them.

Mr. Alan Williams: I understand that. The hon. Gentleman stated the Government's policy in 1980-81, when they recognised that they wanted to end the imprisonment of these youngsters. Why did it take until October 1989 even to produce a consultative document?

Mr. Dorrell: As the right hon. Gentleman was kind enough to say, my hon. Friend the Minister for Health cannot be responsible for everything that was said and done in the intervening period. It seems to me that the right hon. Gentleman might welcome the fact that some serious work is being done and the commitment to address the problem to ensure that there are sufficient secure units across the country and that they are used effectively.

I should like to refer to the provisions in chapter 8 of the recent Home Office White Paper "Crime, Justice and Protecting the Public" relating to young offenders. This noted the encouraging development in some parts of the country of bail support schemes offering close supervision of, and constructive work with, young people on remand on bail and expressed the Government's view that such schemes offer a valuable means of avoiding the undesirable effects of remanding a young person away from home.

The White Paper acknowledged also that the arrangements for remanding juveniles charged with criminal offences are unsatisfactory in certain respects. While falling short of proposing complete abolition of penal remand for juveniles, it suggested that the unruliness certification procedure would be replaced by a more stringent test for a remand in custody, which would be more closely related to the need to protect the public from the risk of serious harm or from repeated alleged offending.

I hope that I have been able to show the right hon. Member for Swansea, West and my hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke that there is no division of principle on these difficult issues, and that the Government are addressing them as substantial issues. Their importance is highlighted by the tragic events which have been brought to the attention of the House.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

10.15 am

Sir John Farr (Harborough): I should be remiss if I did not offer the congratulations of the House to my hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Mr. Sainsbury) on his recent promotion. I understand that he is about to make his maiden speech in his new post. I hope that, in answering my points, he will bear it in mind that he has the good wishes of all hon. Members for a successful and long term in his important position. My hon. Friend is in a responsible position, because 500,000 jobs in the apparel industry are under threat because of the threatened abandonment by the Government of the multi-fibre arrangement.

In the past, my hon. Friend the Minister, with whom I have had several dealings, has always proved receptive to common sense. I hope that he can reassure me. As recently as 12 January this year, we had a full Friday's debate on the multi-fibre arrangement. It will be no surprise to him, therefore, that a number of hon. Members were disappointed with what we thought was the very ineffective view taken by the Government. Time has passed rapidly. On Tuesday this week, the final round of negotiations began in Geneva, and we are still not satisfied that the Government's voice, which is part of the voice of the 12 EEC nations, has been heard. We are still not convinced that the Government are aware of the critical importance, if there is to be an apparel manufacturing industry in Britain, of not throwing out the window what we have in the MFA.

Hon. Members are not prepared to accept a whitewash. Experts among Opposition and Conservative Members are not prepared to accept something that is not as stringent as the MFA. Half a million United Kingdom jobs are involved, including 2,800 in my constituency, which is a trivial number compared with the numbers in other constituencies. The future of the 500,000 jobs in the United Kingdom, and a total of 5 million jobs in Europe, will be decided by the EC's posture in this round of negotiations, which is to terminate in December.

I remind the House that, at the moment, the inustry is protected by MFA 3. From what I have heard in the House and in answers to questions, the Government unfortunately appear to be committed to the dismantling of the MFA, despite warnings from all sides. It is said—I hope that the Minister will by now be able to tell me that I am wrong—that the Government are leading that school of thought in the EC negotiating team that not only calls for the scrapping of the MFA but would allow that to be done without ensuring suitable safeguards in GATT following the ending of the arrangement.

Will my hon. Friend the Minister tell me that I am wrong? I know of no hon. Member on either side of the House who has not heard from his constituents that the multi-fibre arrangement or something equally strong is absolutely essential to the continuance of full employment and to Britain's massive industry. If the MFA has to go, it must be replaced with GATT regulations that are just as strong. For far too long, the industry has suffered from distorted conditions of international trade. We have been made to appear the bad man of Europe. We have suffered from illegal subsidies, dumping, the closure of potential markets and the theft of intellectual achievements.

As a major exporting industry, with overseas sales worth £4 billion in 1989, we favour freedom of trade, provided that that freedom is mutual and not one sided. Unless the Uruguay round of GATT negotiations results in real success in demolishing such trade distorting practices, there can be no question of the multi-fibre arrangement being phased out or even weakened.

If the negotiations are, indeed, finally successful, the Government and the European Community as a whole are committed to accepting an eventual phase-out of the multi-fibre arrangement. What worries me is that the Government appear to be giving support for an unrealistically short transition period. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] My hon. Friends the Members for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick) and for Batley and Spen (Mrs. Peacock) are also worried. A substantial weakening of the multi-fibre arrangement is to take place almost immediately. That appears to be acceptable to the Government but I can assure the Minister that it is totally unacceptable to hon. Members.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on obtaining this debate. Does he agree that even if proper safeguards are obtained and incorporated within the GATT rules, it would be wholly unacceptable to all of us if the MFA were phased out in less than seven years? Does he agree that that is the absolute minimum?

Sir John Farr: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who has long been a great supporter of textiles and who has done much for his constituents in this respect. Of course, seven years is the minimum. The hon. Gentleman touches on another of my fears. I have it on good authority —I am sure that the hon. Gentleman does, too—that the Government are pressing for a short transitional period from a strong MFA to something unknown, devised under GATT. I welcome the hon. Gentleman's support.

Another of my worries is that the United States Congress is ready to pass into law a Bill to control textile and clothing imports, including those from the United Kingdom and the EC. If the Geneva negotiations are unsatisfactory, the Bill will undoubtedly be introduced in the United States, as it was passed by a large majority in the Senate on Tuesday last week.

I wish to deal with another important matter—what is known as linkage. As I said, the industry is concerned that in the Uruguay round too much concern is being shown for wider interests such as agriculture and services and too little regard is paid to jobs in Britain, especially in the apparel industry. We are facing the prospect of a commitment to phase out the MFA without achieving statisfactory improvements in GATT rules and disciplines in line with the Punta del Este declaration, which launched the round in 1986. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have stressed linkage as a crucial element more congently and ably than I can. But I should warn my hon. Friend the Minister that our bottom line is that, in the absence of effective linkage being achieved, there cannot and must not be any commitment to weaken, let alone phase out, the MFA.

With the MFA abolished and without effective safeguards plus an effective anti-dumping code plus an effective clamp on trade-distorting Government subsidies, a further major cut in the current employment level of 480,000 in the United Kingdom textiles, knitting and clothing industries would be inevitable. My hon. Friend the Minister—a new, fresh face in a new and important job —may think that I am exaggerating. I should tell him that since 1979 the employment in the industry has declined to from 780,000 to 480,000, and that has been with the protection of the multi-fibre arrangement and with modernisation which has been carried out by many employers and a co-operative work force throughout the country. In the knitting sector, with which we in Leicester are familiar, 46,000 jobs have been lost since 1979, including an estimated 14,000 over the past 18 months. The main centre of the east midlands has been really hard hit, but Scotland and other centres have not escaped the alarming surge of imports between 1986 and 1989—some 60 per cent.—to the value of £1,400 million.

The loss of jobs has to be stemmed. The industry demands a stronger MFA or equivalent safeguards, and many hon. Members are becoming most disturbed. Let me give an up-to-date illustration which, quite by chance, I found in a highly regarded local paper, the Leicester Mercury. Similar illustrations could be found in Yorkshire and Scotland and wherever the apparel industry is predominant in Britain. Thanks to the MFA, two knitwear firms were saved by the breakthrough of imposing restrictions on Indonesian sweater imports. The article says:

> "After several months of sustained campaigning by the East Midlands-based Knitting Industries' Federation, the UK government has slapped a quota on imports of sweaters from this developing South East Asian country . . . The quota of 3,208,000 pieces will cover the 10 months from March 1 to December 31, this year. It compares with Indonesian sweater imports of 3·4 million pieces in 1989 and one million pieces in the three months to March 1990, at an average price of £2·46 per garment. These imported sweaters are 100 per cent. acrylic and are aimed at the lower end of the clothing market. The quota has been introduced under category five—the jumpers and sweaters section of the Multi Fibre Arrangement."

That is the sort of protection that we must have if the British apparel industry is to survive.

10.30 am

Mrs. Elizabeth Peacock (Batley and Spen): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) on gaining yet another debate on the MFA in this Session. As he said, we had one in January and we welcome today's debate.

I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade on his promotion and welcome him to his new post. I say in all seriousness that I hope that he will be a friend to the textile industry. We need good Ministers and good friends, particularly in this important year. The Uruguay round of GATT will come to an end in September this year and, as we have heard, important negotiations are taking place in Geneva this week which, because of their complexity, will probably last until the end of the year.

As chairman of the all-party textile group, I assure my hon. Friend the Minister that the industry is committed to competition. It has continued to invest, even during the difficult times of high interest rates. It now runs the most up-to-date modern technology of computer dyeing together with traditional wool scouring—the two ends of the factory process—and it has continued, as an act of faith in the future and as an act of faith and commitment to the industry.

Strong representations are needed in Geneva during the international trade negotiations because they are crucial to the future of the British textile, knitting and apparel industries. We are a major exporting industry of quality goods. We have lost the cheaper end of the market, as everybody recognises. We now have high quality, high added value goods, and that is the market in which we wish to continue.

Our overseas sales in 1989 amounted to £4 billion—an awful lot of exports. They help our trade deficit and we would not want to lose any more. The industry is not looking for protectionism; it is looking for fair trade opportunities. We would all be happy if we had a level playing field, but we do not, as my hon. Friend will no doubt quickly learn. The industry would favour the liberalisation of trade provided that it was mutual, and not one-sided, as it seems to be at the moment. We are making all the running and other countries are not treating us fairly.

Unless the GATT negotiations result in real and demonstrable success in demolishing the trade-distorting practices, there can be no question of the MFA being phased out or even weakened. That is due to take place in 1991, but we must be sure that some other mechanism is in place before then. Those Governments calling for the removal of the MFA must decide whether they are willing to bring their trading policies into line with normal conditions of competition. So far, there is no sign that they are.

Whatever happens at the end of the negotiations, I stress that we need a long transitional period for the phasing out of the MFA—at least seven years, as the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) said. Many of us will be looking for up to 10 years as a realistic time for any new GATT rules to be absorbed by other countries. Our industry is happy to come into line with whatever is decided, but it must be assured that other countries will be the same. A shorter phasing-out period is not acceptable to the industry. Again, I stress that it is looking not for protectionism but for fair trade.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough said, this week, by a majority of 36, the United States Congress passed a Bill to control textile and clothing imports, including those from the United Kingdom and the EC. Yorkshire's high quality worsted cloth has a good market in the United States and if that cloth cannot go there, our industry will be affected. The United States has said that if the Geneva negotiations are unsatisfactory it will proceed with that Bill. We have been told that it could be vetoed by President Bush, but that is a risk which we are not willing to take at this stage.

I appreciate that my hon. Friend the Minister has had only 72 hours in his new job. I hope that we are not blinding him with too much science today about the textile, knitting and apparel industries. I am sure that he will learn quickly. But will he assure the House and the industry, which I know is listening intently to what we and, in particular, the Minister have to say, that the Government and the EC will take the strongest possible stance in the interests of our industry and of fairness and discipline in our international trade?

Can we have the assurance that my hon. Friend the Minister will fight as hard as possible for fair and free trading opportunities—the level playing field about which everybody talks but which, as yet, we do not seem able to find? The British seem to play cricket very much by the rules, but our competitors have not even learnt the rudimentary rules of rugby. Please can we have an assurance that he will fight hard to ensure that our industry has that level playing field so that it can compete on fair grounds to expand exports and so maintain a healthy industry at home? I am sure that my hon. Friend will realise that without a healthy manufacturing base, a trading nation such as ours cannot sustain an export trade. We must have trade at home and abroad to have a good manufacturing base.

I shall listen carefully to my hon. Friend's reply. I assure him that before long we shall be knocking on his door to ask him to meet representatives of the industry and, as his predecessor did, to visit some of our factories in Yorkshire to see what is being done.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade on his promotion. I am delighted to see him on the Front Bench. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) for giving me the opportunity to participate in the debate. I do so aware of the fact that, between June 1988 and the end of 1989, 760 workers were made redundant in the Hinckley district of the National union of Hosiery and Knitwear Workers and there have been other redundancies in Leicester and elsewhere.

I want to address some specific problems. The hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) referred to the transition period for the MFA and suggested seven years. That is inadequate. Most developing countries are asking for the phasing out to be spread over six to nine years and the United States is suggesting 10 years. Against that background, six to eight years, about which my hon. Friend's predecessors were talking, is far too short. A minimum period of 10 years is essential, with, as was stated earlier, clearly defined stages, the first of which would involve the minimum of concessions. My hon. Friend must also take into consideration the problems posed by eastern Europe, with the possibility of a flood of hosiery, knitwear and textiles coming from an entirely different source.

Specific problems relate to the industry and the MFA. The first is the basket extractor. My hon. Friend the Member for Harborough referred to Indonesian jerseys and an article on the subject in the Leicester Mercury. The Minister may be aware that it takes six months to get the basket extractor to work after the trigger level has been reached. There must be an improvement in the mechanism for setting new quotas when new products are developed. At present, for example, somebody can establish a T-shirt company in Bangladesh and flood the market, but it will take six to nine months to establish a quota. That state of affairs is not good enough.

Why is China not being treated as a dominant supplier? It is the largest manufacturer of clothing in the world and potentially the largest exporter. It should be treated as the largest, along with Hong Kong, South Korea and Macao. What will happen when Hong Kong is subsumed into China? It is important that the new Minister deals with those important problems.

As part of our policy, the United Kingdom must maintain a production chain and, to do that, we must keep control of all parts of the chain—yarn, plain fabric, dyed fabric and garments. There is no point in having quotas only on parts, so we must look at the transitional arrangements for all component parts of the chain.

The Minister should also address the whole area of the clause on social development in the GATT. The clause says that the benefits of trade in textiles should in part go to those who produce the garments, yet pitifully poor wages are paid in many parts of the world. For example, in Indonesia there is an hourly rate of 25 United States cents, in Thailand it is 75 cents, whereas in Britain the rate is $8. Indeed, my hon. Friend could make his name as a Minister if he dealt with that issue, because his predecessors did not do so.

We must not overlook the whole issue of confidence. I was at Leicester polytechnic recently where I discussed the new CIMTEX—computer integrated manufacturing of textiles—project for which the Government have made £4·5 million available over three years for the development of automated garment assembly. It is a wonderful project. At Hinckley college in my constituency we are training operatives of the future, but 15 and 16-year-olds will not become sewing machinists, mechanics, overlockers and knitting mechanics unless they have confidence in the industry.

I call on the Minister to throw us a lifeline. He must address the problems of the industry with great urgency and seek a seven-year—or, as we would hope, a 10-year —minimum transitional period.

10.42 am

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): Last week I was present at the completion of a new factory in my constituency. Courtaulds has invested £4 million in the new factory at Silsden, so demonstrating its confidence in the future of the textile industry, in the skills that exist among our operatives and in our ability to produce the best designs and the best quality garments which can sell anywhere in the world so long as they are able to compete fairly with those of other countries.

I place great emphasis not so much on the length of time during which the MFA is to be phased out but the linkage to which my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) referred. So long as other countries allow access of our goods to their markets and they withdraw the subsidies in which all too many of them indulge to prop up their industries, we—I am sure that I speak for the whole of the British industry—are prepared to see free trade and the withdrawal of protection proceed apace.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Does the hon. Gentleman agree with his hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick) that the social clause is essential because any freedom of trade must be based on equality, and clearly there is not equality in health and safety standards, trade union rights and levels of payment, which are equally important?

Mr. Waller: I note what the hon. Gentleman says, but we are in a poor position to impose on other countries the standards that we in Britain consider to be important.

I attach great importance to the withdrawal of subsidies and to a strengthening of the GATT rules. The dismantling of the MFA must go hand in hand with a strengthening of the GATT rules in accordance with the principles of the Punta del Este declaration. Provided those developments take place, I am confident that we can have a strong textile industry.

It is essential that Britain should not waver in its contribution to the negotiations, for many countries will hold out to the last if they see Britain and Europe unwilling to uphold the principles of competition, for which the British Government stand. Fair competition should be our standard, but it must apply to all countries. Unless they are willing to conform, we cannot be the odd man out.

10.45 am

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Tim Sainsbury): I wish at the outset to thank my hon. Friends the Members for Harborough (Sir J. Farr), for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick), for Batley and Spen (Mrs. Peacock) and for Keighley (Mr. Waller) for their kind remarks and welcome to me as I take up my new responsibilities. I hope that I shall live up to their expectations.

I am glad to have this opportunity, in my first speech as Minister for Trade, to reply on the important subject of the multi-fibre arrangement, an issue which we have debated many times in the House over the years. I appreciate that it is a matter of great concern to my hon. Friends, in particular to my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough, who has been vigilant on behalf of his constituents' interests in the matter for many years.

I also take the opportunity to pay tribute to my predecessor, whom I knew well and worked happily with for two years at the Ministry of Defence, when we were, or could have been said to be, collectively the largest customers of British industry. My noble Friend attached great importance to his discussions with hon. Members of this House about matters such as the MFA and the visits that he was able to make to textile and clothing companies in different regions of the United Kingdom.

I say immediately in response to what my hon. Friends have said that I have every intention of continuing that close interest. I have already heard of the industry's splendid export record, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Batley and Spen referred. In the first quarter of this year, it showed a 14 per cent. increase in volume terms over the first quarter of 1989, a very satisfactory performance, and one hopes that it will go on to do even better.

I hope that my hon. Friends will appreciate that after less than 72 hours in the job, I have not been able to familiarise myself with all the intricacies of the MFA or with all the aspects of the textile and clothing industry.

At this stage of the negotiations, there is little I can add to the statements that have been made on the subject to the House. I appreciate that nearly two thirds of the work force of about 73,000 in the United Kingdom knitting and hosiery industry is employed in the east midlands, where I understand one in nine jobs in manufacturing industry depend on that sector.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend on his appointment. Although he has not been able to familiarise himself with the MFA, he brings to his new position all the experience he had in his former post and will therefore realise the importance of worldwide agreements, not simply on textiles. He will be able in his present post to draw the attention of Europe and the rest of the world to Britain's claim that financial services, chemical services and so on should be treated equally throughout the world. There would be no point in our throwing away our textile industry and getting nothing in return. In other words, it is not a single factor in this weave.

Mr. Sainsbury: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind remarks, and what he says is perhaps the primary purpose of the GATT round—to end up with a balance of changes that are fair to all parties. I hope that my experience in my previous job at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and other experience, not only in Government but before I became a Member of Parliament, will be helpful in the negotiations. After this relatively short time, I feel that I still have a lot to find out about the textile industry. I hope to have an opportunity to learn more about the industry, and see it at first hand.

Mr. Mark Wolfson (Sevenoaks): When my hon. Friend visits the industry, will he pay particular attention to two points that have become clear to me in the work in which I have been involved as a consultant in the textile industry —that industry's commitment to modern management techniques and its readiness, as has been mentioned, to undertake large capital investment? I believe that the calls that have been made today for a level playing field are vital to the industry because, without it, some countries would find it better to sell up and get out of the industry than to continue, yet the commitment of those in the industry to that industry, both traditionally and in modern times, is extremely impressive.

Mr. Sainsbury: My hon. Friend identifies a factor which is vital not just to the textile industry but to any industry, whether or not the playing field on which it operates is level—good quality of management.

There have been problems with the textile industry during the past two years. Clearly, a number of factors contribute to that, not least fashion and weather conditions. I understand the worries of my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson) and assure him that we have very much in mind the prospects of different sectors of the textile and clothing industry.

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) rose——

Mr. Sainsbury: If the hon. Gentleman will excuse me, I shall not give way, because I have already done so and this is a short debate. I am in danger of running out of time before I have been able to answer the points already made.

I was glad to hear of the scheme referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth under which the Department of Trade and Industry is providing £2·8 million over three years for a major project based in Leicester, designed to improve automated assembly techniques in the garments sector, and in which 22 firms are collaborating with leading academic institutions. As the project was launched only in January, it is too early for results, but I have no doubt that collaborative research and such development projects have a valuable role to play in improving competitiveness.

I was also glad to hear about new developments such as that referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley. As my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks said, capital investment is vital to the prosperity of the textile industry, as to other industries.

As hon. Members know, the future of the multi-fibre arrangement is being considered in the Uruguay round of multilateral trade negotiations, which is due to end this December. This week, the trade negotiations committee is meeting in Geneva to consider reports from the chairmen of the 15 separate Uruguay round negotiating groups concerned with different, but interconnected, trade issues. The committee's objective is to identify areas of agreement, where possible, as well as the further work that is needed if the Uruguay round is to come to a successful conclusion. The importance the European Community and other major industrial countries attach to a successful result was emphasised again at the Houston summit.

Ministers have explained to the House that the European Community remains committed, in the Uruguay round, to negotiating the phasing out of the multi-fibre arrangement, but over a transitional period and on the basis of strengthened GATT rules and disciplines. The European Commission, which negotiates on behalf of the Community in the Uruguay round, has put forward, in the negotiating group on textiles and clothing, proposals that specifically link the liberalisation of current restrictions to commitments on rules and disciplines, and provide for both to be monitored.

My hon. Friend the Member for Harborough rightly identified the importance of tackling trade distorting factors. At the same time, the Community is continuing to press hard in the appropriate negotiating groups for a general reduction of tariff and non-tariff barriers, and more effective rules governing safeguard action against import surges, anti-dumping measures, the use of subsidies and the protection of intellectual property.

Those are important objectives for the Community and I know that they are of particular interest to the textile and clothing industry. I will continue to keep my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough and other hon. Members, in touch with developments as these important negotiations move into their final months, and I shall look forward to visiting textile and clothing companies. My office has already been in touch with the Apparel, Knitting and Textiles Alliance to arrange an early meeting.

I am aware that there is concern in the textile and clothing industry that little has yet been achieved in the negotiations, particularly in relation to market access—which several of my hon. Friends mentioned as being of such importance—and the strengthened rules and disciplines necessary for that, which I have mentioned.

The Uruguay round is an ambitious and complicated negotiation. I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Batley and Spen was clearly well aware of the complexities and difficulties of those negotiations, which involve more than 100 parties with very different interests. Many of the issues are interconnected, and textiles is by no means the only problem sector. The difficult negotiations on agriculture are seen as crucial by many participants. There is absolutely no question of our ending up with what was referred to as a one-sided agreement. It is absolutely essential that the agreement should be fair to all parties and should make progress on the general objectives, with which all those who subscribe to GATT agree.

It is encouraging that a basis for continuing negotiations on agriculture has now been agreed, but much detailed work is still necessary, as, indeed, it is in other groups, including the textiles and clothing group. In those circumstances, it is not surprising that participants can be reluctant at present to give up long-established positions. For most developing countries, greater market access for agricultural and textile and clothing exports is of overriding concern. I doubt whether the most sensitive issues can be resolved until we are much closer to the final ministerial meeting in December. In the meantime, it is extremely important that the Community should argue strongly the case for its own proposals and be ready to clarify its position where there are misunderstandings. We must convince developing countries of our commitment to integrate the textile and clothing sector into GATT if they, in their turn, are to negotiate seriously in other spheres of interest to industrialised countries, including access for our textile exports.

In the end, the European Community, like all other parties, will have to look at the results of the Uruguay round across the board, and consider where its overall interests lie. We must look particularly critically at restrictions that raise prices or reduce competition. Imports from countries that can produce at lower cost help to hold down prices for ordinary families in this country. Textiles and clothing are important for every man, woman and child in the United Kingdom—retail sales in the sector amount to £17 billion, and the price paid for those items is particularly important to lower-income families with children.

It is important to remember that the industry itself is also a consumer. Spinners buy in raw fibre and knitting and weaving companies "consume" the yarn. Dyers, finishers and printers prepare the fabric, which clothing manufacturers use. It is in the interests of both domestic and commercial consumers alike to have access to the widest choice of products at the best possible value. In that sense, imports are not bad news. They broaden the choice of product at different stages of production and allow companies to extend or complete their range. Equally important, the spur of competition, which my hon. Friends said that they welcome, helps our industry to maintain high standards, innovate and develop new products, and contributes to the fight against inflation. Open markets provide a key element in the Government's economic strategy.

For all those reasons, the Government believe that it is in our overall economic interests to phase out the multi-fibre arrangement. We cannot in any case shelter our industry from competition: two thirds of our textile imports by value and a significant proportion of our clothing imports are from other member states of the Community. The recognition that protection cannot be maintained for ever will stimulate the innovation and investment that we have identified in this short debate as being so important. Companies need to demonstrate what they can offer in terms of quality, design, productivity and quick response to offset lower wage rates in developing countries.

Much has already been achieved in the industry, and recent export figures show some of the benefit, but that does not mean that adjustment is necessarily easy. We want an outcome to the negotiations on the MFA that takes proper account of the interests of the United Kingdom, as well as the interests of consumers, retailers and importers.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, South): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I should be grateful if you would inform the House whether you have had a request from the Government for them to make a statement on an important matter that should have urgent consideration —namely, the unscheduled, uncontrolled and hitherto undisclosed release into the atmosphere of substantial quantities of irradiated material from the nuclear establishment at Harwell on 15 July last year, and its potential impact on the people in the surrounding community?

That issue specifically relates to 2,000 curies of tritium gas, which were released when several thousand redundant telephone dials were mechanically shredded and their irradiated contents vented to the four winds, in an uncontrolled and unauthorised manner and without warning to the community. This is the latest example of surreptitious atmospheric littering, and it repeats the worst standards that we criticised in the Soviet nuclear industry at the time of Chernobyl——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. The points that the hon. Gentleman is making are not for the Chair, but my answer to his direct question about whether Mr. Speaker has received a request from a Minister to make a statement is, "No, he has not."

Mr. Cook: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am truly grateful for your guidance, but could you give me some further guidance, and tell me how —when regulations have been flouted in such a cavalier fashion—an hon. Member, on the last day of a parliamentary Session, can draw attention to this dilatory and negligent behaviour——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I dealt with that point in my earlier remarks: this is not a matter with which the Chair can deal.

Mr. Cryer: Further to that point of order, Madam. Is there a Standing Order equivalent to the one relating to Question Time, which would allow a Member to say—in view of the unsatisfactory statement about textiles in the last Adjournment debate—"I give notice that I intend to raise the matter on the Adjournment as soon as possible."?

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is a tactic that I first used in my first year in the House.

Incenerator (Trafford Park)

11.2 am

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Perhaps I can begin my remarks by picking up the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook), who has referred to a serious environmental hazard. The management would no doubt say that it could not happen, because of the fail-safe systems involved. As with many sophisticated technical systems, however—whatever the experts may say—such fail-safe systems do fail, as we know to our cost.

I apologise to the Minister for Roads and Traffic for dragging him here this morning, as I know that he had alternative plans. I should also apologise to his son, as he is the one who will lose as a result of the Minister's presence here this morning. Perhaps the Minister will appreciate, however, that I am raising the matter of the incinerator in Trafford Park because my own son and three daughters live in the area in which it will operate. As both a parent and a constituency Member, I am concerned about the impact of that incinerator on the health of my children and those who live in the area.

I am pleased that the hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) is here and is to speak later, because I wish to establish from the outset that this is not a partisan party-political issue but one that unites the entire community in our area. As the House would expect, I am authorised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) and my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Miss Lestor) to register their opposition: the four constituencies most closely involved are—through their Members—united in their opposition to the development of the incinerator.

As the Minister will know, the plan is to build the incinerator at Trafford Park. Its function will be—at least in part—to destroy chemicals such as PCBs which are brought into this country from overseas. While the European Community Council of Ministers and the Minister of State, Department of the Environment were involved in the decision to ban imports from the Community—I congratulate the Minister on that—I feel that there should also be a ban on imports from the rest of the world. Nearly half of what is taken to the incinerator in Pontypool, south Wales is imported: we are bringing in other people's dirty washing.

I do not want to be accused of the NIMBY syndrome —"not in my back yard"—but I feel that we should recognise that, although the disposal of PCBs and other chemicals must be dealt with, we have no obligation to take on the world's problems. We should think seriously about what policies we adopt towards the importation of waste. Even in their unincinerated form, PCBs are dangerous chemicals, and, in the Stretford and Davyhulme constituencies in Manchester the lorries that carry PCBs are themselves dangerous, which in itself worries my constituents.

The reasons for our concern about incinerators are obvious. They have a bad record in general, and there is also specific concern about the company involved. The Select Committee on Welsh Affairs examined the ReChem incinerator in south Wales; a different company is involved in Manchester, but there are parallels. Torfaen borough council was so concerned about the incinerator that it submitted samples from the surrounding area for independent analysis.

The Select Committee reported that high levels of PCBs has been found in duck eggs near the plant and in grass samples—levels 50 to 100 times the background level of PCBs. That is from a plant that ReChem insists is technologically optimal; experts would say that the technology is of a kind that they would be prepared to reproduce elsewhere. However, the PCB levels are unacceptable to both the council and to the Select Committee. The Select Committee's report stated:

"we recommend that major incinerators are not in future located near residential areas."

The Minister knows Manchester and will be aware that Trafford Park is surrounded by housing that is in my constituency and those of other hon. Members. The site is yards across the canal from a major housing estate in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles. The location is certainly residential and the incinerator would fall foul of the recommendation of the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs.

The Select Committee report has a considerable bearing on the proposal. I am greatly disturbed at the role played by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution, which is the direct responsibility of the Department of the Environment. The inspectorate is the licensing authority and must license the incinerator and any other equipment that is required. To date, it has been incompetent. It placed a small advertisement in the Manchester Evening News inviting comments on the proposals. As far as I am aware, it was seen by hardly anybody. It was drawn to my attention by Trafford Park development corporation which told me that it had received a letter from the inspectorate saying that HMIP had no plans to block the proposal, subject to planning approval by the corporation.

The concern about the proposal was such that the development corporation, as the planning authority, arranged public consultation meetings. That was done at no small cost. However, the inspectorate placed just a tiny advertisement and says that there is no problem about the proposals. That shows contempt for people in the area.

The Select Committee report stated that the inspectorate is greatly understaffed. The Minister may want to comment on that. ReChem was asked:

"Would you acknowledge that the lack of inspectors working for Her Majesty's Inspector of Pollution is one of the reasons why there is something of a lack of confidence in the operation of your factory?"

Mr. Lee, the managing director of ReChem, replied:

"Yes. We would welcome as many inspections as possible. As far as we are concerned, the more inspections the better."

The report says that the inspectorate found it difficult to fill vacancies and had problems about retaining staff. In October 1989 it was 45 staff short of a complement of 240. The report states:

"HMIP therefore finds it difficult to respond quickly or effectively when incidents take place."

At public meetings held recently in Manchester, the representatives of Leigh Environmental were asked how they would respond if there were unacceptably high levels of emissions of dioxins or other chemicals from the plant. They said that nothing could be done for days. Worse still, the inspectorate does not test for such chemicals but simply accepts the results provided by the company. It is unacceptable for it to be left to the company to provide evidence about whether it is causing pollution.

I have little confidence in the work of the inspectorate. It is charged by Parliament to safeguard the public interest but the public have little confidence in the way in which it has operated so far or in the way in which it will operate in future.

Leigh Environmental says that the plant will be operated to high standards and it talks about an efficiency level of 99·999 per cent. That seems satisfactory, but even at such high efficiency levels, evidence from around the world suggests that there is still significant pollution involving chemicals such as dioxins. Dioxins are among the most deadly chemicals known to humanity. They cause cancer and produce defects in unborn children. The consequences of dioxins in the atmosphere are devastating. Even at optimum efficiency such chemicals are still produced.

If an incinerator is operated at less than maximum efficiency, the production of unacceptable byproducts increases not just a little, but astronomically. An inefficient plant is an incredibly dangerous source of pollution. Leigh Environmental has a disastrous record. I shall quote from the company's log book which records happenings at its Yorkshire site. I have picked a few examples at random. The log book is filled in by the company's operatives and they recorded on 19 January 1989:

"HMIP round, big problem smoke."

The company is anxious to make sure that the inspectorate does not catch it in default of its obligations. The log book is riddled with references to HMIP, and I am surprised that the inspectorate has done nothing to control the unacceptable operation of the plant.

On 13 March 1989, the log book recorded:

"Can you make sure you do not make any smoke in the morning as you will be watched by HMIP."

Presumably smoke is all right in the afternoon or on the previous or following days, but there must be no smoke when the inspectorate is about.

An entry on 26 April refers to the incinerator and says:

"Do you really think the plant with a BS25 jet in the aux should run without telling anyone."

I am not sure what that means. Another entry states:

"we have run at low temperature most of today".

An incinerator running at low temperature is incredibly dangerous because such low temperatures produce the dioxins that not only pollute the atmosphere but can kill people. A company that operates its incinerator in a grossly incompetent and inefficient manner is unfit to operate one in a residential area.

On 11 July 1989 the log book states:

"There is a site visit tomorrow, so can you have a tidy up in front of tank farm, please"

Once again that shows care and consideration when there is to be a visit by the inspectorate, but little control when the inspectorate is not about.

On 23 August, the log book records a visit from HMIP and states:

"HMIP unhappy housekeeping around plant, open top drums without lids, also sodium analysis."

Again the inspectorate caught the company carrying out unacceptable practices and did not take proper action. The log book lists numerous times when the plant was inadequately maintained.

On 6 April this year, one of the operatives wrote in the log book:

"It seems that nowadays safety of equipment and personnel come secondary to production."

A company which, according to its own operatives, puts the safety of its equipment and personnel secondary to production is unfit to operate a plant in a residential area.

For all the reasons that I have outlined, we are greatly disturbed about the proposals to develop the plant. I am alarmed on behalf of my family and my constituents. The proposal will put a time bomb in our midst. It threatens the environment, the quality of life and, possibly, the lives of my constituents and those of other hon. Members.

I supported the creation of the Trafford Park development corporation. One of the problems is that it was given extraordinary planning powers and, in effect, took the place of the local authority. When the corporation was given those powers, it was assumed that it would have responsibility for planning on matters that affected only Trafford Park and would not have a wider impact. It was considered that the park was an industrial area and that it was quite reasonable to give the corporation such planning powers. I have doubts about whether that was true, but for the most part the development corporation has dealt with planning applications in a way that has caused no criticism. In this case, the development corporation is not the appropriate planning authority, because the issue has wide implications for the area. The proposal is of major concern within the development area itself. Kellogg, an international manufacturer of foodstuffs, has expressed concern and doubts about the impact of the plant, and no doubt the corporation will take its views on board.

If the corporation refuses the application, as I hope it will, the company will appeal. The application will then go before the Secretary of State for the Environment. The Minister may say that ties his hands, as to the extent of the response that he can make. While I appreciate that, it is most unsatisfactory that we should be forced to fight with one hand or perhaps both hands tied behind our back. If an appeal is made, there will be a local planning inquiry, but if the corporation grants the application there will be no parallel right of appeal by the community.

I should like the Minister to say this morning that he will call in the application with a view to refusing it so that the threat to lives in my community will be scotched at this early stage. If he cannot do that, I should like him to say that the issue is of such importance that the corporation is not competent to determine the matter and that the Secretary of State will call in the application in such a way that will guarantee a local planning inquiry, at which local objectors as well as the company can make their case to the inspector, so that the matter can be properly considered.

The hon. Member for Davyhulme will demand for his constituents, as I demand for mine, that they are given maximum protection, and that includes a right to ensure that their concerns can be voiced at the highest possible level.

I am alarmed at the prospect of the incinerator, as are thousands upon thousands of people, including my constituents and those of my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East, my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles, and the hon. Member for Davyhulme. Collectively, we want the plant stopped, and we look to the Minister to protect the quality of our constituents' environment. The best way to do that is to ensure that it is not allowed to be built.

Mr. Churchill (Davyhulme): I congratulate the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) on his success in securing a debate on an issue that is important to his constituents and to mine, and I thank him for his courtesy in volunteering to allow me to share some of the precious time available to him.

I re-emphasise the deep concern and disquiet that is felt by the residents of my constituency at the prospect of two incinerators in Trafford Park that will be used to burning of toxic and other chemical and clinical waste. However, public concern extends far wider than my constituency and that of the hon. Member for Stretford, to Eccles and Salford, immediately across the Manchester ship canal, and to the entire Greater Manchester area. The issue should not be viewed by my hon. Friend the Minister and by the Government as one that affects only one or two constituencies.

Trafford Park was the first and greatest of the purpose-built industrial estates, and it remains to this day the largest industrial complex in the United Kingdom. I have been closely involved with Trafford Park for 20 years. In 1970, together with Norman Quick, who this year is high sheriff of Greater Manchester, founded the Trafford Park industrial council with the aim of ensuring the continual development and prosperity of Trafford Park as a major industrial and commercial centre, and of improving its environment.

The past 20 years have seen a vast transformation in Trafford Park's environment, especially in respect of air pollution. In 1970, Greater Manchester's death rate from bronchitis was the highest in the country bar none. A high proportion of the deaths were due to emissions from Trafford Park, but also because almost every home had a coal-burning fire. The last two decades have seen that situation change out of all recognition. It would be tragic if today, in the 1990s, we were to put at risk much of the good work that has been done over the past 20 years. No matter how efficiently the plant may operate, and no matter how free of breakdowns it might be, the level of emissions will still be considerable.

At a public meeting at Lancashire county cricket ground two or three weeks ago, the promoters of the scheme, Leigh Environmental, admitted that PCBs and dioxins would remain undestroyed. Not surprisingly, the company claimed that the level would be very low, but that factor cannot be ignored. The plant would put out a large volume of various dioxides—particularly sulphur dioxide, which is believed to be a direct cause of bronchial problems, asthma, and various other ailments.

Although the Government have a responsibility to secure the safe disposal of chemical wastes, I agree with the hon. Member for Stretford that the heartland of a conurbation of 3 million people is not the proper place for that to be done. One acknowledges the difficulties that confront the Government. There is opposition, rightly, to the dumping of toxic chemicals at sea, and it is no longer acceptable to use landfill sites to bury such waste, because it can then find its way into the water table and may subsequently contaminate water supplies. That opposition led the Government to consider incineration as the way ahead.

In view of the Government's concern about global warming, I wonder whether this is the best or the only way ahead. Above all, I query whether the middle of a residential area comprising 3 million people is the appropriate place for it. The incinerator is to be sited in Trafford Park, upwind of the conurbation of Greater Manchester, with prevailing westerly and north-westerly winds, and will have a devastating effect throughout the the area downwind of the plant, which includes the centre of Manchester and surrounding dormitory suburbs.

Local residents are not the only people to be concerned. Industry and commerce in Trafford Park feel that their interests will be blighted, none more so than food manufacturers.

One must ask, when Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution, seemingly with great and indecent haste, rubber-stamped this proposal, subject to planning permission by the development corporation, did it consider the implications for food processors in Trafford Park? Kellogg is in Trafford Park, producing cornflakes for the entire nation, and other major food processors are there. Is that a suitable place for a toxic waste incinerator, alongside major food-processing companies? My constituents certainly have the gravest doubt about it.

Will my hon. Friend the Minister inquire of the director of HMIP what consultations he has had with the chief medical officer of this country and the medical establishment about the suitability and desirability of placing incinerators in the middle of residential areas?

I agree with the hon. Member for Stretford, and I hope that Trafford borough council, which is considering the matter, will recommend that the proposal be rejected. I also hope that Trafford Park development corporation, which is the planning authority—like the hon. Gentleman, I have reservations about whether that should be the case in a matter which affects the environment and people's health—will refuse the planning permission applied for.

I hope that the Secretary of State will call in the plans because they are unacceptable as they stand. It is not merely a question of saying that we do not want this in our backyard: no one wants it in their backyard. It is not acceptable to spew toxic wastes out of chimney stacks within a few hundred yards of people's homes, schools and playgrounds.

A few years ago there was a malfunction at one of the sulphuric acid plants in Trafford Park. A big joke was made of the incident because young ladies working in office blocks on the other side of the ship canal in Salford found that their tights were disintegrating. This is a serious matter, not a laughing matter. One must wonder what effect such malfunctions and the continuing emission of wastes into the atmosphere will have.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to give my constituents some reassurance on this matter.

11.33 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Robert Atkins): I congratulate the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) on raising a matter which is of great concern to him. In his own inimitable way, my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) has spoken about the concerns of his constituents. The hon. Member for Stretford also referred to the anxiety of the hon. Member for Eccles (Miss Lestor) and the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme). They will all know that I have come to this job afresh, and while I am familar with Trafford Park as an industrial site of great significance, and with both of the Old Traffords in the area, I am not as familar with the detail of this case as I shall inevitably become. I have considerable sympathy with the points that hon. Members have raised and understand their concern.

There has been a great deal of publicity in recent times related to problems associated with the movement and disposal of various kinds of waste and that has coincided with the growing and welcome public awareness and concern over the protection of our environment. It is not surprising that in this climate of opinion proposals for large new waste incinerators tend to generate genuine apprehensions, expressed across the House this morning, among people living and working in nearby areas who fear that the quality of the air they breathe may suffer as a result.

One can readily understand the feelings of the people of Salford and Trafford who, having seen, as my hon. Friend eloquently described, all that has been done since the 1950s to clean their air of smoke and pollutants, feel that they may now be facing a new, and perhaps more harmful, if less visible, threat. It is natural that they should feel that way, and that they should seek to have that threat removed from their locality. But, as hon. Members know, a statutory framework of control exists and is being operated to protect their interests.

The operation of clinical and chemical waste incinerators of the kind being proposed by Leigh Environmental at Trafford Park is a scheduled process under the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974, and the Health and Safety (Emissions into the Atmosphere) (Amendment) Regulations 1989. The incinerators, therefore, will be required to be registered with Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution before they are permitted to operate. They will also be required to use the best practicable means to prevent the emission into the atmosphere of noxious or offensive substances and for rendering harmless any which may be emitted. This requirement will apply to discharges occurring from anywhere on the premises as well as from the chimneys. It relates to the manner in which the plant is operated as well as to the provision of systems and equipment.

Special wastes regulations will apply to materials arriving at the site as well as to solid wastes leaving it, and Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution will be consulted by the Greater Manchester waste disposal authority about the terms of the licence for the disposal of these wastes.

There is therefore in being a comprehensive system under which Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution—the national regulatory body—will apply detailed control over operations at the incinerators, should they be built. Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution is of course closely aware of what is proposed and I understand has raised no objection to the planning application.

The controls apply to the operation of the plant but its development is also subject to the normal processes of planning control. To a large extent, that is the substance of this debate. Planning controls are concerned with regulating the development and use of land in the public interest, an expression which, on the face of it, is extremely wide. In general, however, it is unnecessary and unreasonable to seek through planning control to duplicate controls that operate under separate and more specific legislation. Nevertheless, there may be occasions when the use of planning controls is justified. Local authorities were advised in the Department's circular 11 of 1981, on clean air, that "Planning permission should be refused only where the authority is satisfied that the development in question would result in a significant deterioration of local air quality even after the use of specific process to control pollution".

It is open to planning authorities to refuse permission for a particular development when that development will be registered by HMIP, provided that they are satisfied, having regard to all the material considerations, that the effect on the atmosphere is unacceptable, or that it is otherwise contrary to the public interest to allow the development to proceed.

These, then, are the control procedures operating in respect of the Trafford park incinerator proposals. The question arises whether the planning issues raised by them are such that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State should intervene and call in the planning application for his own determination. This would have the advantage, for the objectors, that if my right hon. Friend did call in the applications, he would almost certainly arrange a public inquiry into them.

The vast majority of cases which are called in have already been referred to the Department as substantial departutes from the operative development plan for the area. In the case of the incinerator proposals, I understand that Trafford park development corporation has not treated it as a departure from the plan. That is not to say that the application could not be called in, but in this situation very strong grounds for doing so would be needed.

Hon. Members are concerned that the local planning authority in this instance is an urban development corporation and not a local authority and, moreover, that the effects of the incinerators, should there be any, are more likely to be felt by people outside the corporation's area than those within it. Hon. Members have made the point that it is on the edge of the site.

It is true that the corporation has a duty to secure the regeneration of Trafford Park and therefore seek to promote investment and development there, but the corporation is also a local planning authority with the same responsibilities for controlling development as other planning authorities. It has the same duties with regard to giving publicity to applications and for consulting other authorities, and, like other planning authorities, takes into account representations made to it.

I have no doubt that Trafford Park development corporation takes these duties seriously and will take careful and full account of the understandable fears of its neighbours, and of evidence about the possible consequences of operating the incinerators. Indeed, it seems to me that a corporation in whose interest it is to promote a good image of its area, is most unlikely to give less weight to questions of the sort than other authorities.

I therefore do not consider that the fact that these applications are being considered by a development corporation, or the fact that much of the concern that it is causing arises in neighbouring areas, are in themselves issues of a nature which would justify intervention by my right hon. Friend. I see no reason to suppose that the corporation will not consider all the representations and objections made most eloquently and forcefully by the hon. Member for Stretchford and by my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme, and that it will not make a decision based on all the material considerations.

In coming to a decision, the corporation will have the benefit of the environmental statement prepared for the applicants and submitted with the planning application. In accordance with the relevant regulations, the statement has been placed on deposit with the application and has been available for public inspection since 5 April. There has, therefore, been time for other authorities and bodies to study it and to prepare cases against it. I am sure that the development corporation will consider any such cases most carefully.

On the evidence so far before the Department—I repeat those words for the benefit of the hon. Member for Stretford and my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme—on the evidence so far before the Department, I am not persuaded that a sufficient case has been made for taking the exceptional step of calling in the planning application. I understand people's fears about the proposal, but I do not think that fears alone, unsubstantiated by evidence, are sufficient to justify calling in the application. I can assure hon. Members, however, that all that has been said today, and any new evidence and representations that may emerge, will be carefully considered and appropriate action taken by me and my right hon. Friend if it is necessary to do so.

Royal Assent

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified Her Royal Assent to the following Acts and one Measure:

Appropriation Act 1990
Finance Act 1990
Government Trading Act 1990
Aviation and Maritime Security Act 1990
Representation of the People Act 1990
Marriage (Registration of Buildings) Act 1990

Mr. Gerrard Neale (Cornwall, North): I am grateful for this opportunity to raise the issue of the pollution at the Camelford water treatment works, which occurred on 6 July 1988. The matter has been given undue prominence again during the past few days and I believe that it should be debated in the House and that, on this occasion, we should try to get the facts straight.

I intend to rehearse a few of the details surrounding the incident and its immediate aftermath; to deal with certain points that arose from the Lawrence report, which was produced as a result of studying what had happened; to deal with elements of the Clayton report, which was an independent medical inquiry, to deal with certain specific issues, such as whether there has been a cover-up, whether there should be a public inquiry, the contribution of the press and the media and then to consider certain recommendations of the Clayton report.

Camelford and its immediate surrounding area is one of the most attractive parts of the west country. Hon. Members who represent the west country speak highly of our constituency environment. We are proud of it. The area around Camelford, stretching out from Port Issac, Tintagel and Boscastle is one of the prettiest areas in my constituency. In 1988, its faith in the standard of its water supply was shattered as a result of an event on 6 July. It was only during the next few days that some elements of the scale of the incident became known when people had the most extraordinary reactions when using the water in tea and coffee or for washing. Many dead fish were seen in local streams and rivers. However, at the same time, people were being assured by representatives of the water authority—this was before privatisation—that the water was perfectly safe to use and to drink. When I was in the constituency, I heard such reassurances being given on the local radio.

It has since become clear that in the middle of the following week the board of the water authority knew exactly what had happened and decided, in the interests of public confidence and not causing undue alarm, not to tell the public what had happened.

In the first week following the incident, suspicion and alarm grew. The press discovered that the incident had been caused by a lorry tipping 20 tonnes of aluminium sulphate into the wrong tank at the treatment works, thereby polluting drinking water which was entering the main system on the Lowermoor network. The Lawrence inquiry, which was set up by the water authority, reported at the beginning of August, setting out the full details of exactly what happened and why.

An appalling chapter of incidents had led to the pollution of the water supply. The inquiry reported the most desperately awful accounting between various members of the water authority dealing with the incident. It revealed gross lapses of security; the delivery lorry driver had a key to the treatment works and that key fitted every padlock on the premises; there were no signs to the various tanks so it is little wonder that the new driver visiting the site for the first time had little or no idea where to tip the chemical.

I am pleased to see my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) in his place. During the months following the incident he has shared my concern. He will recall that I was particularly outspoken at the time about the attitudes and actions of the water authority and the board. I made certain demands of the Secretary of State which were not heeded at the time.

However, exactly what happened has been made quite clear. A lorry tipped 20 tonnes of aluminium sulphate into the wrong tank, thus polluting the water supply. The water authority reacted to the inquiry's report by accepting responsibility for the incident, apologising for it, and subsequently meeting certain clear-cut claims for loss.

From August to December 1988, suspicion grew that the public were not being told the truth. One of the reasons why I was so outspoken at the time of the publication of the Lawrence report was that, because the public had not been told immediately about what had happened, subsequently they found any pronouncement about it hard to believe.

In so far as my hon. Friend the Minister and the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) have any influence on any public institutions in future, I urge them to make absolutely certain that when those institutions commit an error they are directed to publish the facts immediately, because if they do not there are the most profound effects on the local population.

Between August and December 1988 various comments were made—many without foundation. We were informed that the sludge in the bottom of the tank into which the aluminium sulphate had been poured meant that the aluminium sulphate would have entered the water supply far more quickly than had previously been thought, and that information caused alarm. It is also clear that a number of people were still complaining about feeling unwell.

I went to see the Minister's predecessor, my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman), who is now the Minister of State, Department of Transport, just before Christmas 1988. I was accompanied by Walter Roberts from Camelford whom I thank for all his efforts. We impressed upon the Minister that he should set up an independent medical inquiry, which was subsequently established under the chairmanship of Professor Barbara Clayton. It was appointed on 11 January 1989 and began its research into the problems.

Before the setting up of the inquiry, it was established that, with one exception, there was considerable scepticism among all the local general practitioners that there had been any unusual referrals of patients to them as a result of the incident. They could not detect any particular abnormalities in the referrals. Nevertheless, the panel, which included some extremely eminent people, considered the incident in great detail. Subsequently it reported that the Camelford incident had resulted in no long-term health effects. It judged that the worst possible level of aluminium contained in the water supply that could have been consumed by any of my constituents could not have led to permanent health damage.

Hon. Members who are interested in these matters will know that Professor Edwardson of Newcastle general hospital was a member of the committee. He is a renowned expert in the subject and was impressive in giving evidence at the publication of the findings. He told those present that he and a laboratory assistant had drunk a sample of the worst possible level of aluminium that could have been consumed and had suffered no ill effects. He also said that considerable work on aluminium intake had been done at Newcastle general hospital and elsewhere. Work had been carried out on renal patients who, by the nature of their problem, consume over much longer periods far higher levels of aluminium than were ever experienced in the Camelford area. Such work has shown that it takes a long time of sustained high-level intake before any material effect is registered.

After the report was published and as a result of the incidents I have described, there were people only too ready to dispute its findings, question its efficacy and challenge the reputation of those on the panel. I must tell the House and my hon. Friend the Minister that I did not join in any of that. I was happy with the way in which the report had dealt with the matter. I was further reassured because Professor Edwardson said that if I ever needed any further information from him, I could obtain it.

It has been suggested in various correspondence and by certain people affected by the incident or those seeking to help them that there has been a cover-up. As the local Member of Parliament I have sought to apply such judgment and experience as I have—at times, in scientific matters, it seems to have been far too little—to discover whether that is the case. I have come across no evidence of a cover-up, though I remind the House of the unfortunate decision made at the start when the water authority decided not to inform the public until the publication of the Lawrence report.

Ministers have always been extremely helpful. My hon. Friend the Member for Kettering, the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the new Minister have all been open and helpful. This is the first opportunity I have had to congratulate my hon. Friend on his appointment as Under-Secretary of State for Health. The health authority has done all it can to help, but it is not for the health authority to prove that certain problems relate to the Camelford incident. It is charged with the duty of looking after public health. As I have said, I have found no evidence of a cover-up and that should be placed on the record.

People have asked—and are asking again as a result of the publicity this week—for some form of judicial review or public inquiry. I hope that whenever that is put to my hon. Friend the Minister he will see to it that his officials remind him, by inserting the word "resist" on his brief, that that would not be a good idea. An enormous amount of time and effort would be taken up by a public inquiry which would tell us nothing that we do not already know. We know exactly what happened and who was responsible, because they have accepted responsibility and even paid damages. We are left with a medical problem, which we must consider.

I am a great believer in freedom of speech and certainly of the press and I have always expressed doubt when pressures have been exerted in this place to curtail it. However, I have been astonished by some of the reports in the national press and other media. They seem to accept only the evidence and opinons of certain people to prove a certain point and content themselves solely with trying to promote that point without scientific evidence to back it. Often, they do not give people who hold an opposite view the chance to contribute to articles or to give their view of statements that are made.

There has been a litany of such cases, and I shall refer to the Clayton report, the independent inquiry into the health aspects of this incident, which says in its conclusions and recommendations:

[Mr. Gerrard Neale]

"Serious anxiety about the possibilities of long-term effects has been widespread in the community. Much of the continuing anxiety is attributable to reports in newspapers, radio and television which have given prominence to alarming statements by some scientists concerning the long-term effects for which there is no adequate scientific foundation."

I can only urge those who are rightly interested in the subject to ensure that they take proper account of that and seek to advance our understanding of the medical implications of the incident rather than merely channel it in ways that appeal to some political, environmental and other interests, because that is not in the best interests of my constituents, who are trying to discover why some of them are undoubtedly ill and have been proved to be ill.

I suspect that were you, Madam Deputy Speaker, to ask hon. Members about what they had read in the press or seen on the media in the past few days, their clear impression would be that brain damage has been caused as a result of this incident. The first sentence of a press release of the Cornwall and Isles of Scilly health authority, which was issued with a recently published paper that caused the media activity in the past few days, says:

"Despite tests, no scientific proof has been produced that contaminated water two years ago affected the memory or caused major life changes for the people in the Camelford area who drank it."

The collection of papers on the Lowermoor incident which were published with the press release show nothing that links cases of illness to the incident. We must be careful about what we say.

The conclusions and recommendations of the Clayton report state:

"10. An appropriate expert organisation should be designated to provide the directors of public health with authoritative medical and toxicological advice without delay in the event of an incident. A national panel should be established comprised of independent scientists whose expertise is most likely to be relevant and who would be willing to assist the designated organisation at short notice.

11. In the event that members of the public have been exposed to chemically contaminated waste as a result of an incident, the designated organisation should advise the directors of public health of clinical tests relevant to assessment of exposure and to the diagnosis and treatment of patients."

I remind my hon. Friend the Minister that his predecessor accepted the report's findings and I should be interested to hear what steps have been taken to establish a panel. One of the complaints made by local doctors, the health authority and certain integrated parties is that they have not been able to find out from the acknowledged experts what they should do. I would not want to put any colleague through what faced north Cornwall or through the difficulty that we faced in not being able to direct people to expert information. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to take whatever steps remain to be taken to ensure that a panel is established quickly and that every director of public health is informed of its existence and how to get information about it quickly. That important adjunct to their service should be available.

The final recommendation in the Clayton report states:

"In the event that expert advice indicates a serious possibility of long-term harm, clinical surveillance and epidemiological following should be implemented."

Knowing my hon. Friend the Minister, I am certain that, unless I admit that there is a contradiction in my contribution, he will remind me of one. I have said that I have not found any evidence that has suggested to me, as a Member of Parliament who is deeply interested in this matter, any connection between the illness of certain people which has been reported and the incident on 6 July. If I find that there is such evidence, I shall do whatever I can to ensure that it is used in the right way. I have established with Professor Edwardson of the Clayton panel that the latest series of papers issued change his opinion not one jot. He remains absolutely convinced that there is no evidence of a connection.

In connection with that final recommendation of the Clayton report, I must say this. As I have admitted, in a number of cases the press and media have been gravely irresponsible in their coverage of this matter. There have been some excellent and balanced reports, but there have been reports—no doubt there will be more—that have been grossly unbalanced and have pushed a particular line. No doubt, for their own reasons, some outside this place will want to do the same. The cumulative effect on my constituents' anxiety is profound.

I concede that this is true throughout the country but people in Camelford are ill and the doctors cannot say why. Moreover, the reports that have been made and even the papers that have been issued contain comments to the effect that the authors can see no causal link but that they cannot rule out the possibility of a connection. It is to the great credit of the Cornwall and Isles of Scilly health authority that it is continuing to look at the evidence that is coming to it and to press for further research. For example, a report on pregnancy tests in the area is almost completed.

I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to accept that, although there is no such evidence, recommendation 11 should be activated for the benefit of the Cornwall and Isles of Scilly health authority and that the health authority should be encouraged—in so far as it needs any encouragement—to set up a panel of acknowledged experts on the various elements of the matter to whom it can refer and whom it can ask to research the matter. I say that simply because I do not have the conviction that this is the last time that the matter will blow up in the press and media. I think that it will happen again and again because there are too many grey areas with which it is impossible to deal. Every time that happens, it will cause anxiety and problems.

I hope that my hon. Friend will confirm that he intends not to institute a public inquiry, because that would be irrelevant and would divert too much attention away from the medical research that needs to be done. I hope that, at every possible opportunity, he will encourage the publication of the correct story and the known evidence, to reassure my constituents of the truth on every possible occasion. I hope that he will ensure that the panel to deal with incidents across the country is established quickly and made known to health authorities throughout England and Wales. I hope that he will assist the health authority in any way possible to set up its own panel to advise it.

Perhaps at the same time my hon. Friend could make it clear that, like me, he has no evidence to suggest that the water supply is now in any way unsafe and that we are talking about a historical incident. Perhaps he will make it clear that it is perfectly safe for people to live in Camelford, to consume the water and to go on holiday there and have a jolly good time. Finally, will he confirm that if, at some stage, someone finds proof and wishes to sue those responsible, either the new privatised company or the existing residuary water authority will deal with the matter?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Stephen Dorrell) rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): I take it that the Minister has the leave of the House to speak again. That is so.

Mr. Dorrell: I am grateful to the House for the opportunity to speak twice. The constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Neale) have considerable reason to be grateful to him for the effective way in which he has sought to represent their concerns and to address the real issues that arose from the incident which occurred more than two years ago.

My hon. Friend has given the background facts of the incident, so I shall not weary the House by repeating them. He has also demonstrated once again that he is the full master of the facts surrounding the incident and that he is well capable of drawing out the key issues of concern to his constituents—the public concerns arising from the incident have been real and have to be addressed—and of ensuring that substantial facts are addressed and that facts are distinguished from unfounded allegations, and, perhaps even worse, the allegations of those who have a malicious intent in using public concerns for their own short-term gains.

The real issues that arise from the Camelford incident can broadly be divided into two headings. First, there are the operational issues of a water undertaking and, secondly, there are the public health issues and the concern about whether the Camelford incident resulted in identifiable health risks for those who drank the admittedly polluted water.

As my hon. Friend said, the operational aspects were the nexus of the issues addressed by the Lawrence report, published in August 1988, which provided a clear analysis of the undoubted shortcomings that led to the incident. There were clear shortcomings of management which the report identified. The South West water authority took steps to rectify those.

My right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State for the Environment asked all water undertakings to review their management and operating procedures, their on-site security, their procedures for receiving chemicals, their monitoring of the quality of treated water and their emergency plans. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), now the Secretary of State for Employment but then the Minister responsible for water, reported to the House in April 1989 that a number of improved operational procedures had been adopted in the water industry following that review.

Therefore, the water industry can legitimately claim that it took effective action to learn the lessons of the incident and then took steps to ensure that those lessons were disseminated and that action was taken to try to minimise the risk of such an incident recurring.

Those were the management issues addressed by the Lawrence report. There was also the question of the handling of public information at the time of the incident, and I am sure that my hon. Friend was right to emphasise the necessity for any undertaker finding itself in that position to publish the facts immediately.

Any attempt by an undertaker, whether it is in the public or private sectors is irrelevant, to conceal facts operates against its own interests and, more importantly, against the public interest. To draw on an unrelated experience of mine as Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Secretary of State for Energy at the time of the Chernobyl disaster, that was precisely the case that my right hon. Friend sought to press on the Russian Government. Where there is a public health concern, it is in everyone's interests, including the undertaking's, that the facts are published immediately. That did not happen in this case and it is a cause of legitimate criticism which is accepted by the South West water authority.

It is important for us to control such criticism because, although it is true that the authority did not act as it should have acted at the time of the incident, that shortcoming was addressed within two months of the incident, and that addressing of the issue is now more than two years ago. So although there was a legitimate cause of concern at the time, it is no longer a ground for criticising the way in which any of those active or involved have operated since the publication of the Lawrence report and since the issues have been in the public arena.

However, as my hon. Friend correctly said, although the operational facts were published and were in the public domain relatively quickly—not quickly enough, but relatively quickly—after the incident, public concern continued to develop, and that led my predecessor to set up the medical inquiry under Professor Dame Barbara Clayton. That was established on 11 January 1989. That inquiry was set up to address the second nexus of issues, the public health questions, and to see whether those who drank the polluted water suffered a direct health consequence as a result of drinking it.

The committee that was set up by my predecessor had eminent membership, people who used their scientific experience to assess a specific scientific question. I agree with my hon. Friend that it is as important in assessing scientific cause and effect to insist on rigorous science as it is to insist on the availability of public information.

I believe that my predecessor, by setting up that committee and by staffing it with experts in the field, and then by insisting that Government comment on the subject, took account of the rigorous science that was produced by that committee, proceeded in the right way.

Public information must be available, but if we are talking about scientific cause and effect—about an assessment of whether the health of individuals was damaged by a particular incident—that is not a question on which a politician is qualified to comment. It is a question of medical fact. I am not a doctor, nor was my predecessor and, with respect to my hon. Friend, nor is he. We have no choice as politicians but to rely, in relation to technical and scientific questions, on the technical and scientific advice that we receive from the eminent bodies that we set up precisely for the purpose of giving us that advice.

My hon. Friend asked a series of questions. He asked whether there had been a cover-up, and I agree with the way in which he addressed that issue. As I said, everyone acknowledges that inadequate information was available in the first few weeks. I do not believe that is any longer the case. From the time of the publication of the Lawrence report, the commitment has been clear, both on operational and health questions, and that has been to ensure that the information available is made public. That has been a shared commitment by the Government, the health authority and the water authority, and any suggestion of a cover-up seems entirely misplaced.

My hon. Friend asked whether there should be a public inquiry. It is always too easy when faced with public concern to say that the only way to handle it is to set up another public inquiry. In this case, inquiries have sat and the facts—with a few exceptions to which I shall come —have been established. If the call is to set up a public inquiry, the first question to be addressed to those who espouse that call is: what will the public inquiry inquire into? I do not believe that any case can be made out for conducting a public inquiry into the operational issues arising from the incident, because there is no sphere of ignorance into which a public inquiry can inquire. The facts are known; they are in the public domain. There is no legitimate case for a public inquiry on those issues.

As to whether there is a case for a public inquiry into the medical issues, it seems at the very least highly arguable whether a public inquiry is a legitimate instrument for inquiring into medical matters. In any case, the bulk of the medical questions have already been addressed, although there are some follow-on questions arising as a result of the papers of the February seminar, which were published this week, and about which I shall say more later. There does not seem to be a case for a public inquiry into either operational or medical issues. If my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North wishes me to give an assurance that I shall not, on the facts currently available to me, establish an inquiry, I am happy to do so.

I have already referred to the document published this week, and it is important to be clear about that document. It is a publication containing papers that were presented to a seminar earlier this year to consider specific health trends following the Camelford incident. None of the papers in that document seeks to establish, or does establish, a casual link between the conditions described in the papers and the Camelford incident, but the papers pose questions that merit further examination.

The authors of many of the papers presented to the conference, while not claiming that their studies demonstrate a causal link between exposure to aluminium in water and the long-term medical conditions described in their papers, believe that some issues require further attention, particularly the serum aluminium results, which are thought interesting because they fit in with current understanding of how the body metabolises aluminium.

No clear explanation has been given and the matter could easily be worth further investigation. The issue needs confirmation and further study, as is usual with any new scientific data, especially where they conflict with established findings. The authors do not confirm that ill-health experienced by people in Camelford is due to aluminium in water or raised levels of aluminium in water, but it seems that those issues require further attention and the health authority has already said that it will set in motion the machinery for further examination of those issues.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North talked about the recommendations of the Clayton report. He rightly said that my predecessor has already committed the Government to accept that report's recommendations in full. He specifically drew my attention to recommendations 10 and 11, and asked what progress had been made on the setting up of those committees. My Department is currently completing consideration of the means to establish the organisation to provide authoritative medical and toxicological advice should any incident occur. We shall shortly be announcing the appointment of the national panel that was called for in those two recommendations. I hope that I have reassured my hon. Friend that those two recommendations, and the other recommendations of the Clayton report, will be not only accepted, but acted on by the Government.

My hon. Friend talked about recommendation 13 and asked for some more follow-up work to be done to allay the fears that still exist. The papers that were published following the seminar in February raise specific medical questions on which further medical advice is necessary, and that medical advice will be sought. Such a specific scientific question that must be addressed on a rigorous scientific basis, and not by the bandying of political and public concerns through the media. Such questions will be addressed in the laboratory and not in the television studio.

I again congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North on the way in which he has represented his contituents' concerns, and I share his commitment to ensure that it is essential that all those involved are open with information concerning public health. There is no public interest to be served by concealment. I share also——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Heyope, Knighton (Fire)

12.30 pm

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): I am extremely grateful for the opportunity to speak in an Adjournment debate on the important subject of the tyre dump fire at Heyope, Knucklas, near Knighton in my constituency. I have tried on two previous occasions to secure such a debate. People often say, "Three times for a Welshman"; on this third occasion, I have been lucky enough to bring the matter to the attention of the House. I am especially glad to see that the Under-Secretary of State for Wales is present to deal with my constituents' anxieties.

The fire was described on the front page of one of the tabloids as a "burning inferno" on the first day of the year, I suspect that the papers were short of news, but it made a dramatic headline none the less. However, it has become a forgotten fire. My objective is to give a balanced view and to come up with serious suggestions about how it can be tackled, while stressing the legitimate fears of my constituents for their community and for the precious environment in this lovely part of my native Wales.

Late in the day on Saturday 28 October 1989—ironically, one of the wettest days of the year—a fire was started at a tyre dump in Heyope. We believe that it was arson, but the police authority has yet to track down the perpetrators. That irresponsible act set light to some of the 10 million scrap tyres on the old dump, which lay in a dingle through which flowed Ffrwdwen brook. For those who are not familiar with the dingle, it is a deep wooded valley on the borders of Wales.

Twenty years previously, the dump had been started by the predecessors of the Motorway Remoulds company of Knighton, in an age when the environment was not considered in the same light as today. The tyres became a serious pollution hazard as soon as they caught light. Before, when they were inert, they were not believed to be a pollution hazard. The resulting pollutants from the burning tyres ran into the brook, and the fire and fumes polluted the air. It took the Powys fire brigade nearly 10 days to get the fire under control, and it had to seek help from the Shropshire brigade to tackle the blaze. The fire services deserve our grateful thanks for controlling the fire.

The Motorway Remoulds company is a valuable local employer, employing some 110 people in Knighton. It could be said that the company is also performing a useful service in recycling tyres by retreading them. The only problem is that as a by-product there are many waste tyres, which are dumped at Heyope in the landfill site. The old site—which is still burning some nine months after the fire started—was licensed by the local authority, the then Radnorshire county council. A new site nearby was licensed about three years ago by Radnorshire district council. That is more strictly controlled under the council's interpretation of waste management paper No. 26. Tipping takes place in compartments and the tyres are shredded.

The Select Committee on Welsh Affairs commented on tyre dumps and on the Heyope site in its recent report on toxic waste disposal in Wales. I was a member of the Committee and its main recommendation was that the waste management guidelines for disposing of tyres should become a condition of any site license. It also recommended research into recycling programmes for worn tyres. The Select Committee's recommendations are extremely sound.

During the Select Committee's study two factors emerged about the interpretation of waste management paper No. 26. They came to light in a letter from the Clerk of the Committee to the technical director of environmental services of Radnor district council, Mr. Lance Cartwright, who replied to inquiries about the Committee's interest in the fire. The Radnorshire environmental health officer said:

"The telephone call with which the principal EHO Cartwright received.

I would confirm that the above facility was licensed in accordance with our understanding of waste management paper 26."

He quotes the relevant sections of the document and says that the site is mono-disposal whereas paragraphs in the waste management paper No. 26 refer to the disposal of tyres on a co-disposal site. He goes on:

"In the light of recent events I would suggest that waste management paper 26 could be revised so as to more fully cover the situation of either mono or co-disposal sites."

Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution commented on that in a letter to the Committee on 9 March:

"Though the section on the disposal of tyres in waste management paper 26 is contained in the chapter on co-disposal, I think the opening sentence is very clear in advising against the large scale disposal of tyres, be this at mono or co-disposal sites. The fact that mono-disposal is not mentioned specifically should be read as this form of disposal being not recommended. However, I do accept that this advice against the large scale mono-disposal of tyres is not as clear as it should be. When we revise waste management paper 26 we shall take the opportunity to make clear our strong advice against the disposal of shredded tyres in other than minor quantities."

That shows that there is some confusion about waste management paper No. 26. The local authority has interpreted it in one way and Her Majesty's nspectorate of pollution has interpreted it in another. The matter must be clarified.

The pollution caused by the fire gave rise to great worry in the area. The bodies dealing with the effects of the pollution are the National Rivers Authority, Radnor district council and Motorway Remoulds Ltd. At one stage Harwell was called in. In addition, Powys fire service has played an invaluable role. The pollution has affected water courses, especially the Ffrwdwen brook, and air pollution has also been experienced. Local people are understandably worried and have formed an effective tyre fire association. They fear that the fire may flare up and that the area may have to be evacuated. There was a small outbreak on 23 June but fortunately it was extinguished.

I congratulate the NRA on its effective monitoring of pollution and its preventive action. The NRA told me that from 12.15 pm on 29 October the local pollution control officer was at the scene. The brook flows into the River Teme, and approximately 50 miles downstream, water is extracted for drinking purposes. I am informed that up to 4 million consumers in the west midlands depend on that supply. The NRA ensured that pollution did not enter the river Teme after the initial outbreak, although traces of phenol were found as far downstream as Tenbury in the first two days.

Biological deterioration has been noticed in the Ffrwdwen brook up to one mile downstream from the fire site. Peak phenol pollution reached a brief high after the intitial fire of 2,000 mg per litre, but that fell rapidly to low levels. The brook breached EC drinking water standards three times in respect of phenol concentration in the initial stages. Other chemicals present were cyanide and polyaromatic hydrocarbons, or PAHs, which are carcinogenic. At no time was the brook or the river Teme above European drinking water standards in this respect and the NRA is continuing to monitor the situation.

Radnorshire district council engaged Harwell to investigate air pollution, and a brief report was produced at a cost of £500. However, monitoring of air pollution has been inadequate, and it has not produced detailed information comparable to that available from the NRA in respect of water pollution.

Air pollution is of major concern to residents, and I hope that the Minister will be able to reassure them. They would like the site to be regularly monitored for air pollution, although I suspect that insufficient resources are available to do that adequately. No problem may be evident on a superficial examination, but the local population needs more convincing reassurances.

A small authority such as Radnorshire needs assistance because it cannot respond alone. I ask the Minister to note the recommendations of the Welsh Select Committee regarding waste disposal authorities and the need to provide resources on a larger scale, and on a regional scale in Wales. The pollution inspectorate is inadequately resourced in Wales. That was highlighted in the Welsh Select Committee's report. The Principality has only two HMIP officials and its office is moving to Bristol.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Ian Grist) indicated dissent.

Mr. Livsey: The Minister indicates otherwise, so perhaps he will put the record straight when he replies.

Motorway Remoulds deserves some sympathy. The company is trying hard to overcome its problems, but a long-term solution must be found. The priority must be to put out the fire quickly. The company is digging out some of the tyres and damping down those that are exposed and are still burning. That is a long job, and it presents hazards in terms of run-off into the local stream. It is also vital to maintain employment at the Knighton factory, which provides jobs for 110 people.

The long-term future of the dump must be examined with the ultimate objective of phasing it out. Recycling should be at the top of the agenda, and the production of rubber crumbs, and of rubber for playgrounds and for other purposes, should be investigated. The feasibility of tyre burning in power production should also be examined, although a plant would cost £38 million. However, that option would dispose of 12 million tyres annually, which is roughly half the number dumped in Britain each year. The contents of tyres are complex. Rubber now constitutes only a minor part of a tyre. Carbon black and metals of various kinds are also used.

I ask for more resources from the Welsh Office and from the tyre industry to put out the fire, even if it costs as much as £100,000 to do so.

I hope that the Minister will address the problem of resources for a small authority such as Radnor. Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution must be beefed up, with a full-time director and office in Wales at least six staff. Radnorshire district council needs more resources. I believe that the recommendations of the report of the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs need to be taken on board.

I am sure that the Minister will have studied the Department of Trade and Industry report on recycling and disposal of tyres. About 23 million tyres are dumped annually in the United Kingdom and we need a regulatory framework such as exists in other countries. For example, in West Germany there is a payment of DM 100 per tonne for dumping tyres.

The report says that historically landfill is cheap but is not now appropriate, that the United Kingdom is backward with proposals for recycling and that we need recycling legislation.

The local community is worried about a number of matters: it wants regular air tests, monitoring for health risks to children, who should be kept away from the stream, evacuation procedures, the continuation of water monitoring and monitoring of potential health risks.

The Heyope fire must be put out now. We need to maintain jobs. We need the resources to tackle environmental pollution, and to clear it up. We need weekly information to be provided to the local community so that residents know what progress is being made on the site. We also need to review landfill procedures under waste management paper No. 26 and we need to legislate.

Will the Minister promise future legislation, based on the DTI report, so that all tyres are recycled or burned, and will he now initiate a five-year programme to bring that about?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Ian Grist): I congratulate the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) on bringing this subject to the attention of the House, even at this late stage. Otherwise, I might have been tempted to remain in his constituency after my visit to the Royal Welsh show yesterday. I am rather surprised that, as a farmer, he has not been there this week. It certainly brings great credit to agriculture and, with the present fine weather, offers a marvellous scene for young and old and for those people who want to learn about the industry.

The Heyope fire is a matter of considerable concern to the hon. Gentleman's constituents and he will, I am sure, be interested to know that when the deputy chief environmental health officer of Radnorshire district council visited the site on Monday of this week, there was no sign of smoke there at all. However, the work dealing with this fire is clearly still continuing, and we hope that the contractors will be able to extinguish the remains of it before very long—that is, this summer.

The site is a waste disposal site, operated under licence from Radnorshire district council. The council, as waste disposal authority for its area, is responsible for licensing all private sector waste disposal sites, passing resolutions for any sites operated by the council, and carrying out all site inspection and enforcement duties required under part 1 of the Control of Pollution Act 1974.

Similarly, as the hon. Gentleman knows, it is the duty of the National Rivers Authority to protect surface and ground waters against pollution and to ensure that flora and fauna are protected.

The council granted a waste disposal licence to Motorway Remoulds Ltd, in 1982. The licence was granted for the disposal of scrap tyres at a site specified as Batches Dingle, Heyope, Knighton and it stipulated that the disposal of tyres at this site should be limited to 5 tonnes per day.

As waste disposal is a locally determined matter, the regulation of this service is the responsibility of the district council, and under the provisions of the Act it is the council's responsibility to take the steps needed for the purpose of ensuring that the activities to which the licence relates do not cause pollution of water, or damage to public health, or become seriously detrimental to the amenities of the locality affected by the activities.

Thirteen conditions were attached to the licence for controlling the landfill operation. Notable among these conditions were the requirements to restrict disposal activities to the disposal of tyres; that the site should be securely fenced; that the watercourse flowing through the site should be culverted and that fire fighting equipment should be provided on site to meet the requirements of the chief fire officer. A further licence condition states that the whole site shall be covered with soil to a depth of at least 9 in and the soil maintained at this depth to allow consolidation to take place.

In 1987, in agreement with the company, the council revised the conditions of the site licence to include a condition requiring the operator to tip the tyres within contained areas. The purpose of this condition was to contain the possibility of a fire outbreak to the "contained" area, but insufficient detail is contained within the licence to prescribe the nature and extent of the containment. A further condition sets out the requirement that the site access road shall be kept in a good state of repair, sufficient for the access of any fire-fighting equipment that may be called.

Following the fire, Radnorshire district council proposed further amendments to provide greater clarity about the provision of fire-proof barriers. I understand that a meeting to consider that in detail is to be held between representatives of the council, the fire authority and the National Rivers Authority on 1 August, which is next week.

The operator of the site, Motorway Remoulds Ltd., collects worn tyres from a nationwide network and transports them regularly to its factory at Knighton for reprocessing. I understand that the company's selection and test procedures reject on average about 2,000 tyres per week which are sent for disposal to the Heyope waste disposal site.

The outbreak of fire occurred ironically on 29 October last year—one of the rainest nights of last autumn, and as the hon. Gentleman said, it has been suggested that it was started deliberately, but it is impossible to tell.

The district council visits the site on a regular basis to advise where necessary both on environmental health grounds and waste disposal activities. Similarly, the National Rivers Authority is visiting the site fortnightly to ensure that risk of pollution to the stream passing through the site is minimised.

To reinforce pollution prevention activities filter units have been installed in the bed of the stream within the confines of the site to prevent oily waste from the landfill area discharging into the stream. This oily waste is collected in 45-gallon steel drums and transported off site by contractors for disposal at a suitably licensed site. Polluted water produced during fire-fighting activities is being stored and recycled on site in a closed loop system, so no polluted water is entering the stream.

Inspectors from Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution are liaising with the regulatory authorities, providing advice, where considered necessary. I assure the hon. Gentleman that HMIP covers all forms of pollution and has a staff of seven in its Cardiff office. That office will remain—it is not going over the channel. As I have said, the inspectors liaise regularly with the local authority.

The most recent visit by a member of the inspectorate took place on 16 July. As there had been a partial collapse of the sealed surface area of the site on 23 June, which had resulted in dark smoke being emitted. That had been quickly brought under control by the site contractors present on site. The fire service had attended on that occasion, but fortunately, before the fire service arrived, the fire had already been dealt with by resealing the collapsed areas with inert material stored on site. No other fire outbreak has occurred at the site since that date.

The company has engaged consultants to advise it on the most appropriate measures, and work is currently being undertaken to excavate the burning tyres, to douse them thoroughly with water, and to spread them over the stabilised area of the site to cool off. The cool material is, I understand, then reintroduced into the lower tipped area where the fire has been extinguished, and the mass of waste consolidated and resealed. I understand that the contractors are gradually working their way up the valley, excavating partially pyrolised waste, cooling it with water and repositioning it in a non-active area of the site. I understand that large clouds of steam are emitted when new areas are opened up and watered, but no polluted water is leaving the site—all water seeping from the base is filtered and recirculated. I hope that the hon. Gentleman's constituents will feel reassured by that.

Mr. Livsey: I appreciate what the Minister is saying about water pollution, but my constituents also need reassurance about air pollution. Does the Minister have any plans to do anything about that?

Mr. Grist: As I mentioned, HMIP covers various forms of pollution. The first responsibility falls on the local council, and environmental health officers are qualified to reach a preliminary conclusion on that. If the environmental health officer or the HMIP inspector who calls regularly feels that it should be examined in greater depth, I am sure that it would be, but official bodies are already in place to take care of that issue and they are better qualified than the hon. Gentleman or me to do so.

Two tracked excavators are deployed to excavate the area. The excavation and reconsolidation of the tipped material will continue until all hot zones have been treated, and I understand that most of the work may be completed towards the end of this or next month.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the possibility of water pollution, and the fact that there is a public water supply intake some 50 miles downstream of the site. There has been some pollution of streams in the immediate vicinity of the fire, as I explained in a written parliamentary reply to the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) on 5 March. The advice I have now is that there has been no significant pollution to date and that no polluted water is leaving the site.

[Mr. Grist]

The National Rivers Authority is maintaining bunds across the river where it emerges from the culvert to the tip. It is monitoring the water quality regularly and will continue to do so until such time as this particular problem has been sorted out.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned several other matters. I should draw attention to the fact that the Government have a wide variety of proposals for recycling tyres and for updating waste management paper No. 26, which was referred to in the report of the Welsh Affairs Select Committee. The Committee took the trouble to mention the reference in that waste management paper to recommended practices for the disposal of tyres. The hon. Gentleman will be reassured that the British tyre industry is also taking the matter seriously.

On the Select Committee's first recommendation, we propose to enhance the status of waste management papers so that the authorities will be obliged to take regard of their recommendations instead of merely taking note of them in carrying out their duties of licensing and enforcement.

We recognise the size of the problem created by the large numbers of tyres being disposed of annually, and have for some years been encouraging the development of effective solutions. In November 1989, the Department of Trade and Industry commissioned a major study by KPMG Peat Marwick McLintock aimed at finding economically efficient, environmentally sound and commercially viable methods for the recycling and disposal of used tyres.

As indicated in the Government's reply to the report of the Committee, the report of the study has been presented to the Department of Trade and Industry, and it is intended to discuss it in a working group representative of the interests concerned, including consumer and environmental bodies. I understand that preliminary meetings have been held already between officials and representatives of the tyre industry, motor traders and tyre retreaders.

On atmospheric pollution, the Clean Air Act 1968 states:

"dark smoke shall not be emitted from any industrial or trade premises and if, on any day, dark smoke is so emitted the occupiers of the premises and person who causes or permits the emission shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine."

That legislation has been recently strengthened by the Control of Smoke Pollution Act 1989 which enables local authorities to prosecute for illegal night-time burning—where the colour of the smoke cannot be asertained—and to take action against anyone, not just the occupier of the land, who causes or permits dark smoke to be emitted. However, the statute makes allowances for inadvertencies and we feel that that might form sufficient defence in this particular case.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the need for more recycling in general. He should remember that last year the Government established an advisory group on recycling to help identify ways sharply to improve the United Kingdom's recycling performance. The group comprises representatives of industry, trade and commerce, district and county councils and voluntary and environmental organisations as well as central Government. The group has been focusing on domestic waste and looking at the recovery and recycling of a wide range of products and materials such as glass, paper, metals, plastics, tyres, textiles and comestibles. Its recommendations will be taken into account in the preparation of the forthcoming White Paper on the environment. If the hon. Gentleman waits for that White Paper and considers what is in the Environmental Protection Bill, he will find that most cases and most of the concerns which he rightly expressed today will be taken care of in those Government publications.

This is a matter which concerns us all. The hon. Gentleman is right not merely to defend his constituents but to take an interest in something that concerns Britain and in which the European Community is taking an interest. He will be aware of the frightful fire in Canada. I am glad that his case is not as serious as that. Things are in hand and his constituents can be reassured.

Ivory

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): I am grateful for the opportunity of raising the case of the firm of H. Harris Ltd. of St. Ives. It is a sad story. The firm has been in existence since 1800 and has always been under the same ownership. Let me make it clear that the owners are not related to me.

The firm moved from the east end of London to St. Ives during the war after its premises had been bombed. Since that time, until just over a year ago, it carried on a highly successful and respected business. It might seem rather odd that at one stage the only two firms of ivory cutters in the United Kingdom were in St. Ives. The second firm was a breakaway company from H. Harris. It existed for some years but subsequently closed and its business interests were taken over by the parent company. H. Harris was on the point of expanding until just over a year ago when the basis of its business was virtually destroyed overnight.

We all know of the grave and proper concern there has been in recent times—it has been taken up by national newspapers and television—over the fate of the African elephant. We have all seen dramatic pictures on television of poachers at work carrying out their heinous, illegal trade in ivory. I am not denying that it is a big problem.

As a result of the publicity, Her Majesty's Government decided suddenly and without real warning to take unilateral, interim measures pending international action, hopefully to deal with the problem. I have considerable doubt about the ban that was imposed.

I am delighted to see the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) taking his seat, as he has played an honourable role in trying to obtain a ban and international action. As I said, I am not criticising the eagerness of the Government or environmental agencies in taking action against the serious problem of poaching.

My view, for what it is worth, is that the ban will probably succeed in driving the illegal trade underground and making it more difficult to control, while forcing out of business firms such as that in my constituency which have acted scrupulously over the years and dealt only in legal ivory. The ban fails to take account of the difference that exists in Africa over stocks of elephants. Attention has been focused properly on the Kenyan problem, but further south in Botswana there has been for many years a regulated trade in ivory and the stocks of elephants are increasing dramatically. Therefore, there has to be culling of the stocks and that has given rise to a legitimate and legal trade in ivory.

That trade has been controlled for many years through the convention on trade in endangered species. The firm in my constituency has always complied to the letter with all the requirements of CITES. It imports only legal ivory and, every time it does so, it has to undertake an elaborate certification procedure to show where the ivory came from. Exports of its finished products had to be certified.

The firm's trade is in cutting keyboards for high-quality pianos and organs. It is an old-established firm which has always been in the Harris family. Its present owners, Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd-Owen, are my constituents. Mrs. Lloyd-Owen's maiden name was Harris, and her father was made a member of the British empire in recognition of his services and of those of his firm to exports over many years.

In May last year, largely as a result of pressure from the hon. Member Newham, North-West, the then Leader of the House hinted that the Government might take interim action to deal with poaching. That surprised my constituents, because until then they had always been consulted by the Department of the Environment on various matters connected with the ivory trade—and so they should have been, because theirs was the only firm in the country involved in that aspect of the trade. They immediately contacted me and I tried to obtain further information.

Subsequently, an announcement was made by my noble Friend Lord Caithness, the then Minister for Housing, Environment and Countryside, following a visit that he paid to Kenya, that the Government felt that there should be a ban on trade in ivory and that they would take unilateral action to impose it in the United Kingdom in advance of a meeting of European Ministers on the subject and a later meeting of CITES. It was expected that CITES would move the African elephant from the appendix 2 procedure, which allowed limited trade, to appendix 1, which in effect stopped the trade in ivory of African elephants.

That came as a bombshell to that small firm in St. Ives. Its business was almost destroyed overnight and it had to lay off its sole employee, Mr. Curnow. It had been the ambition of Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd-Owen to hand their flourishing business to their daughter to maintain the family link. Their business stopped, and it is now a company in name only.

I do not criticise the Government for imposing a ban on raw ivory, although I have the reservations that I expressed. But any Government who take such drastic action without notice or consultation have a moral duty to compensate those whom they put out of business. I can understand why Governments and international bodies take drastic action in the name of conservation, but they should take account of highly respectable and law-abiding firms such as H. Harris and should compensate them if they are put out of business overnight.

I have had long correspondence and meetings with Ministers on the subject. I pay tribute to them because they have been very courteous and have responded to my letters. I had informal consultations with Lord Caithness on the eve of the important meeting of European Ministers that imposed the European ban. The fact remains that the firm has virtually disappeared.

The Government's attitude is summed up in a letter that I received in June from the Minister for the Environment and Countryside, who said that he could "find no grounds for departing from our normal practice of not paying compensation when restrictions on trade are introduced for the purpose of conserving endangered species."

Why? I understand that the Government are anxious not to create a precedent. In this environmentally conscious age, Governments usually react quickly under pressure from parliamentary colleagues and the media. Suddenly, a head of steam builds up and Ministers think that they should take sudden action for perhaps political or public relations reasons. That is their right. I referred this case to the ombudsman, who confirmed that right and said that he was sorry that he could not take up the matter. However, I believe that the Government have a moral duty in these circumstances.

[Mr. David Harris]

There is a parallel case that affects my constituency. Some bulb growers suddenly found themselves faced with a ban on the use of aldrin. I do not dispute the reason for that ban, but, again, no compensation was given. The Government should rethink their policy about implementing such overnight bans. They should consider whether compensation should be given.

I make no apology for making a special plea for H. Harris, partly because of its long, distinguished history and partly because it is the innocent victim of conservation politics and policies, both national and international. If the Government alter their stance and give compensation to that firm, I do not believe that a queue of other firms will knock at their door, because only this firm has been affected drastically.

My purpose is to make a last plea to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State and, through him, to the Government to think again about this case. There have been many consequences for Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd-Owen. They have been left with £30,000-worth of ivory. They have a building in St. Ives which is now empty. They are a few years off retirement and would normally have hoped to carry on for some years. The ban has had a considerable effect on the family. I am sad that this is the end of a firm which has operated for 190 years, and I hope that the House and the Government are sad as well. Rather than just sharing my sadness, I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will respond not just with sympathy but practically to the case of Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd-Owen, and that means compensation.

1.12 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) on securing this debate. It is characteristic of him that he should use it to put forward the worries of his constituents. I know from reading correspondence from him that he has set out the case vigorously to my hon. Friend the Member for the Environment and Countryside.

My hon. Friend has made clear the effect on H. Harris Ltd. of the imposition of the ivory ban. I have considerable sympathy with those firms or individuals who are affected by any trading bans that arise from international obligations. They are a reminder that environmental protection and nature conservation have consequences for trade and industry. They should be taken into account, and in this case were. I reassure my hon. Friend that we would not have contemplated such a ban unless we were convinced that it was necessary for conservation reasons.

The House will recall that the Government were among the first to recognise the seriousness of the threat to the African elephant posed by poaching and by pressure from human populations. We have been in the forefront of moves to ensure the survival of the African elephant and, I hope, its ultimate recovery. The main instrument through which these efforts are focused is the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of wild fauna and flora, for which, mercifully, there is an acronym—CITES. We were one of the first countries to sign the convention and since its inception we have played a major part in strengthening and improving it.

My hon. Friend will have followed, through his other parliamentary duties, the gradual strengthening of the conservation of the African elephant—in particular, its move from appendix 3 of the convention up to appendix 1. The African elephant was first listed on appendix 3 of the convention in 1976 so that trade could be monitored. In 1977, it was moved to appendix 2 and commercial trade could then be permitted only if it did not pose a threat to the survival of the species. Sadly, despite a tightening of controls in 1985, the number of elephants continued to decline, chiefly because of the activities of ruthless, determined and well-organised poachers. The elephants' number fell as low as 600,000. That may sound a lot of elephants but Africa is a very large continent and the number of elephants had greatly exceeded that in previous times.

On 29 May 1989, Lord Caithness announced the Government's intention to support proposals to list the species on appendix 1 of the convention, thus effectively banning commercial trade in ivory. At the same time, there was the agreement in principle to a ban on imports of ivory into the European Community under the stricter controls already in force within the Community.

On 9 June—while the arrangements for the ban were being made—the Government introduced a unilateral ban on imports of ivory into the United Kingdom, as provided for by the existing European regulations. That was followed by a European regulation imposing a Communitywide ban which came into force on 17 August last year.

As the House will know, the whole question of the conservation of the African elephant and the proposed appendix 1 listing was fully discussed at the seventh meeting of the conference of the parties to CITES held in Lausanne in October last year. It was a long and difficult negotiation but the conference decided to list the African elephant on appendix 1 of the convention and to ban trade until the conference of the parties decided that trade in particular elephant populations can be resumed without threatening the survival of the species.

Another very difficult and sensitive issue considered at the conference was a proposal to allow trade to continue in stocks of ivory accumulated before the decision to transfer the species to appendix 1. That was of considerable interest to the United Kingdom as it affected Hong Kong.

As my hon. Friend knows, Hong Kong has been a major traditional ivory trading centre for many years and it was estimated that 3,000 local people depended on the ivory trade for their livelihoods. The Hong Kong authorities had reaffirmed their commitment to complying with the ban, but they were understandably concerned about the need to allow some time for their ivory traders to dispose of their stocks. For this reason, the authorities approached the British Government and asked to register a temporary reservation against the appendix 1 listing on their behalf.

The Government considered that request carefully and supported it. The effect of the temporary six-month reservation that resulted was that during the period that it remained in force, Hong Kong could export its existing ivory stocks to CITES parties which had entered appropriate reservations, or to non-CITES states. The reservation was the best way of meeting the Government's responsibilities to a dependent territory without compromising our support for measures to conserve the African elephant.

Mr. Harris: Does my hon. Friend agree that an arrangement similar to that made for the 3,000 people in Hong Kong should have been made for the three people in St. Ives who were involved in the trade? At least that would have given them a period in which to adjust. One of the great problems that they have faced has been the lack of information, from, I am sorry to say, the Department of the Environment on where they stood.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I recognise that British ivory traders may feel that they have been treated unfairly in comparison with those in Hong Kong. I am not unsympathetic to the problems that the ban has caused, but I must make it clear that our unilateral ban on ivory imports was introduced under existing European controls, which require us to refuse imports when we consider that they would have a harmful effect on the conservation of the species.

We were concerned that, unless such urgent action was taken, poachers and others involved in the illicit trade would intensify their activities in the months before international action could be agreed at the CITES conference. A dispensation for United Kingdom traders on the lines of the Hong Kong reservation would not have been possible under the European controls.

I fully understand why my hon. Friend's constituents would have welcomed prior notice of our intention to act in that way, but it would not have been fair to alert a single trader without issuing a general warning and that would have been an open invitation to poachers to step up their activities in the intervening weeks or months. I hope that my hon. Friend will understand why it is not our policy to advertise our intention to introduce restrictions of that kind, as that could undermine the effectiveness of stricter controls.

The Government are conscious of the effect that their interim measures have had on the businesses in my hon. Friend's constituency. However, I repeat that controls on the African elephant have been increasing steadily since 1976. Our unilateral ban on ivory imports was introduced under existing controls which had been in force since 1984, and there have been many previous instances in which import restrictions for other species—for example, cockatoos and grey parrots—have been introduced under the EC CITES regulations.

It has not been our practice to pay compensation when restrictions on trade are introduced for the purpose of conserving endangered species, so although I sympathise with my hon. Friend's constituents, I regret that I can find no grounds for making an exception in this case. As I have already said, his case is illustrative of the costs involved in conservation efforts.

However, I hope that I can offer some consolation to my hon. Friend and his constituents. As he may know, the European Commission has said that the movement and sale within the Community of ivory legally acquired before 18 January 1990, when the international ban on ivory came into force, may be allowed. I am pleased to say that my Department has recently given formal consent to the sale of various pieces of ivory in the possession of my hon. Friend's constituents and they will therefore now be allowed to dispose of those stocks within the EC.

Mr. Harris: I understand that only four licences have been given. I gather that there are technical problems which mean that the whole stock is not covered by those four licences. I do not expect an answer now, but will my hon. Friend consider that so that sufficient licences can be given to enable the firm to dispose legally of its stock, although one has to accept that, as the bottom has fallen out of the market, it probably will not get anything like its value?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I undertake to do that. I was not suggesting that the whole stock—my hon. Friend referred to £30,000 in his introductory remarks—was to be disposed of under existing or new licensing arrangements. If, in the future, some additional licences can be granted, I shall ensure that that is processed as fast as possible.

I appreciate the points that my hon. Friend made. I am sorry to disappoint him in some respects, but I can at least assure him that disposal in the European Community, in so far as it is agreed internationally, may bring some relief to the business concerned.

My hon. Friend and his constituents will be pleased to hear that there are indications that the ban on the trade in ivory is proving effective in the war against ivory poachers. It may not bring much comfort to the business concerned, but I hope that, should the situation in Africa continue to improve, it may be possible in the not-too-distant future to allow the ivory ban to be lifted in some respects. If that happens and it can be done while preserving the population of African elephants, it may prove possible for the business in question to be rescued and possibly to grow in future.

Lomé Convention

Mr. John P. Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): I am delighted to have a second opportunity this week to draw the attention of the House to problems associated with the Lomé protocol after 1992. I shall discuss some of the details of what I think the effect could be on the British fruit trade in general and on the banana trade in particular. I shall then make some suggestions—I hope that the Government still have an open mind on the subject—about what we should be doing now to ensure that we not only protect our trade and industries but protect the interests of countries with which we trade and have traded for a long time.

In the Lomé protocol, which regulates the trade between the European Community and Afro-Caribbean and Pacific countries, there are a number of mechanisms under the banana protocol that ensures that preferential trading relationships exist with our historic trading partners. About 50 per cent. of all the bananas that come into European Community countries come from dollar fruit countries primarily in southern and central America. About 30 per cent. is home produced in southern European countries and about 20 per cent. comes from ACP countries.

Nearly all the bananas that come to the United Kingdom come from Jamaica and the Windward Islands through two major companies, Geest, which trades from my constituency at the port of Barry, and Fyffe. We in Britain, being the second largest consumers of bananas in the EC, consume 300,000 tonnes of bananas a year. Everybody will be delighted to hear that. It works out at about one banana per person per week. I hope that that rate of consumption continues and that we will continue to eat Caribbean bananas, because we shall thereby support not only British industry but our former colonies in the area.

I am delighted to say that the Prime Minister gave a categorical commitment in Jamaica in 1987 to do everything possible to protect our trading relationship. She said:

"We shall continue to fight hard in the European Community to . . . make sure that Jamaica and other Caribbean countries go on enjoying the preferential arrangements for . . . bananas under the Lome Convention."

Lomé IV protects the ACP countries and states that no country should be worse off under any arrangement reached in the EC than they are at present.

I was delighted when, on Monday, the Lord President of the Council gave a commitment and stressed the importance of protecting those markets. He said:

"The Community is fully aware of its commitments to the traditional suppliers under the Lomé convention. We consider strongly that these should be taken fully into account, together with other factors, in drawing up future arrangements for banana imports after 1992."—[Official Report, 23 July 1990; Vol. 177, c. 105.]

That was a fairly strong commitment. But the problem is that the Government produced a discussion document this March that was circulated to other member states in the EC, ACP countries and interested parties and which will, if it is deployed, have the opposite effect.

While we welcome the suggestion in the discussion paper of continuing quotas after 1992 for banana imports from our traditional trading partners—for us, Jamaica and the Windward Islands, and for France and the southern European countries, west Africa, Somalia, the Canaries; by and large, former colonies—the problem is that under the price mechanism proposed in the discussion document, it will have precisely the opposite effect. The British Government are saying that they will give equal access to Caribbean countries to the existing dollar fruit share of the market—the 50 per cent. to which I referred —which goes largely to northern European countries and Germany. We must consider the implications of that and we should bear in mind the fact that the Germans are far and away the single largest consumers of bananas.

If those Caribbean countries are forced to compete on an equal basis, there is no question but that dollar bananas from central and southern America will swamp not only other European markets, but Britain. The reasons for that are fairly well established. The banana plantations in central and southern America are vast and situated on plains. They are run by large, multinational corporations and survive on extremely cheap, exploited labour. The House will be horrified to hear that in the last wage negotiations in Colombia between the plantation labourers and owners, no fewer than 200 plantation labourers were murdered during the process of negotiating their wages. That sort of incident, as well as other disturbing events, happens in that part of the world, compared to the Caribbean, where a collection of small producers produce bananas in difficult circumstances—the plantations tend to be on hillsides.

The banana is an attractive crop. It is the mainstay crop for most of the Windward Islands and represents 70 per cent. of St. Lucia's entire exports. It is a useful crop because, if it is destroyed by the weather, particularly the hurricanes that are experienced in that part of the world, it can be replanted and grown within nine months—a relatively short period.

The process for negotiating prices and payment with the Geest company in the Windward Islands—St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Dominica and Grenada—is democratic. The growers from those islands meet Geest to discuss the rates and reach a settlement on payment in that district. The opposite applies to central and southern America. It is clear that the Caribbean will find it difficult to compete equally with Colombia and other countries. We should take steps either to continue to protect those markets or —and this is possibly the best course—to ensure a lengthy transitional period to allow those countries to adapt to other products, and to allow industries in this country to diversify production; as I have explained, I have a clear constituency interest. If we do not do that, the consequences may be devastating.

I am delighted by the effort being made by the British retailer Marks and Spencer. It has an experimental station in the Windward Islands to examine the development of tropical fruit, which has become a much more popular food lately. I know of an example dear to your heart, Mr. Deputy Speaker: the kiwi fruit, which a few years ago was hardly available in this country, is now a regular part of our diet and can be bought from most supermarket shelves.

If we were swamped with dollar fruit, the consequences would be devastating. In the port of Barry in my constituency, which imports over 70 per cent. of all the bananas that come into this country from the Caribbean, the undermining or even loss of that trade would result in huge job losses. That would be a tragedy for the local work force and the local economy and would affect the long-standing relationship between Geest and Barry. I know from the comments made by the Lord President of the Council on Monday that that relationship is also dear to his heart. He spoke of his recollections of seeing the banana boats sailing out of the port of Barry when he was a child. I am sure that the Government do not want such a tragedy to happen, and will be prepared to do something to prevent it from happening.

We should praise the dock workers in the port of Barry, who have had a tremendous relationship with the Geest company for many years, and also have a tremendous industrial relations record. They are some of the most skilled dock workers in the country. Since the abolition of the dock labour scheme earlier this year, they have formed a successful co-operative—Barry Stevedores Ltd.—which is now handling the banana cargoes. The Geest company has a contract with Associated British Ports, which lasts until 1994. Then it must renegotiate the leases and the contracts to bring the bananas in, which of course involves the stevedores.

The danger is that, in the run-up to the renegotiation of that contract, the Government are not able to guarantee the market in the Caribbean. We could lose Geest once again. We lost it for a short time a few years ago, when it was attracted by better port facilities and better deals across the channel in Avon. However, I am delighted to say that did not last long, and it was soon back in Barry, because it knew that it was on to a good thing relying on our dock workers and the Barry community.

There could also be an effect in other constituencies from which the two major companies—Geest and Fyffe—operate, which could substantially diminish their operations and have consequences for jobs and the local economics. However, that is nothing compared with the effect that it would have on the Caribbean. Those countries are almost totally dependent on the one product—bananas. That is partly because of the devastating effect on their sugar industry some years ago, which also arose from our trading relationship with the rest of the European Community. In some cases that forced them to rely on bananas. If they lost that their economies could be devastated.

The Geest company provides vital communication and social links with the islands and those links would be lost if the company were forced to look elsewhere in central southern America for its products. My local Vale of Glamorgan borough council elected to sell to St. Lucia at a nominal price two second-hand dust carts. That may not mean much to hon. Members, but to the people of St. Lucia the dust carts were vital in keeping their island clean. The skilled dock workers in Barry packed the trucks into the hold of a ship that normally carried bananas. A range of items are shipped in that way at low cost to support those island communities. That facility could be lost.

It is in our own interests to support the industry, but we also have a moral obligation to our former colonies from whom we have done so well over the years. It would be a tragedy if the people in those former colonies were allowed to suffer. The end of the trade would also have an impact on the British shipbuilding industry, because some companies may be reluctant to order new ships if they are uncertain about the situation in 1993. That could affect other parts of the country. The drastic cut in British shipping over the past 10 years has worried all hon. Members.

If we remove the sole source of income of these islands, there is a danger of illicit drugs being produced. Such drugs could be grown in that part of the world and their production might attract the relatively poor banana growers. My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) is worried about any substantial increase in banana boats coming to Britain from Colombia, a country which is notorious for drugs and drug barons. My hon. Friend tells me that some Colombian banana boats docking at his port have carried substantial quantities of cocaine. In some cases the cocaine was more valuable than the banana cargoes. The drugs can be seized and taken away, but the ships cannot be impounded because the Government could be held liable for the value of the cargo. That is a separate issue, but I am sure that it worries hon. Members.

What are our responsibilities and what should we do? We have produced a discussion paper and, in line with the traditional British character, we have said that we should play by the rules and head towards an open market. As long as it serves the interests of the consumers and meets our international obligations, we all agree in principle with the open market. The Government's proposals are ideal for the Germans. They are the biggest consumers of bananas and their primary source is dollar fruit. They would be happy to see the ACP share of the market collapse. France and other southern European countries are already taking steps to protect their interests.

It is incumbent upon the Government to be in the game of protecting our great British companies and our existing trade. I do not suggest that that can be done indefinitely, but transitional arrangements should be made. The countries affected and our industries should have an opportunity to diversify into other products and activities. We must ensure that in the short term we do not suffer again because we are not prepared to take the action that the Germans and French are prepared to pursue in Europe, to ensure that their industries, employers, historic trading links and commitments are protected. I ask for no more, and for no less, for the British.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): I congratulate the hon. Member for the Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith) on managing to debate the banana situation for the second time in a week, which must be a record. That shows how concerned the hon. Gentleman is about the trade in the West Indies and about his own port and workers.

Nineteen ninety-two and the single market process will bring widespread benefits, and perhaps the hon. Gentleman was a little unfair not to point that out. Not only the Community stands to gain from an open market. The door of opportunity will open further for our trading partners. That includes our partners in the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries of the Lomé convention. Freer and increased trade will mean more prosperity and more freedom. The removal of internal barriers and greater economic dynamism within the Community will provide greater access for developing country exporters—not less.

Nineteen ninety-two does not mean that Europe has in any way turned its back on the developing countries, but the very opposite. We stand by our commitment to the developing world. It will march side by side with changes in the Community and with the events in eastern and central Europe, which will also provide new markets for the specific Caribbean products in question. Nineteen ninety-two represents an opportunity, not a threat.

There is no fortress Europe, and there will not be one. Such a thing would be in no one's interest. We are committed to making 1992 a force for liberalisation. The strength of our commitment to our Lomé partners is reflected in the fourth Lomé convention, which we expect to come into force early next year, and in whose final negotiations I played a large part. The new European development fund is nearly 50 per cent. larger than its predecessor, and the United Kingdom's contribution to it, at about £1·3 billion, is our largest ever single aid commitment.

The new convention provides further improvements to what were already liberal trade and access provisions in respect of both the industrial and agricultural products of the ACP countries. For example, further concessions have been made on the few agricultural products that are still subject to some form of restriction, by a combination of reducing or dismantling tariffs while increasing or abolishing quotas. Improvements have also been made in the important area of rules of origin.

All that means that the Lomé convention is already providing for 1992 in a number of respects, allowing our Lomé partners to take advantage of faster economic growth and the increased demand anticipated within the Community as a consequence of the single market. It will be far easier for importers to meet the single standard, with one almost certainly in place in one or more member states, than to address to a whole range of diverse requirements, which was the situation until we really made progress with the single market. So that in turn will mean economies of scale for producers, whether of industrial or of agricultural products.

I shall mention some of the single market initiatives before I come to bananas, about which the hon. Gentleman is so rightly concerned. To ensure that the developing world benefits fully from single market initiatives, Britain will continue to press our Community partners for greater openness in trading. In particular we are encouraging a constructive Community contribution to ensure the success of the GATT Uruguay round, which will be of great benefit to the developing countries.

Obviously, the move towards the single market will bring changes, but, where these are in sensitive areas, they must be carefully managed. We realise—and have always realised—that this is particularly true of bananas.

I am grateful for the opportunity to explain to the House in a little more detail than the Lord President did on Monday this week what we are doing to protect our traditional Caribbean suppliers of bananas. The latest Lomé convention again contains a protocol on bananas which enshrines the EC's commitment to traditional African, Caribbean and Pacific suppliers of bananas. We fought hard and successfully to renew the protection which that protocol provided to our traditional suppliers. Annexed to the convention we now have a joint declaration between Community and the ACP states which recognises the fact that the Community will try to establish common rules for bananas post-1992 but in full consultation with the ACP—which is the matter about which the hon. Gentleman is so concerned.

The United Kingdom remains committed to fighting to maintain effective preferential access arrangements for Caribbean bananas to the Community market, which are consistent with our Lomé obligations. As the hon. Gentleman has rightly pointed out, the Prime Minister has made this undertaking many times. As recently as the end of April this year, my right hon. Friend wrote to the Prime Ministers of our Caribbean banana growers:

"We defended your interests resolutely in the Lomé renegotiations and shall continue to fight hard to make sure that you go on enjoying the preferential arrangements for bananas under the Lomé Convention."

I acknowledge the hon. Gentleman's particular interest and concern in this issue but it arises from the fact that all our Windward's bananas come into the United Kingdom through the port of Barry in his constituency.

At present, the United Kingdom market is kept separate from the remainder of the European Community. ACP and EC bananas have free access to the United Kingdom. Other bananas, such as those from Latin America, are subject to import licensing.

A single market in bananas, which the ACP has accepted in principle in the Lomé convention, is necessary essentially because such internal Community barriers have to be removed from 1993 onwards. The current national arrangements will therefore no longer be enforceable. We have to devise common arrangements for bananas, and we have to strike a balance between a number of priorities in doing so. They are commitments to Community and ACP producers—the preferential suppliers; consumer interests; trade and competition policy: objectives in the GATT round; and, budgetary restraint.

The difficulties of reconciling the various objectives cannot be underestimated. After all, the Commission has been trying for about three years to come up with a proposal to bridge that gap, and has not yet done so. That was why we felt it worth while to get the debate going. So we circulated a discussion document, but it was only a contribution to the debate in the Community, because it is for the Commission to table a proposal.

As the hon. Gentleman well understands, it will take us some time to resolve this issue. The United Kingdom idea for a dollar quota would meet conflicting objectives better than any other suggestion so far, and would protect our traditional suppliers, whom we are pledged to protect. I do not think that we shall have the problems about which the hon. Gentleman has been worrying, although I respect his right to refer to those concerns in the House, as he has done twice this week. We shall provide for possible aid over a transitional period. That may be the way to proceed, but it has not yet been decided and all suggestions are therefore welcome.

At this point, perhaps I could reassure the hon. Gentleman about the position on tariffs. The current arrangements for EC trade in bananas include a GATT-bound 20 per cent. tariff on imports from what is known as the dollar area—central and south America—but not on imports from Lomé countries, which come in tariff-free. The way in which other countries will view the mechanisms that might be erected to ensure protection is not yet clear. However, we envisage that a tariff advantage will be maintained. We are not likely to be facing the prospect of a uniform tariff on ACP and dollar bananas.

The hon. Gentleman was right to say that the United Kingdom is not alone in the Community in having its own traditional suppliers to protect. It is true that other countries will seek to protect their traditional suppliers. Cameroon and the Ivory Coast supply France, while Spain imports from the Canary islands and Madeira supplies Portugal. All those sources of bananas face considerably higher production costs than the producers of dollar fruit.

In contrast, the Commission has to cater also for the needs of Germany and the Netherlands, the first of which the hon. Gentleman mentioned. Their customers are used to paying lower retail prices than those in countries with protected, higher-priced markets. The common arrangements for post-1992 trade in bananas will have to offer something to everyone if they are to command the support of a majority of member states.

We await the Commission's proposals, which should be tabled in the autumn. We shall then consider the proposals against the need to balance out the different and important objectives.

Our objective is to safeguard continuing preferential access for the Windwards and Jamaican suppliers after 1992. We want to build a framework within which they can assure the long-term futures of their banana industry. We remain in close touch with the Caribbean Governments and representatives of producers and importers about ways of achieving this.

Undoubtedly, the single market will bring with it many challenges, but it also provides tremendous opportunities. I have talked with some of the Caribbean producers and their leaders about the way in which they may benefit from the single market and enjoy the benefits of the wider market with easier access and a lack of barriers. I believe that, if they continue to work at the problems that they currently face in terms of quality and productivity, great gains can be made.

Although the Government will continue to support the Caribbean producers in the way that I have described, their success post-1992 in trade in bananas depends in no small measure on the producers' own efforts to overcome the severe quality problems at certain times of the year, which can make their bananas difficult to market. We understand that, and are seeking to help.

However, it is right that they should be encouraged —I have been encouraging them in my meetings with them —to diversify and to rely on products other than bananas. The Government have a long-standing programme to assist diversification into other edible crops in the Caribbean. We would hate to see any country start to produce coca or any other drug substance. That is not what we are in business for—we are in business to ensure that such countries have viable produce to sell on the open market as well as to offer access to our markets.

The hon. Gentleman might like to know that over the past 15 years or so we have committed over £4 million of our bilateral aid to assist in diversification with around £2 million committed to current projects. That is a measure of how seriously the need we are addressing the issue of diversification from bananas in the region.

In conclusion, it is too early to predict in detail the precise benefits that 1992 will bring individual countries. Although two thirds of the single market measures have now been agreed by the Council, many decisions have yet to be taken. Many measures will not come into force before the end of 1992. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we shall continue to encourage progress towards completion of a market and we shall maintain our vigilance to ensure that it remains open and liberal and has the right solutions for the banana producers. It is an opportunity, not a threat. I urge our Lomé partners to rise to the challenge because those who grasp the opportunity will reap the rewards.

Eastern Europe

Dr. Mike Woodcock (Ellesmere Port and Neston): I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me to speak in one of the last debates in the parliamentary Session. I am equally grateful to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development for being here with so few of us to see the sun set on the Session.

Perhaps it is fitting that one of the last debates should be about the momentous events that have unfolded in eastern Europe. I wish to speak on the methods by which we can assist enterprises in the emerging democracies in eastern Europe and to suggest how some initiatives, particularly on the know-how funds, can be geared to management training, especially that which is concerned with the values of free enterprise. Those values are not easy to define, but a definition is possible.

My personal interest in eastern Europe was aroused some three years ago when a book that I had co-authored was published in Hungary. It was essentially about management in western economies. It seemed to me that if a book written by a Conservative Member of Parliament —and a fairly dry one at that—was being used to train managers in a communist country, something fairly fundamental was happening.

I do not know whether anyone could have predicted the pace of change since then in eastern Europe, but by the late 1980s it was becoming apparent that the Soviet bloc could never really compete with the west. At last, fundamental Marxism was being seen as illogical when viewed against the facts of human behaviour and organisational success. Change was becoming irreversible and was spilling over from one country to another. People were no longer willing to accept the low standards of living that they had had to endure; they were no longer willing for their economies to be geared to meeting the needs of the Soviet Union. The rosy dream of state socialism had turned into a real-life disaster.

Thankfully, pragmatism is now replacing ideology. The transition to free-market economies will be painful in eastern Europe, but there is no alternative. The sooner that people in eastern Europe accept that pain, the sooner they will be able to reap the benefits. The degree of pain will differ from country to country.

Hungary is now trying to model its economy on western lines. It has a per capita income of only 55 per cent. of the EC average; it has an immense foreign debt. But it is well on the way to democracy. It is well placed to achieve commercial success.

Czechoslovakia has an average per capita income of 70 per cent. of the EC average. The recent elections there assure moves towards a free market. Czechoslovakia was once one of the world's leading industrial countries, and one of the world's richest countries with a long entrepreneurial tradition. It now has few products that can compete in world markets. It was the first country to manufacture motor cars, but now its industry is a shadow of its former self. In true socialist tradition, industry in that country has been bled to provide short-term production at the expense of long-term investment. But Czechoslovakia is also reasonably well placed to achieve success.

Perhaps the best chance of success is held by East Germany because of its links with the Federal Republic. It already has a per capita income of 75 per cent. of the EC average. It has the advantages of a pool of well-trained workers and massive investment from West Germany.

By contrast, Romania has a per capita income of only 35 per cent. of the EC average. It was once one of the richest agricultural countries in the world, but it is now dependent on food aid from the west. However, the problems there were not so much the problems of Communism but the problems of a feudal tyranny where truth simply did not exist and where the economy was based on lies and pretences. It now has a massive foreign debt, and the task that lies ahead is daunting.

Bulgaria has an income of 45 per cent. of the EEC average. Foreign trade there is still dominated by the Soviet Union, but it is taking tentative steps towards a free market economy.

Poland has an income of 40 per cent. of the EEC average. There, as we all know, the Communist party has been disbanded. There are bold moves towards a free market. Unprofitable enterprises are being closed, job security is being abandoned, monopolies are being abolished and privatisation is being vigorously pursued. Shock therapy in Poland is being applied to the results of state socialism. It is perhaps the bravest of all east European countries.

By contrast, Yugoslavia has an income of 45 per cent. of the EC average. It has traditionally had a much more liberal political regime. Over the years it has tried to pursue a halfway house. It has had free competition based on joint ownership of the means of production. However, it has been no more successful than its neighbours. Socialism in yet another form has failed and great changes are needed.

It is probably within the Soviet Union that the greatest problem lies. President Gorbachev knows that, in reality, there is no alternative but to introduce a free-market economy. His problem is in persuading the Soviet people of the short-term sacrifices that will be necessary. He was rightly credited with creating many of the opportunities for change in eastern Europe, but they came from a realisation on his part that the Soviet Union had no alternative but to withdraw from eastern Europe. He has a massive job to do. He said that even after many years of tried reforms Soviet workers continue to pretend to work and the state continues to pretend to pay them.

We hear a great deal about the level of financial support that will be needed from the west for eastern European countries. It is clear that private sector investment, particularly in newly emerging private companies, will be essential. However, money alone is not the answer, and nor is the straightforward transfer of technology. As Abraham Lincoln said, one cannot help people permanently by doing for them those things which they ought best to do for themselves. We in the west have to help them to facilitate change.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) is well known for his views on eastern Europe. He has listed some of the things that he believes that east European countries have to do. He said that they must be serious about private property, reform the food supply system, achieve stable banking and monetary control, and institute massive privatisation. I agree with all those things. However, none of them will be possible without the right management skills.

The privatisation process in those countries is a colossal task compared with the privatisation programme carried out by this Government over the past decade. It needs a new breed of manager. Managers must understand free-market systems. It needs individuals and organisations which are free to take their own financial decisions; and, above all, it needs entrepreneurial attitudes and activity. The transition from command economies to demand economies will not be possible without the right attitudes, and that must mean management training on a gigantic scale.

I want to suggest seven preconditions for management training to be successful. First, it must be easily understood. Most managers in eastern Europe lack the depth of education and training that most western managers have. Secondly, it has to be non-bureaucratic. Managers in the eastern bloc have had bureaucracy and they want no more of it. Thirdly, it must be practical. It must be in a form that can be readily applied in organisations in eastern Europe.

Fourthly, it must be experiential. There is not the time or resources available to train managers in a formal sense. The training has to be largely on the job. In any event, experiential learning is much more cost-effective and achieves a much better transfer between learning and organisational change than formal education and training. Fifthly, it must impact on as many levels of organisations as possible. Seeding will be vital at all levels of organisations.

Sixthly, it must be geared to market economics. History shows that free-market systems usually bring freedom and prosperity while planned economies generally fail. Finally, it must be based on entrepreneurial values. Eastern Europe needs managers who are risk taking, pioneering and have the capacity to seize opportunities. The fundamental task is to develop managers who hold values consistent with the free market and who have the competence to steer organisations through the turbulent waters that lie ahead.

The values of capitalism are different from the values of communism and socialism. What are the values of capitalism, and what values will managers in the east need if they are to be successful? I believe that four major and fundamental tasks lie ahead of them. First, they must re-establish the proper role of management, and in doing so they must address three issues. They must address the issue of power, because in demand economies only managers can manage. The state must let go of the management process and managers must take charge of the destiny of their organisations They must address the issue of elitism.

In successful economies, management's role must be seen as vital. Organisations in the east need to understand the importance of getting the most able people into management and of continuously developing their competence. As they rid themselves of political elites, it may be hard for them to understand that, in some senses, they must create managerial elites. They must address the issue of awards. Organisations succeed because they identify what constitutes success and rewards it. Successful managers must earn more than unsuccessful managers. There is an old saying that organisations that pay peanuts get monkeys, and there is no room for monkeys in management.

The second major consideration of organisations in the east is taking charge of the task. In any organisation, results count, and in eastern Europe the system has often overshadowed the task. Bureaucracy and false assumptions have generally inhibited accomplishment. They must address issues such as effectiveness. Market-led organisations must set their own objectives and focus on the right issues. They must also address the issue of efficiency. It is not enough to focus effort on the right things; resources must be used efficiently.

Eastern European organisations have been characterised by an inefficient use of resources and they must address the issue of accountability. The principle of the profit and loss account gives commercial organisations their ultimate measure of success. Everything costs money and someone somewhere must pay. As Milton Friedman says, there is "no such thing as a free lunch."

The third major task that organisations in the east must undertake is to establish effective relationships within their organisations. Organisations are essentially about people, and without commitment no task gets done. They must address the issue of concern. Management, by its actions, greatly affects people's lives inside and outside the workplace. Experienced managers in the east need to use power with compassion and to build trust and commitment. They must address the issue of synergy, because well organised and motivated groups can achieve much more than the sum of the individuals who comprise them. Successful organisations must derive the benefits of team work, and they must address the issue of justice. Every community must have a framework of laws that regulate conduct, and successful organisations must develop such a system. That will not be easy in countries that do not yet have justice at national level.

The fourth major task they must address is external relationships, by which I mean relationships with the free market. Organisations in eastern Europe, which have lived in command rather than demand economies, have not yet faced up to the real world. They must address the issue of threat because in every commercial organisation talented people are planning how to expand their business at the expense of the competition. They must address the issue of competitiveness because that is the only sure-fire recipe for survival. In the world of free markets, the fittest survive and the weakest go to the wall. They must address the issue of opportunity, because, despite the most brilliant planning, it is inevitable that the unexpected threat and the unexpected opportunity will occur. As most Ministers and Governments will be able to testify, no one can afford to ignore the unexpected. Successful organisations are committed opportunists.

That is the agenda for management in eastern Europe—four principal tasks and 12 key issues. Let me suggest 12 golden rules that need to be applied in management in eastern Europe if management is to be successful. Managers must manage. The cream in organisations must be at the top. Rewards must relate to performance. Objectives must be clear. Enterprises must be efficient. Financial reality must be established. Enterprises must care. All must play as a team. Justice must prevail. Enterprises must defend themselves. They must strive to be the best. They must be committed opportunists.

These are essentially the values of the free market. In my view, the emergence of re-emergence of those beliefs will determine the economic success of eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, but we in Britain can and should play a part. Much has already been done, and I commend the Government for what they have done, but if we focus on financial help, there is a danger that those systems that need to go will be shored up by it. We need to gear our help much more towards management training that is concerned with the values and beliefs which I outlined.

As we all know, Britain has a long entrepreneurial tradition. In the past decade, we have gone through some of the change processes that eastern Europe will have to go through. We in this country have re-established the dominant role of the free market and have cut bureaucracy and carried forward our privatisation programmes. Our industry is much leaner and fitter. Our managers have regained the right to manage. Our products are now competing again in world markets.

But the task in eastern Europe is massive compared with the task that the Government faced in 1979. The opposition that people in those countries will face will be a good deal stiffer than the opposition that the Government have faced since 1979. I want the Government to give them all the help that they can, but it must be of the right kind. The emergence or re-emergence of free market values is the key to success. It is the process of re-establishing the values of the free market that we in this country should, above all, encourage.

2.17 pm

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mrs. Lynda Chalker) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Does the right hon. Lady have the leave of the House to speak again? That being so, she may proceed.

Mrs. Chalker: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Dr. Woodcock) has secured this debate, and I congratulate him particularly on the seven preconditions for the establishment of economic success which he posed.

Much of central and eastern Europe is now settling down to parliamentary democracy after the elections, but those newly installed democratic Governments have to tackle the most daunting economic problems in the world, or they will face further drift, decline and, at worst, even explosions of disappointed expectations. Their success will depend principally on their efforts, but it is very much in our interests that they should succeed, thus consolidating democracy, building up prosperity, expanding the potential for trade and ultimately enhancing our security. Conversely, a failure of economic reform in eastern Europe could lead to political and possibly military instability. We and other western Governments are therefore absolutely determined to do what we can to encourage reform and to strengthen democracy.

What, then, is the role of western Governments? Private sector companies from the west can provide much-needed investment, management and know-how and multilateral bodies can provide the necessary capital flows. The role of western Governments is to provide short-term assistance and technical co-operation and to help the new Governments to set up their own systems and institutions. We are concerned with not only economic but constitutional and civil institutions to ensure good government. But all of those need good management. That is why my hon. Friend's stress on management is so important.

We are concerned to provide a liberal trade regime, which will help eastern European countries to integrate into the world economy. That will help them to reduce their crippling dependence on the old communist barter trade system.

It is an essential part of our approach that there should be the most effective possible international co-ordination of the various national efforts to help central and eastern Europe. We have therefore played a full part in the work of the G24—that is to say, the group of 24 OECD donor countries under the chairmanship of the European Commission which is now responsible for co-ordinating national assistance programmes for Poland, Hungary, the German Democratic Republic, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria and Yugoslavia.

We should not do this in an indiscriminate way, regardless of how committed the Governments of eastern Europe are to real political and economic reform. Differentiation—that is, matching the help that we give to the reality of reform in the country concerned—is a key element of our policy in the region. Following the disgraceful events in Bucharest on 13 and 14 June, we vigorously supported the decisions not to proceed with the EC's proposed trade and co-operation agreement with Romania and not to invite Romania to the meeting of the G24 Foreign Ministers on 4 July. I believe that to be absolutely right. But if we see evidence of moves towards genuine democracy and reform, including full rights for opposition parties and movements, we shall, of course, be prepared to reconsider.

What can we do to help? My hon. Friend recommends much stronger management training. But let us look at what we are doing already. Our multilateral assistance focuses on four institutions. First, the European Community has taken various far-reaching decisions, but, most crucially, it intends to give reforming central and eastern European countries improved access to the Community market. That must be the single most important means of integrating the countries into the liberal western trading system and thereby underpinning their economic and political reforms. The EC will soon begin talks on more advanced association agreements with the most reformed eastern European countries—Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary.

Secondly, the European Training Foundation and the TEMPUS scheme will forge closer links between universities in Poland and Hungary on the one hand and those in Community countries on the other.

The third institution is the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, which we discussed on Tuesday. The new bank will play a vital role in developing the private sector in eastern Europe. We are delighted with the decision to site the EBRD in London. We shall ratify the agreement shortly, and I hope that the bank will soon be ready to start effective operation—always insisting that the projects in which it becomes involved are, indeed, well managed.

Finally, we have the IMF and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. All the eastern European countries are either members of both bodies or are working towards membership. The IBRD will be the biggest single source of capital assistance for central and eastern Europe.

Our bilateral assistance programme, on which my hon. Friend focused, is aimed at helping the countries to build up their democratic institutions and giving them technical assistance and training, especially in areas such as financial services but also in law, in which Britain has something special to offer. All those things are necessary, in addition to the matters of which my hon. Friend spoke.

Our main effort is channelled through the know-how fund. The know-how strategy has been to make sure that the fund provides British advice, skills and training. We concentrate on the sectors in which we have particular expertise and take account of the specific Governments' expressed priorities. The strategy is also aimed to push investment by United Kingdom companies which, with their experience, can work alongside people from central and eastern European countries, for so long denied not only democracy but a market-led economy. Our companies can teach them and help them to find ways of realising how to be successful.

The know-how fund has some priorities which will please my hon. Friend—the banking and financial services; the generation of new jobs for those who lose their jobs as the industrial restructuring gathers pace; advice on setting up small businesses and entrepreneurial activity; help for the energy sector, particularly in Poland and Czechoslovakia; establishing permanent links between Britain and central and eastern European institutions, particularly in management education and training. That is going on apace, but we cannot stop there. We have to do other things as well.

We shall be giving considerable help to combat the serious environmental problems faced by central and eastern Europe. For example, British electric utilities are co-operating with Poland and Czechoslovakia on ways of conserving energy and reducing the environmental damage caused by burning brown coal. I am sure that there will be many other such instances where the management and technology developed in the west is shared with those countries as they emerge into a new situation.

My hon. Friend mentioned the Soviet Union, and I want to make special mention of that country before I conclude. It is not the Government's intention to shore up any country in eastern Europe by giving it money. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary described it exactly when he said that one does not give money to a man who has a pocket which is not sewn up, but rather a needle and thread and show him how to sew it up first and think about investing the money afterwards.

It is important that we see real economic reform coming first in the Soviet Union and elsewhere, but particularly in the Soviet Union where the need is so desperate, before we become involved in any question of investing money. We shall be extremely careful how we proceed. We are considering know-how funds for the Soviet Union in future, but at present we want to see economic reform. Then we can add to that.

In the English language we have an unrivalled means of extending British teaching and influence in eastern Europe. Our aim in each country is to replace Russian by English as the natural second language. We shall take full advantage of every opportunity to widen our cultural contact with eastern Europe. We plan to spend almost three times more this year than we did last year on awards for students for eastern Europe and the Soviet Union.

We have also enabled the British Council to spend an extra £2·25 million in central and eastern Europe. It will now be able to pursue its plans to set up cultural centres outside embassy premises. We are negotiating cultural agreements, which are just as important as the training and the financial know-how on which the development of the industries and the market economy in those countries will fall.

The British Council is developing a major initiative for a network of teachers in eastern European countries who have had British training and use British methods which they can pass on to others. The scope for expansion of British cultural activity and teaching is enormous. Given the resources, I am sure that the British Council will rise to meet the challenge.

Our bilateral help to central and eastern Europe is separate from and additional to our overseas aid budget for the developing countries, which is growing in real terms. No existing aid recipient will be penalised by the new activities that we are undertaking in eastern Europe. It is critical to underpin what they are seeking to do for themselves.

My hon. Friend spoke clearly from his wide experience in developing management education skills. Wherever there are opportunties to share our skills, business should seek to take them because that is a sound investment for business, not just for Government. We have said throughout that we want to stimulate the private sector in every way. That is why we are firm supporters of the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development. We want to stimulate the private sector, not just with investment but with know-how. That is why we have called our funds the know-how funds and why our response to events in eastern and central Europe was the first in the field. Our aid to eastern Europe this year alone could exceed £250 million, including debt rescheduling.

We have played an energetic and generous role in multilateral activities. We shall do that also in our bilateral activities. I assure my hon. Friend that management training and sound management methodology will be to the fore among all we do with the know-how funds.

Anglo-German Relations

2.29 pm

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): I begin by expressing my genuine delight to see the hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones) at the Dispatch Box for the first time in his new job at the Foreign Office. Not only does he have an exquisite taste in art, but he is a true internationalist. Should I, in unaccustomed fashion, make any criticisms of the Government during my speech, I wish to make it clear that I absolve the hon. Gentleman from all blame, for he is a good man.

Adolph Hitler looked for scapegoats and found the Jews. Enoch Powell looked for scapegoats and found the blacks. Our Prime Minister and her advisers looked for scapegoats and found the Germans. Thus does the carousel of history go round in a frightening circle.

History will record that 1990 was the year when "the German question" returned to Britain and when a Cabinet Minister and Prime Minister, in dealing with it, were found to be cruelly lacking in judgment and statesmanship. The former Cabinet Minister and Prime Minister for the time being demonstrated that the British establishment at the highest levels could be spiteful and vindictive and capable of pursuing a vendetta against an ally not for decades but for generations.

The Prime Minister and former Cabinet Minister showed that they were prepared to let their own sclerotic psychological hang-ups damage Britain's national interest and the future of European co-operation, and no amount of smiling through clenched teeth by European diplomats and Foreign Ministers, anxious to put on a brave face on the crisis in Anglo-German relations, can hide that.

Even so, I congratulate Chancellor Kohl and Germany's deputy Foreign Minister, Frau Irmgurd Adam-Schwaetzer, on the cool and sensitive way in which they handled the matter. Their behaviour was a credit to the new democratic Europe in which Germany plays a leading role. To be fair, our Foreign Secretary did not do badly, either, in trying to minimise the damage caused by the Prime Minister.

Civilised leaders around the globe, from President Bush down, have looked on open-mouthed as Britain has made itself look ridiculous. At home, the only people to benefit from the debacle are the anti-European rumps in both major political parties. Temporarily they have been provided with oxygen. Fortunately, in the parliamentary Labour party we have managed to marginalise our Dad's Army anti-European rump by demonstrating that there is more sound and fury than argument and substance in what they say.

But what of the Government and the Prime Minister? She seems intent on building up the strength of her Dad's Army anti-European rump. One of the tragedies of modern politics is that she would like to be the leader of the Bruges group of Tory dinosaurs. As such, she is clearly out of tune and out of place in the modern world. While she obviously thinks that she comes to these matters with the unconscious realisation of effortless British superiority, we all know that in fact she is the mad Queen.

What exactly is it that Britain wants Germany and the Germans to do to become equal partners in a modern, free Europe? Are we driven by the politics of envy, angry that the Germans should be able to handle the democratic process better than the British? Surely we do not want the Germans to copy us by debauching their currency and achieving British levels of inflation. Do we really want to see the streets of Cologne and Frankfurt strewn with rubbish, like Westminster and Tower Hamlets? Do we want the people of Dresden to be as uncultured and uncivilised as the people of Worthing? Do we really expect schoolchildren in Hamburg to be taught mathematics as badly as children are in Barnet? Surely we cannot expect German citizens to reduce their standard of living to ours.

I believe that Anglo-German relations should be based on five principles. First, Britain should wholeheartedly support German economic and monetary union. Secondly, we should applaud German unification and think about it in positive terms as a stabilising force in a new enlarged, democratic Europe, east and west. Thirdly, we should back Chancellor Kohl in his plan to help buy time for perestroika by providing aid and credit to Russia. Fourthly, we should commit ourselves at the intergovernmental conference in November to joining Germany and Europe in the drive for European monetary union and the creation of a single European currency. That means that we should give up our own batty proposals for a hard ecu. Fifthly, we should work together with Germany and our European partners on a policy of collective security. I hope that, by the time the 21st century arrives, the Warsaw pact and NATO will have disappeared and have been replaced by a pan-European defence and security system.

As regards German economic and monetary union—yes, it is going too fast; yes, it has caught up with West German domestic politics; and yes, there will be a short-term price to pay in higher unemployment in East Germany. But it will succeed and so will German unification. My own view is that GEMU will succeed with only a small rise in inflation in Germany and with little adverse effect on interest rates in the rest of Europe. I am reinforced in that view by having the agreement of the formidable Frau Schneider-Lenne of the Deutschebank. Ironically, the Prime Minister was in favour of German reunification right up the point when it became a practical proposition—when, sick with fear, she backed off as her anti-German phobia came to the surface.

Hovering over Britain's relations with Germany are Germany's relations with Russia, where the psychological traumas run even deeper. Chancellor Kohl wants to help President Gorbachev to buy time with aid and credit for perestroika. The Leader of the Labour party, my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) discussed a Marshall plan with President Bush recently to help Russia. The EC, the International Monetary Fund and the World bank have been asked to help at two recent summits—one in Dublin, one in Houston. It is the British Government who have been dragging their feet. We should now recognise the need to help both Russia and Germany in this sphere. It is surely in our own self-interest and in the interest of peace in Europe to do so.

As regards European monetary union, I have no doubt that the next Labour Government will find it easier than the present Government to move forward with Germany and France and our other European partners. Labour's Back Benchers reaffirmed this week their wholehearted support for European monetary union in a report from the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service. Our Front Bench spokesmen and women are moving carefully and intelligently in the right direction. In my view, nothing would do more to repair the damage in British-German relations than a commitment by our Government to support European monetary union at the inter-governmental conference in November. EMU makes much more sense than simply joining the exchange rate mechanism.

The Government should drop their half-baked, hard ecu policy, which has been described by the president of the Bundesbank, Karl Otto Pohl, as too complicated and likely to create uncertainty. As Pohl has said:

"When the problem that bedevils the Economic Community is the existence of 12 currencies, a British proposal for the creation of a 13th currency is unhelpful".

Mr. Pohl also said:

"The Europe central bankers considered and rejected a proposal similar to that of the hard ECU some time ago."

He added that perhaps a country like Britain, with 9·8 per cent. inflation can learn a lot from a country like Germany, with 2·3 per cent. inflation.

Yesterday, as I listened to the Chancellor unfold his hard ecu plan in the Grand Committee Room to the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service of which I am a member, I realised that it was literally touched with lunacy and would create chaos in the money markets of Europe if it were put into effect. The Germans, the French, the Italians and others would have to be barmy to adopt the hard ecu proposal.

My personal life seems to have been bound up, at critical moments, with the life of Germany. As I told the House a few weeks ago, my father died in 1939, when I was two years old and the German battleship Scharnhorst sank HMS Rawalpindi. My mother was six months pregnant with my sister then, so times were difficult; but neither my sister nor I was brought up to dislike Germany, let alone to hold grudges down the decades.

When I left school I lived in Germany for two years, and I have fond memories of both the country and the people. When the Treasury Select Committee recently visited Frankfurt and East Berlin, it was impossible not to be caught up in the excitement, the apprehension and—yes, perhaps the hysteria of German economic and monetary union and German reunification. Next week, a friend is coming from Berlin to stay with me for a while. I ask the Minister: what message do I give her? Is she coming to a friendly country with a friendly Government—a trustworthy ally—or is she making a visit to perfidious Albion?

Let me conclude—thus giving the Minister five minutes more than he expected—by asking the Government and the Prime Minister, in whom so much animosity has been stirred up, to heed the words of the 1662 Book of Common Prayer:

"from envy, hatred, and malice, and from all uncharitableness, Good Lord, deliver us."

I ask that in the name of Britain, in the name of Germany and in the name of Europe.

2.41 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones): The House will be aware that I have led a rather sheltered life for the past eight and a half years, and, if there is nothing else for which I can thank the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore), I can at least say that his remarks, which are always on the one hand characteristically urbane and on the other characteristically thuggish, have today brought me back rather abruptly to the seamier side of political life. I am also grateful for the personal comments with which he began his speech—although I must add that he had better not go on like that, or my stay at the Foreign Office is likely to be brief as that of Mr. Patrick Gordon Walker.

As the whole House knows, the hon. Gentleman is far too intelligent to believe a great deal of what he said at the beginning of his speech—and, for that matter, a great deal of what he said at the end. Accordingly, I propose to do him the courtesy of addressing the subject that he tabled on the Order Paper: the current state of Anglo-German relations.

The relationship between British and the Federal Republic of Germany is of the utmost importance to Her Majesty's Government. It has helped to ensure security and stability in Europe for 40 years. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, addressing the Königswinter conference in Cambridge on 29 March this year, described the close Anglo-German partnership at the heart of NATO and Europe as essential to the success of both; she recalled the considerable part that Britain had played over the past 40 years in creating the conditions in which German unity could be achieved in freedom—for example, in Berlin and through the British forces in Germany. But, as she said on that occasion, our relations with our German friends have not been a one-way process. The federal republic has been the staunchest of allies in NATO, and we shall always be grateful for the strong support that we have received from successive German Governments for our membership of the European Economic Community. The Anglo-German summit on 30 March was also highly successful, and our relations with the federal republic have continued to be close and warm. This is the culmination of work that has taken place over many years.

Neither country will forget the tragedy of the two wars that have devastated our continent during this century, but, through the common desire of our two countries to make a new start and to create a new stable and democratic Germany, we have built a strong friendship.

The federal republic is a democratic state of over 40 years' standing. This will not change after unification. We are proud of the part that Britain has played in helping to build a prosperous and democratic German state. We have constantly advocated the right of self-determination by the German people. We have long believed that a united Germany was of profound importance to Europe as a whole. Anthony Eden spelled this out even more specifically in 1955 in Geneva when he said:

"as long as Germany is divided, Europe will be divided. Until the unity of Germany is restored there can be neither confidence nor security in this continent."

Mr. Sedgemore indicated assent.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am glad to see that the hon. Gentleman assents to that proposition.

In common with other western countries, we have worked to create the conditions in which German unity could be achieved in freedom.

The strength of Anglo-German co-operation is well shown in the current discussions on unification. We have been working energetically within the two plus four framework to achieve an early resolution of the external aspects of unity—the termination of four—power rights and responsibilities and an overall settlement; Berlin; borders; and discussion of certain politico-military issues. Good progress has been made in all these areas.

[Mr. Garel-Jones]

On borders—in particular the issue of the Polish-German border—the foundations for a satisfactory outcome have been laid. Both German states have said that they will respect the existing Oder-Neisse border, and it has been agreed that there should be a legally binding treaty between Poland and a united Germany that confirms that border.

On politico-military issues, there have been differences of opinion between the west and the Soviet Union on Germany's membership of NATO. We, in common with our NATO allies, argued for a united Germany belonging to NATO. Germany had the right under the Helsinki Final Act to decide whether to belong to an alliance, and has chosen to remain a member of NATO.

The breakthrough registered between Chancellor Kohl and President Gorbachev at Stavropol on 16 July was a remarkable achievement for both men and for good sense. President Gorbachev has accepted the prospect of a united Germany in NATO. That is a great personal success for Chancellor Helmut Kohl. The outcome can be attributed in part to NATO's lead in adjusting to the changing face of Europe, as the NATO summit conference in London on 5 and 6 July and the London declaration showed.

It shows also that in President Gorbachev we are dealing with a very different kind of leader of the Soviet Union than those we have known hitherto. The changes made possible through his vision and courage have enabled the alliance to extend the hand of friendship to eastern Europe in the way in which the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch referred. The London declaration helped to persuade the Russians that a united Germany in NATO poses no threat.

As for the EC aspects of unification, Britain supports the German Democratic Republic's fullest integration in the shortest time. It will not be a simple matter to agree on which derogations from EC law will be needed for the ex-GDR after unification or on how long they should last. There is much detailed work to be done within a short time, but we believe that the integration of the GDR will bring real advantages to the EC as a whole.

In all these areas, we are working closely with the Germans towards the fulfilment of a common goal—the establishment of a sovereign, democratic and united Germany. We are confident that we shall soon see a single unified Germany taking its place in the family of nations.

We work closely with the FRG on European Community issues. We have fought hard and successfully together to keep the Community open to its world trading partners in avoiding a fortress Europe, and have co-operated on many specific pieces of single market legislation—for example, last year's important second banking directive. The records of the United Kingdom and Germany on implementing EC legislation are at the top of the Community league table.

There is much else in our continuing relationship. Bilateral trade between our two countries has long been of great importance to us both. Germany is Britain's main European trading partner. The opening up of East Germany provides an opportunity not only for all Germany but for British business. We hope that British business men will seize those opportunities and take maximum advantage of them.

Trade flows are not the only form of interdependence. Overseas investment flows between our two economies have drawn them even closer together. According to the federal Ministry of Finance, German companies had more than £3 billion of direct investment assets in the United Kingdom at year-end 1987, and direct investment assets by United Kingdom firms in Germany were more than £4 billion.

A vast range of non-governmental contact between our two countries enhance the fabric of Anglo-German relations. I mention trade, but there are in addition family ties and friendship, mentioned by the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch, tourism, art and culture. I am particularly pleased to inform the House that my own constituency of Watford formed a twinning link with the German town of Mainz as long ago as 1956.

The hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch made derogatory remarks about the inhabitants of Worthing, but I assure him that neither they nor the residents of Watford consider themselves uncultured or uncivilised. I recognise that it is part of the arrogance of socialist intellectuals such as the hon. Gentleman that he will look over his shoulder at my constituents and those of my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins). In any event, over the past 35 years, my constituents have travelled to and from Mainz, building up their networks of friendship and understanding with the people of that town—which, as the hon. Gentleman will know, happens to be in the Rhineland Pfalz, that is, in the constituency od which Chancellor——

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): My hon. Friend will be strengthened in his argument to know that Cleethorpes is twinned with the town of Königswinter, and that only six weeks ago, Glandford, which I am also privileged to represent, was twinned with Landkreis Gifhorn. That emphasises my hon. Friend's contention.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention. Königswinter symbolises the efforts made not just at constituency-to-constituency and town-to-town level, but at governmental level—and even at the level of intellectuals, such as the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch—through the Königswinter conference. My constituency is a precursor in establishing such links, which have helped to build up the friendship and trust that now exist between our two countries.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has met his German colleague Herr Genscher no fewer than 27 times since the beginning of this year, and Herr Genscher will be his guest at Chevening this weekend. My hon. Friend the Prime Minister will receive Herr Genscher on 30 July, and she hopes to see Chancellor Kohl again in the near future.

I hope that my remarks have shown the hon. Gentleman and the House the variety and importance of British-German relations, and the significance that the Government attach to them. Our friendship is durable and our partnership with the German republic is broad and deep. Britain and the federal republic are important to each other in four significant areas of policy. With the approach of unification, there is potential for an even closer co-operation, and the Government certainly look to the future with confidence and enthusiasm.

The hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch, as I said in my opening remarks, has two modes: at times, he poses as a revolutionary thug, and at others he is a thoughtful, but sometimes rather excitable, contributor to our debates. I prefer the latter mode. Today we have had a flavour of both. The House had the opportunity to see him in the more thoughtful mode on 15 June, when he initiated an interesting debate on the European Community, in which he announced his Pauline conversion to the European cause. This came as something of a shock to his hon. Friends who normally accompany him on the Bench below the Gangway—the hon. Members for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), and for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer), who, alas, are not in their places today.

Conservative Members would simply say, "Welcome to the club," to the hon. Gentleman. Although we note that, with a characteristic excess of zeal, which would have made Talleyrand turn in his grave, he has gone over the top because—if I understand him correctly, and I read his speech on 15 June with care—he wants a single currency tomorrow.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore: 1997, actually.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The hon. Gentleman believes that Mr. Delors is the greatest living European—greater even than the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock), the Leader of the Opposition. I suspect, having become a convert to the European cause, the hon. Gentleman regards the Leader of the Opposition and his other comrades on the Opposition Front Bench as belonging to that Dad's Army which he referred to, and from which he is such a recent, but distinguished deserter.

When the hon. Gentleman opened the debate on economic and political developments in the Community, he again made a reference to his father, which both touched the House and did credit to him. I suspect that those who suffered during the last war or who, like the hon. Gentleman's father, gave their lives in that war, would welcome the new Europe to which Anglo-German friendship and co-operation have made and continue to make such a notable contribution.

I am exceedingly grateful to the hon. Gentleman for having brought me back from the quiet, rather spiritual world to the hurly-burly of the House. We are delighted that, after a lifetime of campaigning with the Labour party against British membership of the European Economic Community, he has come to us—and he is very welcome.

We do not agree with him about a single currency. The British Government are advancing their own proposals for the hard ecu, but, without being patronising, I think that the hon. Gentleman will be listened to with greater respect if he manages to eliminate the element of thuggery from his interventions in European debates. I was especially sorry that the hon. Gentleman felt it necessary to begin his speech by speaking as he did about my right hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley) whose contribution to public life, to the House and to the European cause is both distinguished and long-standing in a way in which, I am afraid, the hon. Gentleman's is not.

British Coal (Cannock Site)

2.59 pm

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): It is said that the finest wines are always left until the end. Approaching the end of the Session, we have been privileged to listen to the vintage port contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones). It was wonderful to see the ease with which my hon. Friend made his "maiden" speech for the first time in eight years, and how he has translated himself with such dignity and simplicity from the centre of the spider's web to the centre stage. As he is a member of the distinguished Watford football club, perhaps I can say that he has moved from goalkeeper to centre forward.

As one of the few hon. Members who can genuinely say, "Ich bin ein Hamburger"—that is a reference not to McDonald's, but to my childhood which was spent in Hamburg—I took great interest in what my hon. Friend has just said, as, I am sure, did the whole House. Just as he has been watching us over the past eight years, so we shall now have great pleasure in watching him and making sure that he does not swallow too fully some of the Foreign Office briefs. On this, his first outing, he has clearly shown the characteristic independence of spirit that we have come to associate with him.

To enable my hon. Friends to depart on holiday, I now turn to my Adjournment debate. It is a privilege to have the opportunity of being the tail-end Charlie of the parliamentary Session and to initiate our final debate before the summer recess. However, I fear that it is a corresponding duty for my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, upon whose shoulders the response falls. I apologise if I have detained him from travelling to his delightful constituency of Banbury, where I was at school I am delighted to see him on the Front Bench and hope that he will take some of my points on board.

I begin by setting the debate in context. I represent the constituency of Cannock and Burntwood, which measures approximately 10 miles by five. In 1945 there were no fewer than 22 coal mines in my constituency, whereas today there is not one. There are two deep mines just outside, at Littleton in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack), and at Lea Hall, in the Mid-Staffordshire constituency. There has been some opencast work in my constituency and British Coal has submitted an application for a further substantial opencast site.

Although there is no mining activity in my constituency at the moment, there is nevertheless a strong mining culture. Many of my constituents have either worked in the coal industry or have come from families which, for generations, have contributed to the winning of coal, which is often a difficult and dangerous task. As I have said, there is therefore a strong mining culture in the area. I have repeated that because it is important for what I shall say later.

I have sought to detain the House on this matter because British Coal owns a substantial amount of land in the area and, in 1984, sought planning permission for a substantial private residential development, which would ultimately lead to the construction of about 2,400 houses. The site is to the east of Cannock—my hon. Friend has a map so that he might better identify the area—and to the west of Heath Hayes. It is a substantial development. In recognition of the size of the development, the local authority entered into what is known as a section 52 agreement on 17 January 1985.

One of the essential features of that section 52 agreement is the safeguarding of a site called the school site. It imposed a restrictive covenant on the site prohibiting non-school development and gave Staffordshire county council an option to purchase the site after 700 houses had been built. After 1,500 houses have been built, the developers may require the county council to choose between purchasing the site and cancelling the option and restrictive covenant. That agreement applied when British Coal sought planning permission for the development that is now taking place.

There are two schools in the area—the Fiveways school and Gorsemoor primary school. I shall concentrate on the Gorsemoor primary school, which is more important to my argument. It has 508 pupils and accommodation for about 390 places, plus temporary accommodation for another 180 pupils. The school is grossly overcrowded. There are two large classes of 35 children each. The headmaster and the teachers would prefer to divide the pupils in those classes into three classes of a more manageable size. There are two Portakabins, with no running water and no computer facilities, and pupils have to brave the elements and sometimes walk through rain and snow to reach the main school buildings. My constituents find that unacceptable. They are up in arms because the school is overcrowded.

Many of the people buying houses on the new estate on Hawks Green have young families. The houses are not cheap—about £90,000 to £100,000 for a three or four-bedroomed house. People have moved there from other parts of Staffordshire and from other parts of the country to that very fine estate. Many of them have moved there taking into account the fact that when they go around the estate they can see a large site behind the supermarket which they have been told by their legal advisers has been earmarked for a school.

When parents move house, they consider what school facilities will be available for their children.

What has happened since that section 52 agreement in 1985? There have been no negotiations whatsoever with British Coal. Although 700 houses have been built and the county council has informed British Coal that it wishes to negotiate about using that site for a school, British Coal has not negotiated in earnest.

No real progress has been made because British Coal has claimed a value for the site based on commercial or residential alternatives. On that basis, British Coal is claiming that the land is worth about £1·5 million. Clearly the county council cannot pay £1·5 million for the site. British Coal entered into an agreement which is headed quite simply, "The School Site"—it could not be less equivocal than that—and it is quite clear that that site has been earmarked and reserved for a school.

It is scandalous that British Coal is arguing that the valuation of the site should be based on its residential land value. Clearly, if it was unable to sell the site for the development of houses, it would be worth only a matter of thousands of pounds. We are talking about £10,000 at most for the value of open space land or £1·5 million which, it is correct to say, would probably be the valuation if it were to be developed for housing.

The point is that it was never intended that the site should be developed for housing. It should be developed in that way only if the county council decided not to exercise its option which was built into the agreement by which planning permission was given to develop the site for a school.

It is outrageous that British Coal is dragging its feet in this way. Clearly Staffordshire county council is not in a position to pay £1·5 million, and the district auditor would think that it was off its rocker if it did so.

When my constituents raised this issue with me, I sought some satisfaction from the county council. It told me that the negotiations had run into the sand. I wrote to the chairman of British Coal, Sir Robert Haslam, and received a reply from the deputy chairman, Robert Kendall. The letter said:

> "As you know, the difficult financial position facing the Industry at the moment means that it is necessary for us to achieve the best possible proceeds from the sale of our assets. The financial reconstruction to which you refer"—

I referred to the £6·5 billion that the Government have contributed to British Coal for its capital reconstruction—

> "does not lessen this responsibility—indeed, it makes it all the more incumbent on British Coal to behave in a responsible, commercial fashion and justify, through our results, the faith the Government is showing in the coal industry through this important and welcome step . . . we appreciate the need for appropriate services to be provided, including the need for education facilities to be made available for the new residents moving into the development. However, this does not lessen our need to ensure that a realistic price is agreed for the land in question."

I understand that British Coal has an obligation to ensure proper stewardship of the public funds paid to it —it is taxpayers' money. However, since the coal industry has been under the auspices of the Government, it has improved its profitability and productivity and my constituents, no less than others around the country, have made their contribution to its improved success.

I find the attitude of British Coal's deputy chairman contemptible. I do not say that lightly. Only an industry that is completely unaccountable and had no shareholders could behave in that way. However, nominally, Mr. Speaker, you and I are shareholders, as is my hon. Friend the Minister and everyone else in the country. The truth of nationalisation is that nobody owns the industry and those who run it are, effectively, a law unto themselves. In my view, no private sector business could conduct its affairs in the way that British Coal does. My constituents on the Hawks Green estate at Heath Hayes feel aggrieved about the way in which they have been treated.

I recognise that my hon. Friend the Minister can do nothing about this for the time being because, under the nationalisation legislation, the coal industry is solely responsible for determining the national interest. I know that he will tell me that he does not have day-to-day responsibility for British Coal. By raising this matter today, I am seeking to impress upon the management of British Coal that it cannot go on behaving as if it is a law unto itself. It has responsibilities, and it is time that it faced up to them. I do not believe that a private sector company would ride roughshod over people in the way that British Coal has. It would consider it extremely disadvantageous to its commercial and trading prospects so to upset a large section of the community in which it worked and would ensure that it avoided the situation in which British Coal has got itself.

Despite the undertaking given by the deputy chairman of British Coal that he would ask his officials to enter into negotiations with Staffordshire county council in good faith, I am sorry to say that those negotiations again appear to have run into the sand.

I mentioned the context in which I wished to set my remarks—the strong association of my constituency with the coal mining industry, the lives of my constituents and their forebears that have been lost in the winning of coal and the strong coal culture that remains. I find it astonishing that British Coal, whose heavy lorries trundle through my constituency to the aggravation of many of my constituents, whose work undermines the houses in which my constituents live—then it quibbles about compensation for coal mining subsidence—which wanted to mine about 1,300 acres of open field to win coal by opencast methods and which rely on the good will and work of my constituents to win its coal can so slap them in the face over a matter as important to them as the education of their children.

Even if my hon. Friend the Minister is unable to say that he can resolve the problem to my satisfaction, I hope that he will be in no doubt, and that he will convey the feeling to British Coal, that my constituents are fed up to the back teeth with its cavalier treatment and want the industry and its senior management to respond to their concerns.

It will be no good saying that Staffordshire county council is making contingency plans to expand the Fiveways school. That is plan B; plan A was stymied by British Coal. The county council had to do something in the meantime, so it proposed to expand the Fiveways school. That alternative is not acceptable to my constituents, because that school is further away and it involves primary school age children crossing a fairly busy road. They bought their houses in the firm expectation that a site marked "The School Site" in the agreement with the county council would indeed become the school site. They had not reckoned on the prevarication and duplicity of British Coal.

It will not be a sufficient get-out for British Coal to say that the county council has made alternative plans. The county council has indicated to me its desire is to build a school on that site and that it will be needed. About 800 or more houses have been built on the estate, and the total number planned is 2,400. It will be an enormous estate. The downturn in the property market elsewhere is not affecting sales and the likelihood is that there will be increasing pressure on scholl places.

That site is therefore needed, and I hope that by raising the matter this afternoon on the final day of the Session before my hon. Friend the Minister departs to take a well-earned holiday—indeed, after all your endeavours in the Chamber, before you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, take a well-earned break—and before British Coal's directors gather their buckets and spades to go to the seaside, they will note that some of us are extremely angry with British Coal's performance.

When I tried to telephone the deputy chairman at 5.50 pm last night, neither he nor the chairman was available and I was able to obtain only the press department. By contrast, I was able to telephone the Department of Energy at seven o'clock, and the Minister's team were on hand and able to assist a Member of Parliament. I was most impressed by that, and my hon. Friend could give a clear lesson to British Coal on how to manage its affairs.

The final lesson that I hope my hon. Friend the Minister will take on board is that there is only one answer for British Coal: the sooner it gets into the private sector and is exposed to all the rigours of free enterprise and the need to satisfy customers and live at peace with its neighbours, the better the country will be served and the more likely we are to win coal competitively.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Tony Baldry): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) on his success in the ballot today. This subject is of understandable concern to him and to his constituents, and he put his case with characteristic clarity and in his own way.

I should like at the outset to make a couple of general points. First, my Department does not have a role in matters of this type. As my hon. Friend knows, the Government take the view that it is not their function to tell industry how to run its business. Even with the remaining nationalised industries, we believe that, wherever possible, they should be allowed to get on with their business, make their own decisions and stand by the consequences. In the case of British Coal, decisions on the disposal of property are quite rightly one of the matters that we leave to the judgment of British Coal's management. Only the management understand British Coal's operational needs and consequently how best to make use of the property that it owns.

The second general point which I should like to make, and which I hope my hon. Friend will appreciate, is that the Goverment must expect the corporation as a general rule to maximise the proceeds from the sale of its assets. A private sector company is obliged to get the best deal on behalf of its shareholders. British Coal, whose shareholders are effectively the taxpaying public, cannot behave any less responsibly in these matters, as my hon. Friend fairly acknowledged.

My hon. Friend was right to point out that British Coal is a large organisation and, moreover, an organisation which has just recently undergone a substantial restructuring of its finances with the passage of the Coal Industry Act 1990. However, British Coal is expected to record a substantial loss in the last financial year. It was operating in a difficult and increasingly competitive market; it had its third mild winter in succession; and it has been undergoing an extensive programme of restructuring over the past five years. Restructuring is essential for the long-term well-being of the corporation, but it does have considerable short-term costs.

It is also important to be clear that the new Coal Industry Act does not simply represent a largesse of cash on the part of Government and taxpayers which will allow the corporation to spend freely. The purpose of the Act was to eliminate the bulk of the corporation's accumulated deficit, hence reducing the burden of interest payments it previously had to carry. It was not our intention to insulate the corporation from the realities of the marketplace, hence encouraging it to act in an uncommercial or uneconomic way. Our intention was rather to give British Coal the chance to compete and succeed in a difficult market, as I believe it will. It is up to British Coal to honour the trust that the Government have put in it.

I hope that my hon. Friend does not assume from the stress I have laid on these general principles that I do not appreciate his concern on this matter. As he acknowledged, I will not be able to resolve the question here today, nor would my hon. Friend expect me to do so. However, I do believe that the parties involved should be able to reach a solution in time.

I understand that the point at issue is that British Coal sold the land in question to a developer at the rate for agricultural land and subject to an agreement under section 52 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 reserving the land for educational purposes. British Coal would at a later stage receive from the developer the difference between what it had already received and the price that the developer received from the local education authority. The dispute is about whether the section 52 agreement has reduced the value of the land, and hence the amount of the payment still due to British Coal, and, if so, whether the developer and British Coal are entitled to compensation.

A very similar case is currently before the Lands Tribunal. The outcome of that case will clarify the current legal position, and permit negotiations between Staffordshire county council, the developer and British Coal to take place on a much firmer basis than before.

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend has referred to the outstanding Lands Tribunal case. Is he aware that in that case the council—Nottinghamshire county council, I belive—has been in litigation since 1984? Frankly, my constituents are not prepared to wait yet another six years while British Coal drags its feet and tries to misrepresent what was a clear agreement, to try to screw more money out of the county council.

Mr. Baldry: I understand that both parties—Staffordshire county council and British Coal—accept the need to await the outcome of the other case and are content to let matters rest in the meantime. Knowing of this debate today, I asked officials in my Department to investigate and, as far as I am aware, neither side is accusing the other of delay or procrastination.

Against that background, I hope that my hon. Friend will agree that the most sensible course—which appears to be the course being adopted and advocated by the parties concerned—is to await the outcome of the case before the Lands Tribunal. However, as I have said, I appreciate the strength of my hon. Friend's feeling on this matter and his understandable desire that it should be resolved speedily and equitably. I will therefore ensure that the points that he has raised in his speech are brought without delay to the attention of the chairman of British Coal and I will ask the chairman to ensure that when the Lands Tribunal has reached its decision on the other case the matter is resolved as quickly as possible.

On a lighter note, may I say that I am aware that mine will be the last speech from the Dispatch Box before the House rises for the summer recess. For Government Departments and Ministers, it will be business as usual, but to those who have some spare time during the recess, may I recommend the third edition of British Coal's "A Guide to Steam Trains in the British Isles", compiled for the Association of Railway Preservation Societies with sponsorship from British Coal. In it, one will find the details of more than > "120 Steam Railways, Steam Centres and Museums where you can see on operating days steam locomotives of all sizes from the narrow guage to main line express types. In addition for the first time this year there are details of regular steam trains operating over the main lines of British Rail."

From Bangor to the Bluebell line, there are some excellent excursions to be had, and I hope that those of my hon. Friends—and perhaps you, Mr. Deputy Speaker—who may have some free time will be able to take advantage of an enjoyable day out looking at some of Britain's great industrial heritage.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): May I add to what the Minister has just said by wishing all hon. Members and all those who serve us a happy and enjoyable recess? I hope that every one of them gets a holiday, including Ministers.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-eight minutes past Three o'clock till Monday 15 October, pursuant to the Resolution of the House [23 July].

House of Commons

Thursday 6 September 1990

The House met at half-past Two o'clock, notice having been given by MR. SPEAKER, pursuant to Standing Order No. 12 (Earlier meeting of the House in certain circumstances).

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

DEATHS OF MEMBERS

Mr. Speaker: I regret to have to inform the House of the deaths of Ian Reginald Edward Gow, TD., Member for Eastbourne, of Charles Patrick Wall, esquire, Member for Bradford, North, and of Allender Steele Adams, esquire, Member for Paisley, North, and I desire on behalf of the House to express our sense of the loss we have sustained and our sympathy with the relatives of the hon. Members.

NEW WRIT

For Knowsley, South, in the room of Sean Francis Hughes, esquire, deceased.—[Mr. Foster.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Resolved,

That this House at its rising to-morrow, do adjourn until Monday 15th October; that at this day's sitting, Mr. Speaker do adjourn the House at Ten o'clock, without putting any Question; and that, at to-morrow's sitting, Mr. Speaker shall at half-past Two o'clock put the Question already proposed from the Chair.—[Sir Geoffrey Howe.]

Mr. Speaker: No fewer than 98 right hon. and hon. Members wish to take part in this important two-day debate. Therefore, I think that the House will understand if I put a limit of 10 minutes on the speeches between 6 and 8 o'clock this evening. I ask right hon. and hon. Members who may be called before or after that time to bear that limit in mind.

The Gulf

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Renton.]

2.37 pm

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): May I first express our deep sorrow at the loss of a greatly loved colleague, Ian Gow, and our sympathy to his family; and also express our sadness at the loss of the two other hon. Members to whom Mr. Speaker referred, Mr. Adams and Mr. Wall, who were taken from us so suddenly, and extend our sympathy to their families, too.

The Government have asked for Parliament to be recalled to discuss the grave developments in the Gulf over the last few weeks.

In the early hours of 2 August, Iraq invaded and occupied Kuwait, a peaceful, independent country and a member of the United Nations since 1963. It was a flagrant and blatant case of aggression.

The United Nations Security Council responded promptly, demanding first Iraq's immediate and unconditional withdrawal, and subsequently restoration of the legitimate Government of Kuwait. When after a few days Iraq had failed to respond, the Security Council imposed comprehensive sanctions and later authorised the use of force to implement them.

Meanwhile, in response to requests from King Fahd of Saudia Arabia and other Gulf rulers, the United States, closely followed by Britain, immediately deployed ground, air and naval forces to deter further aggression by Saddam Hussein, and in support of the Security Council's decisions. More than 20 other countries, including several Arab nations, have now sent or committed themselves to sending forces.

British and other foreign citizens in Iraq and Kuwait have been caught up in the crisis, and are being used by Iraq as hostages in a way which has caused revulsion throughout the world. Embassies in Kuwait have been forcibly prevented from carrying out their duty of looking after their citizens.

The Government have responded to this extremely serious situation vigorously and in close co-operation with our allies and friends. Our resolute response has received wide support in this country and elsewhere and the gratitude and appreciation of many Arab Governments.

Hon. Members naturally wished to debate these matters at a convenient moment, and I welcome the opportunity to give the House a fuller account of events and of the Government's actions. Both my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and Defence have just returned from visiting the area and are in a position to give first-hand reports to the House.

I shall first say a word about the origins of the present crisis. In July, Iraq and Kuwait became involved in a dispute over oil pricing and production levels, and over Iraqi debts to Kuwait. Iraq's principal demand was that Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates should cut oil production in order to maintain prices. Iraq also demanded it should not have to repay the loans of many billions of dollars received from Kuwait during the Iran-Iraq war. As the dispute developed, Iraq deployed substantial numbers of troops to positions near the border with Kuwait.

[The Prime Minister]

Active diplomatic efforts, notably by President Mubarak of Egypt, were made to defuse the situation. As a result, Iraq and Kuwait agreed to bilateral talks in Jedda on 1 August, with the prospect of a further round of discussions in Baghdad. The Iraqi Government gave explicit and categorical assurances to the Governments of Egypt and Saudi Arabia that they had no intention of invading Kuwait.

Saddam Hussein introduced into this dispute the further question of Iraqi territorial claims on Kuwait. These claims are without legal foundation. The Al-Sabah family has ruled Kuwait since the 18th century, long before Iraq itself was created in the break-up of the Ottoman empire following the first world war.

Kuwait's borders with the newly created Iraq were drawn in 1923. They were accepted by Iraq when it became an independent state in 1932. None the less, Iraq resuscitated its territorial claim against Kuwait in 1961, when British protection of Kuwait came to an end. British forces were despatched at the request of the ruler to protect Kuwait's independence and sovereignty. They were subsequently replaced by an Arab League force. The existing border was then finally reaffirmed between Iraq and Kuwait in 1963.

That is the history. To return to recent events, despite having assured other Arab Governments and leaders that he had no aggressive intent, Saddam Hussein ordered Iraqi forces to invade Kuwait in the early hours of 2 August. They did so under the pretext of responding to a request for assistance from a non-existent revolutionary government, which they alleged had overthrown the Government of Kuwait.

Saddam Hussein then established a puppet regime consisting of Iraqi officers. That so-called government have now disappeared without trace, and Saddam Hussein claims to have annexed Kuwait, which he now describes as a province of Iraq. History has many examples of perfidy and deceit. This ranks high among them and shows that nothing Saddam Hussein says can be trusted. Moreover, it is an outrageous breach of international law.

Iraqi's actions raise very important issues of principle as well as of law. There can be no conceivable justification for one country to march in and seize another, simply because it covets its neighbour's wealth and resources. If Iraq's aggression were allowed to succeed, no small state could ever feel safe again. At the very time when at last we can see the prospect of a world governed by the rule of law, a world in which the United Nations and the Security Council can play the role envisaged for them when they were founded, Iraq's actions go back to the law of the jungle.

The issue is one of importance to the whole world. It affects world security, world oil supplies and world economic stability. It affects the confidence of all small states, not only those in the middle east. We have bitter memories of the consequences of failing to challenge annexation of small states in the 1930s. We have learned the lesson that the time to stop the aggressor is at once.

The international response has been swift and resolute and for that we owe much to the United States and to the co-operation of the Soviet Union.

On 2 August, the very day of the invasion, the Security Council adopted resolution 660 condemning the invasion and calling for Iraq's immediate and unconditional withdrawal.

On 4 August, the European Community and its member states took measures to protect Kuwaiti assets, to freeze Iraqi assets, to embargo oil and to stop arms sales to Iraq. It also agreed to work for comprehensive economic sanctions in the Security Council.

Two days later, as Iraq had failed to comply with the original resolution 660, the Security Council adopted a further resolution—661—which demanded the restoration of the legitimate Government of Kuwait and imposed comprehensive mandatory sanctions on Iraq under chapter VII. A committee of the Security Council was also set up to monitor and report on the implementation of sanctions.

Subsequently, the Security Council has adopted three further resolutions. They declare Iraq's annexation of Kuwait null and void; condemn Iraq's actions against foreign nationals in Kuwait and Iraq, and demand that they be allowed to leave; and resolution 665 calls upon United Nations member states to take necessary measures against shipping to ensure the strict implementation of sanctions. As was pointed out at the time, that includes the use of minimum force.

Not a single country voted against any of those resolutions, although the Yemen and Cuba abstained on some of them.

Let me stress: our objectives are those set out in those resolutions—unconditional Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait and restoration of the legitimate Kuwaiti Government. The preferred method is comprehensive economic sanctions, collectively and effectively implemented.

Iraq is vulnerable to sanctions. Its economy is based almost totally on the export of a single commodity, oil, through a limited number of identifiable outlets. That is why the action of Turkey and Saudi Arabia in preventing the export of Iraqi oil through the pipelines was of such critical importance. Other outlets are being effectively blockaded, and the embargo on the sale of oil from Iraq and Kuwait is so far working well.

Iraq is also heavily dependent on imports of food and other commodities; and it has limited currency reserves following the war with Iran. That is why it was so important to freeze Kuwait accounts and assets abroad on the very first day, and so prevent Iraq from exploiting them. Rigorous implementation of sanctions by the whole world is vital to make the policy work.

The leaders of Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Turkey have shown great steadfastness, as have the Gulf Co-operation Council and many members of the Arab League. Saudi Arabia and other members of OPEC have helpfully agreed to increase oil production substantially to compensate for the loss of Iraqi and Kuwaiti oil on the world market.

For a number of countries, backing sanctions will bring serious economic hardship. An international initiative to find financial and other ways to help them is already under way. I saw Secretary Brady yesterday to discuss that, and said that Britain would play its part; and while we must all contribute, it is only fitting that a special effort should be made by those who, for one reason or another, are not contributing to the multinational force in the Gulf.

I have been dealing with sanctions and their enforcement. The question has arisen whether further authority would need to be obtained from the Security Council for military action beyond that required to enforce sanctions.

We have acted throughout in accordance with international law, and we shall continue to do so. Resolution 661, which called for comprehensive economic sanctions, expressly affirms the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence, in response to the armed attack by Iraq against Kuwait, in accordance with article 51 of the United Nations charter. We hope that economic sanctions will prove to be sufficient. That is why they must be strictly enforced. But we are not precluded by reason of any of the Security Council resolutions from exercising the inherent right of collective self-defence in accordance with the rules of international law.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): This is the nub of the whole debate. As I understand it, what the right hon. Lady has said is that the United Nations charter, and the resolutions that have been passed, have already, here and now, given her legal authority, if it comes to it and it is decided, to take military action against Iraq. I take it that, if we vote in the right hon. Lady's Lobby tomorrow night, she will claim that to be an endorsement of that view. Is that her view? She knows the real anxiety. People think that America may go to war and Britain, which is quite a minor part of the operation, will be dragged into it before the House resumes.

The Prime Minister: The nub of the debate is to secure the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait and the legitimate restoration of the Government of Kuwait. [Interruption.] If the right hon. Gentleman will wait a moment, he will hear my view when I have finished this section of my speech.

May I repeat what I have said? We have acted throughout in accordance with international law and we shall continue to do so. I pointed out that resolution 661, which called for comprehensive economic sanctions, expressly affirms the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence in response to the armed attack by Iraq against Kuwait. [Interruption.] This is from the resolution, in accordance with article 51 of the United Nations charter.

We hope that economic sanctions will prove to be sufficient. That is why they must be strictly enforced. But we are not precluded, by reason of any of the Security Council resolutions, from exercising the inherent right of collective self-defence in accordance with the rules of international law.

To undertake now to use no military force without the further authority of the Security Council would be to deprive ourselves of a right in international law expressly affirmed by Security Council resolution 661; it would be to do injustice to the people of Kuwait, who are unable to use effective force themselves; it would be to hand an advantage to Saddam Hussein; and it could put our own forces in greater peril. For these reasons, I am not prepared to limit our legitimate freedom of action.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): If the Prime Minister is so sure about the rightness of her cause, why the reluctance to seek United Nations authority?

The Prime Minister: I have made my position absolutely clear. May I repeat it? To undertake now to use no military force without the further authority of the Security Council would be to deprive ourselves of a right in international law expressly affirmed by resolution 661; it would be to do injustice to the people of Kuwait, who are unable to use effective force themselves; it would be to hand an advantage to Saddam Hussein; and it could put our own forces in greater peril.

I have full legal authority for everything that I say on these matters, and for those reasons I am not willing to limit our legitimate freedom of action. I have made the position clear, and there is nothing further that I can add. For the reasons that I have given, I am not prepared to limit our legitimate freedom of action. If right hon. or hon. Members think to the contrary, I am sure that they will have time to put their views. My views have been approved by the topmost legal opinions that we can get.

Our first objective has been to make sanctions effective as a means of bringing pressure on Saddam Hussein to withdraw from Kuwait. Our second but no less urgent objective was to deter further Iraqi aggression. Saddam Hussein could have gone on to invade the north-eastern territories of Saudi Arabia and seize its oilfields. Had he succeeded in that, he could have taken the smaller Gulf states too. It is thanks to rapid action by the United States in sending forces to the area, and prompt support by Britain and France, that the aggressor has been halted.

We have worked throughout in the closest possible co-operation with the United States. I have been in frequent contact with President Bush, and my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and the Secretary of State for Defence have remained in the closest touch with their American colleagues. That pattern has been repeated at every diplomatic and military level. The President of the United States has given a lead that deserves the widest support; and the commitment of American forces has been on a tremendous scale.

The House will be familiar with Britain's response, which of course is on a much smaller scale—and I will summarise it briefly. We have deployed a squadron of Tornado F3 air defence aircraft, a squadron of Tornado ground attack aircraft, and a squadron of Jaguar aircraft for ground support. They are stationed in Saudi Arabia, Bahrain and Oman. They are backed up by VC10 tanker aircraft and Nimrod maritime patrol aircraft.

One Royal Navy destroyer and two frigates are in the Gulf. A second destroyer is on its way, as are three mine clearance vessels. There are also a number of support ships in attendance. A limited number of ground forces are deployed to defend airfields and to provide security generally.

That is already a valuable contribution to the defence of Saudi Arabia and the Gulf, but we believe some additional forces will be needed, and their composition is under consideration.

I wish to stress three points about our armed forces. First, they have been deployed in the area at the request of the Governments of Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and other Gulf states—and, in the case of Bahrain, that Government have invoked our treaty of friendship.

Secondly, they arrived quickly—a factor that contributed enormously to their effect, because the greatest need to deter was in the very early days of the crisis. That is a tribute to the efficiency, skill, and dedication of our service men and service women.

Thirdly, our forces are part of a much wider international effort, including not only United States forces but those of our European allies, of many Arab countries and others, including members of the Commonwealth. It is a truly multinational force.

The plight of British and other foreign nationals in Iraq and Kuwait has shocked everyone. Every norm of law, of diplomatic convention and of civilised behaviour has been offended by the way in which those citizens have been rounded up, treated as hostages, and used as a human shield. It is strange for someone who claims to be the leader of the Arab world, a latter-day Saladin, to hide behind women and children. Through the United Nations and bilaterally, we have done everything possible to press Iraq to let our people go, just as theirs are free to go from Britain. There has been particularly good co-operation with other European countries on this matter. The International Committee of the Red Cross is seeking but has not yet obtained the right of access to all hostages held in Iraq and Kuwait, which they are entitled to under the Geneva convention.

The recent release of some women and children is very welcome, and more are expected in the next few days. But they should never have been detained in the first place; and their release does not make the detention of their husbands, fathers and sons any less evil and reprehensible.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham-West): Has the Prime Minister seen the complaint in a letter to The Times today from one of the released hostages, which said that the British presence in Kuwait—the embassy—was not giving sufficient and proper advice to those people who remained? Secondly, it said that there has been no debriefing of those people who have come back from Kuwait. Will the Prime Minister tell us what action is being taken to debrief those who have fortunately been released? Thirdly, will she tell us why the British Airways flight was allowed to land in Kuwait five hours after the invasion had taken place? Why was it not warned and allowed to be diverted?

The Prime Minister: I shall answer the hon. Gentleman's questions in reverse order. The British Airways flight landed, its passengers disembarked, and the crew handed over to a successor crew and went to their hotels. All that took place before the invasion: the invasion was later. I think that there will be a letter setting out the full facts—a legal letter, so I cannot go further into the matter. Some people would most strenuously argue against some of the misinformation which has unfortunately occurred.

Secondly, with hindsight, people expected us to be able to give advice on things that we could not possibly foresee. Our embassy deserves praise. When it was suggested that our people should go to hotels, volunteers immediately went to those hotels to look after them. We did not know what would occur. There was no one there to meet them, so they returned to their homes. It is suggested that people should have been advised to try to escape. I do not know how the hon. Gentleman can think that we could possibly have given such advice. Will he recall that one of our citizens who tried to do that was shot dead? We have not even been able to recover his body.

The third matter that the hon. Gentleman raised was debriefing. These people arrived back at 4.45 in the morning, having suffered terrible experiences. I and all my right hon. Friends were concerned that somebody from the Department of Social Security should be at the airport to give immediate help if required, also doctors in case medical attention was needed, and that there should be someone there to get accommodation should that be needed. That was at 4.45 am. Had we attempted to debrief them then, we should have been extremely culpable. It would have been said that we were hard and unthinking. Many of those people have already reported, voluntarily, every single thing that they knew. Of course, we shall do everything that we can to ensure that we obtain as much information as possible because it may be helpful to others.

The hon. Gentleman's criticisms are not well-founded, and I should like to thank our people in Kuwait.

The recent release, as I said, is welcome, but these people should not have been detained. Their release does not make the detention of their husbands, fathers and sons any less evil and reprehensible.

Our ambassador and his staff in Baghdad are doing their utmost to help and protect our people. In Kuwait, we and nearly 30 other countries have refused to comply with Iraq's utterly illegal attempt to close foreign embassies.

Although our embassy is surrounded by armed soldiers, and its water and electricity cut off, our ambassador and his small staff of volunteers continue to offer what help they can to the beleaguered British community. The House —most of it—will join me in paying tribute to their work, and, even more so, to the courage and fortitude of all the British people in both countries who are living through this terrible time. Our thoughts go also to their families. We are all very grateful to the work done by the helpline run by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) and others. It is splendid work, and we thank the many volunteers who have given their time and effort.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley): The Prime Minister just mentioned the helpline. We all agree that it has been marvellous and has helped in all our constituencies. Does the Prime Minister agree, however, that the families of the people affected should be able to use "Freefone", so that obtaining the information that they need does not cause their telephone bills to build up?

The Prime Minister: As well as the helpline—which, I believe, is turning itself into a charity so that we are better able to supply it with money voluntarily—there is a 24-hour emergency unit at the Foreign Office which I believe people can telephone without expense.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. William Waldegrave): Not yet.

The Prime Minister: They cannot telephone without expense yet; however, they are telephoning. People are on duty there for 24 hours a day, and are receiving many calls. We are doing everything possible in that regard.

Mr. Robert Hayward (Kingswood) rose——

The Prime Minister: I shall give way to my hon. Friend; I hope that then I can get on with the rest of my speech.

Mr. Hayward: May I thank my right hon. Friend for her comments about the efforts of the helpline and all its helpers? May I also clarify the position in relation to charitable trusts? We are in the process of forming such a trust, and, if we have enough money we shall give assistance to those who face financial difficulties as a result of the actions taken in Iraq and Kuwait.

The Prime Minister: I believe that I am right in saying that the Foreign Office is also giving some money to help the helpline in its very valuable work.

We shall do our utmost to obtain the freedom of the hostages, keeping their plight constantly before the world. We shall not give in to threats and blackmail. We have made it known that we shall hold Saddam Hussein and Iraqi officials individually responsible at law under the Geneva conventions—to which Iraq is a party—for any harm that befalls them.

I believe that the House will agree that we cannot be deflected from the determined course of action on which we have embarked, and which alone will ensure that the aggressor is not allowed to benefit from his crime. Indeed, by taking hostages, and by his treatment of them, Saddam Hussein only increases the world's abhorrence and stiffens its determination not to let aggression succeed.

Our resolve, and that of our partners and allies, to bring about Iraq's withdrawal from Kuwait and the restoration of the legitimate Government is absolute. There can be no compromise solutions which limit or diminish that objective, and attempts to devise them only postpone the moment when Iraq realises that there is no option but to withdraw.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Will the Prime Minister give way?

The Prime Minister: I would prefer to go on, because I am now biting into other Members' time.

There are also some wider lessons to be drawn from these events. First, I believe that the whole House will welcome the prompt and effective manner in which the United Nations has responded to this crisis. At last we are seeing the United Nations act with the determination and purpose that its founders envisaged. I cannot remember a time when we had the whole world so strongly together against an action as now.

Secondly, I would make particular mention of the part played by the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council. They have worked together to an unprecedented degree to ensure that United Nations action is effective. I believe that in this we are seeing the first results of post-cold war diplomacy: confrontation has been replaced by a new atmosphere of co-operation. We would never have succeeded in getting this response three or four years ago. We hope that the forthcoming meeting between President Bush and President Gorbachev will further strengthen this new accord.

Thirdly, some of the countries bordering Iraq are facing severe difficulties from the flood of refugees—Egyptians, Indians, Pakistanis and Bangladeshis, already numbering hundreds of thousands—all fleeing from Saddam Hussein. Those countries, and the refugees themselves, need help until their passage home can be arranged. I can announce today an immediate contribution of a further £2 million to the relevant international organisations. That brings our refugee relief from this crisis so far to £5·4 million.

Fourthly, we must not lose sight of other fundamental issues in the region, above all the need for a just solution to the Palestinian problem. Unfortunately, the Palestinians' support for Iraq's action in seizing the territory of another state has grievously damaged their cause, but nevertheless these events must not stop us from trying to find a solution to this long-standing issue. Peace and security will not come to the region until it is solved.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Will the Prime Minister give way?

The Prime Minister: I should like to get on and finish my speech now.

Fifthly, we will need to look to the future, the time when Iraq has withdrawn from Kuwait, as it must, and the legitimate Government have been restored. There will then need to be arrangements to ensure Kuwait's security and that of other countries in the region. I believe that this will need to involve the United Nations, and it is not too early to plan for this situation now.

Sixthly, while east-west relations have improved enormously, these events remind us that dangers can arise elsewhere in the world, and we must always have a strong defence and the capability to operate beyond the borders of NATO, for threats to our security can arise there just as much as in Europe.

Seventhly, we must renew our efforts to outlaw not only the use of chemical weapons but their possession, and no effort must be spared to prevent Iraq from obtaining the materials or technology to manufacture nuclear weapons.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the Prime Minister give way?

The Prime Minister: No. I am not far from the end of my speech and I intend to go straight through to the end of it.

The crisis also underlines the importance of continuing international efforts to prevent the spread of ballistic missiles.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

The Prime Minister: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, very specially.

Mr. Heffer: Will the right hon. Lady explain why it was that, when the Kurds were gassed and chemical weapons were used against them—I know that this Government made protests—the United States, for example, ensured that that was not discussed in the Security Council at the time, when there should have been a great movement by the entire world against that terrible thing which Saddam Hussein did?

The Prime Minister: There should, and we were one of the countries. Indeed, I think that we were the country that made the most vigorous protests in every forum where we were. That was quite right. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for bringing out the point that it was we who made the most vigorous protests.

In the coming weeks we must persist in the determination that we have shown hitherto. There will be those who say that the international effort is costing too much and is not worth it. Some people will forget the awfulness of what Saddam Hussein has done. There will be calls for compromise, attempts to fudge the issues and blur the principles, attempts to undermine the virtually unanimous opposition of the world to what Iraq has done. Of course we prefer a peaceful solution, but that must involve Iraq's total and unconditional withdrawal from Kuwait and the restoration of the lawful Government.

[The Prime Minister]

Let us not forget that in Saddam Hussein we are dealing with a person who, without warning, has gone into the territory of another state with tanks, guns and aircraft, has fought and taken that state against international law and against the will of its people. A person who will take such action against one state will take it against another if he is not stopped and his invasion reversed.

We are dealing with a person who has rejected the efforts of the Secretary-General of the United Nations to achieve a peaceful solution on the basis of the United Nations' resolutions.

We are dealing with a person who plunged his country into eight years of war against Iran, costing the lives of countless thousands of Iraq's young men—and many hundreds of thousands more casualties—without achieving anything other than destruction and desolation.

We are dealing with a man who has used chemical weapons even against his own people. Such a man must be stopped; and we shall persevere until he is.

3.14 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I, first, join the Prime Minister in her tribute to the late Ian Gow? Clearly he was not a political soulmate of mine, but from the earliest time that I met him—indeed, before he came to the House—I recognised him as a very likeable man and a man of considerable integrity. By killing him, his murderers showed not their strength in the face of democracy but their weakness.

I and my right hon. and hon. Friends have, as the Prime Minister said, suffered two very severe blows in recent weeks with the death of Pat Wall, after a long and very painful illness, and the tragic death yesterday of Allen Adams.

Pat was a man of courage and great humour and his ability to show both, even at a time of terrible illness, was an enormous tribute to him.

Allen Adams was a young man who was well liked and well respected in the House, in his constituency and elsewhere. The suddenness of his death has left myself and my colleagues numb. We send our deepest sympathy and our great sorrow to his wife and, indeed, to Pat's wife and to Ian's wife.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the Prime Minister for agreeing to my request that Parliament be recalled to discuss the situation in the Gulf and its implications. This two-day debate will, I am sure, be wide ranging, as Members on both sides will want to raise a multiplicity of genuine and important concerns ranging from the most global to the most personal and local.

For me, in my contribution, the main focus of the debate must be on the most effective ways of depriving the Iraqi dictator and his regime of any military, economic, political or other gain from their aggression and of preventing him from posing any future threat to the stability and security of the region.

Our unrelenting purposes must be to ensure that Saddam Hussein gets out of Kuwait and legitimate government is restored in that country, that the hostages—all the hostages—are released, that our diplomatic staff, who have shown such great fortitude, be allowed to go about their normal business, and that the United Nations resolutions are unconditionally fulfilled and commitments to stability and security in the region are put into effect. There can be no possibilities of concessions on any of those objectives.

The aggression of Saddam Hussein, his treatment of innocents, the record of his regime and his oppression of the Iraqi and Kurdish people over many years forbid anything but that implacable attitude from this side of the House.

As both I and my right hon. Friends have made clear, we consider that in the circumstances arising from the invasion of Kuwait the action taken in the United Nations and in the commitment of forces was right. In the very nature of Saddam Hussein's aggression, slowness or modesty in response would have been an invitation to him to continue over other borders and into greater excesses. If that had occurred, the task of achieving the purposes of the United Nations resolutions would have been even more complex, even more arduous and even more dangerous than it is now.

If the only response of the world community had been economic sanctions and political condemnation, those actions and words, no matter how strong, would not have had the necessary effect in halting Saddam Hussein's military adventure. All that, to us, is self-evident. Cumulatively, it is the reason for the unprecedented firmness and solidarity of the actions of the United Nations and for the equally strong and equally common reaction of the British people.

There is, of course, natural and justifiable anxiety about the crisis. It is felt most deeply—indeed, desperately—by those poor people whose loved ones have been or still are the hostages of Saddam Hussein. The feelings of those people cannot fail to have an effect on the thinking of all of us in the House. I am sure that Ministers and other hon. Members take the fullest account of the requests that we have had from the hostages and from their families that we should all be measured in our approach, careful in our use of language and persistent in efforts to restore the freedom of those people now held by Saddam Hussein.

The feelings of concern among the people very directly caught up in the events, and in the wider public, are deep and realistic, as well they may be when the possibility of war remains and when it is widely understood that such a war could cause horrific devastation—at its worst, devastation on a scale and of a nature that the world has scarcely ever seen before.

There are other pronounced feelings. They are not simplistic, nor are they bellicose, but they are feelings of great determination. First, there is the very deep-seated conviction that aggression must not pay. All personal encounters with the general public and all measures of opinion testify to that. Both the generation that experienced the 1930s and the 1940s and later generations like my own that did not witness appeasement and war are agreed, across the age barriers, on that.

Secondly, there is a feeling that, while no advantages of any description arise from the action of Saddam Hussein, the co-operation between powers that were, until a short time ago, deadlocked in cold war offers a new prospect for international security. I believe that we in the House should not simply recognise these growing feelings—we should lead them by playing a full part in developing a new and practical design for international peace and order.

Thirdly, Mr. Speaker, it is clear that, in response to Saddam Hussein's aggression, the British people—like the world community in general—share the overwhelming conviction that intense pressure must be rigorously sustained against Saddam Hussein and his regime. Iraq's isolation must be complete. That course is supported not only as a way of avoiding or reducing bloodshed but as the best means of securing an acceptable and enduring outcome to the crisis. The widespread and, in our view, entirely correct approach is that sanctions should be given the fullest possible opportunity of working in order to make Saddam Hussein completely fulfil the requirements of the United Nations resolutions.

There is a widespread and deeply held understanding that the support for securing the objectives, and the action needed to secure those objectives, involve a long haul. Strong sanctions can, of course, have a particular effect against the Saddam regime. Iraq has to rely on imports for well over 80 per cent. of its basic materials. It is dependent for well over 95 per cent. of its export earnings upon the sale of oil, 88 per cent. of which flows through just two pipelines, one through Turkey, the other through Saudi Arabia. In pursuit of the United Nations policy, we have to ensure, with the rest of the world community, that, for the duration, Iraq cannot sell anything to anyone, buy anything from anyone or raise credit from anywhere.

That latter point has not, thus far, had the attention that it properly deserves. The fact is that Iraq, because of its oil wealth, is naturally regarded as a good credit risk. Indeed, so good is it that it is conceivable that—if effective action is not taken—Iraq could have access to substantial credit for a year or even more. That financial tap must be completely turned off. There must be no exceptions.

Clearly, the besieging of Iraq has had and will have grave effects on other economies—most especially on its poorer neighbours and on those who have to rely for a significant part of their income on remittances of their citizens who have been working in Iraq and Kuwait. Substantial and speedy aid must be given to such economies, both for the relief of suffering and to ensure that the force of economic circumstances does not impel them into relaxing the embargo. I hope that, even before that form of support is fully installed, Governments will quickly and generously give help to refugees and private citizens will support Oxfam, the Catholic Fund for Overseas Development and other aid charities in their efforts in the emergency refugee programmes.

I was gratified to note in what the Prime Minister said this afternoon that additional sums are to be made available. I hope that the matter will be kept continually under review because the prospects of mass starvation and of disease as refugees go to the border must horrify us all.

The need to help the poorer economies cope with the economic effects of the Gulf crisis is clearly an obligation on all the richer countries of the world. Mr. Brady's mission is welcome as a reminder to a variety of economies. I must also say that it is the particular duty of the strongest economies in the world—Japan and the Federal Republic of Germany.

Everyone will naturally understand the increasing pressures in the German economy as unification approaches. Everyone will also appreciate the desire of the Japanese people not to compromise their constitution. But as both countries are most certainly part of the world democratic community, as both have very direct interests in achieving the fulfilment of the United Nations resolutions and as both can take economic action without transgressing their constitutions, that action of support must be taken on a generous scale, and I trust that every opportunity will be used by our Government and by other Governments to press that case and to achieve a constructive response.

In the course of the weeks since the invasion of Kuwait, the issue of the extent of the mandate under article 51 of the United Nations charter has naturally attracted attention and raised important questions. The Prime Minister addressed herself to that question. Clearly it must be right for us to consider those questions in this Parliament. Even as we do so, there will, in the process of discussion, be absolutely no reassurance for Saddam Hussein. On the contrary, as far as I am concerned, the issue of this aspect of the debate is how his aggression can be dealt with most completely and conclusively. It is success that we are after.

In the public discussion that has taken place thus far on this issue, two opinions have had greatest prominence. Some assert that there is no essential need for a further specific resolution of the Security Council because, they say, the specified in article 51 of the UN charter, gives all necessary authority for any future military action. Others say that there can be absolutely no further military action without an additional specific resolution.

I believe that in the current circumstances, it is not wise to approach the matter from either of those two absolutes. Neither by itself fully addresses both the legal and the political issues at stake. It is those political issues which must unavoidably be taken into account by anyone who wants to ensure that the objectives of the United Nations and, I believe, of just about everyone in this House, are fully realised.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): I am rather puzzled, the right hon. Gentleman having admitted that he requested the recall of the House, why there is nothing on the Order Paper in his name or in that of his right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman)—[Interruption.] I put it to him that on the specific point with which he is dealing, he does not wish a vote to take place because he is uncertain that he would get the support of the majority of his hon. Friends—[Interruption.]—because they would be no more prepared to defy Saddam Hussein than they have been prepared in the past to defy the tyrants in the trade union movement.

Mr. Kinnock: Because of the noise, I did not hear much of what the hon. Gentleman said in that intervention, but I do not think that I missed anything. I do not know what form of leadership in life in general he is used to, but I must tell him that if there is a Division tomorrow on the motion before the House, I shall most certainly be voting for the Adjournment. I have made that clear all along and there is absolutely no reason for me to change my view. If the hon. Gentleman will listen to the further development of my case, who knows, he may not only be in the same lobby as I, but be there for the same reasons as I shall be there.

I was drawing the attention of the House to what I believe are essential political considerations. The first political consideration of great significance is that the forceful action of the world community, as the Prime Minister said, has resulted from the unprecedented agreement in the Security Council of the United Nations. I do not think that anyone underestimates either the powerful effect or the great possibilities arising from that. The idea of a new world order is shifting from the realms of idealism into the realms of realism.

But it must be said that if military action were taken when sanctions had been in force for only a matter of weeks or months, or when there had been no further provocation, or when there had been no further effort to achieve agreement to a mandate to attack, either in the Security Council or in the military staff committee, that military action could shatter the consensus that has been built.

The new concept of international security would be jeopardised when it was scarcely more than a prototype. The prospects for gaining a new "security structure", which Secretary James Baker has advocated with strong and compelling conviction in his testimony before the Congressional Committee this week, would be greatly dimmed.

In the Soviet Union and China, those forces that are most resistant to co-operation would gleefully enjoy and fully exploit the breakdown, to the disadvantage of leaderships that have come this far in the wake of the cold war. I believe that those crucial considerations and understood in the United States and here and among other countries. I believe that the scale of the risk of political and other losses is recognised.

I do not believe that those considerations forbid all possibility of a strike being made at some time. There are, without question, other pressures present in these conditions, and it would be foolish to ignore them. Even the patent desire of the American leaders to achieve peaceful resolution could not and should not give us a false sense of security, especially in conditions of such speed of movement and considerable danger.

All I do say is that, as we are the first generation ever to have been presented with what Secretary Baker has called the "opportunity to solidify the ground rules of the new order", of "enduring peace that is global in its scope",

we had better appreciate the potential for progress in full. We had therefore better think very hard and politically before risking that potential on the basis of even the most distinguished and technically correct legal advice about the extent of article 51.

Saddam Hussein throughout his life—since, we understand, his youngest days as a party functionary, before he discovered or invented a uniform to put on—has been a terrible force for destruction. He must be defeated, but everything possible must be done to try to ensure that in the course of defeating him we do not allow him to be the cause of destroying the beginnings of a new and better world order.

The second political consideration relates to the implications in the region—the middle east and the Gulf area—of taking further military action without further United Nations authority. The fact that legitimacy, the standing of international law, is, in itself, not just a legal issue but an important political one, must not be neglected. With regard to the legalities, it is clear that military action under article 51 is lawful if the now exiled but "legitimate" Government of Kuwait call for it.

Such action is lawful if Saddam Hussein launches further military aggression against any state or armed forces. It is lawful if, at some time, the United Nations judges that the action taken thus far has been "inadequate" for the purpose of fulfilling its resolutions, in which case military action under article 42 of the charter could be taken, either by reference to the Security Council or the military staff committee, or both.

Those who say that there cannot be a public declaration of the possibility of a strike do not take into full account the reason for the existence of the military staff committee. Given the military realities, if it were acceptable that a strike took place against an aggressive enemy, the process would be much more likely to go through the MSC than the Security Council.

The lawful opportunities are without contention. In addition, there are those who say that, on the basis of legal advice, it could be successfully—"technically" is the word the Prime Minister has used—argued that the fact that armed attack has already taken place enables those who have come to the aid of Kuwait to undertake armed attack themselves whenever they deem it necessary. I ask those who hold that view—I know that many hold it sincerely, as a result of their professional experience of the law, and are taken seriously—to consider their position further. I ask them to recognise that, for the purpose not just of getting Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait, but, vitally, of ensuring durable security, it may not be enough to be able to argue, on the basis of legal advice, that a mandate already exists for an attack.

Such legal advice that an inherent right of self defence exists may well be convincing to a Government, Parliament, a court of law or a newspaper in a democracy. It may be possible for calm consideration to take place and the pros and cons of interpretation to be put. That is one, among many, of the immense advantages of democracy by comparison with any other form of government. However, it is not only such bodies of opinion and judgment that have to be convinced in the current conditions. That is not a semantic point or a nicety, but a fact which, realistically, could determine the nature of the outcome of the crisis.

The outcome that we seek—I think that this is a widespread ambition—and the outcome that is necessary for security in the Gulf and stability in the world, cannot be limited only to the liberation of Kuwait, the freeing of the hostages and the removal of Saddam Hussein's ability to mount further military aggression. The outcome that is necessary extends to completely depriving Saddam Hussein of any extra status or any gain to his reputation in the eyes of other Arabs, including those who, for reasons we understand, have long imbibed distrust of the western powers and those who associate with us.

We should all like to be able to help to achieve conditions in which the judgment made by many Arab people was different. But we have to recognise the current reality that the potential consequences of taking action that does not have complete and unarguable United Nations authority include further turmoil, terrorism, an increase in nationalism and fundamentalism, and possibly the destabilising of strategic allies. These are the reasons why it is important strategically, and not because of an intractable dispute between both sides of the House over the precise legalities, that everything possible is done to ensure that, if further military action is necesssary, it should be taken under the full authority of the United Nations.

The only existing but recent precedent must encourage consideration of that view. In the weeks following the invasion of Kuwait the Labour party, through my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), repeatedly said that the powers of naval interdiction necessary to enforce a maritime blockade of Iraq would best be exercised through a specific resolution of the Security Council. The view was advanced by others, both in the Government and elsewhere, that it could be argued with sufficient legal authority that there was an adequate resolution already in place.

On reflection, the Government wisely decided, to their credit, that an explicit resolution would give greater legitimacy and force to any necessary naval intervention. They rightly co-operated in securing resolution 665. That resolution was adopted on 25 August. Only two days later, on 27 August, Saddam Hussein ordered Iraqi tanker skippers to submit to the naval blockade. As I said earlier, the case that we make on appropriate United Nations authority is related not to any abstraction but directly to the effectiveness of action against the aggressor, Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the strengthening of United Nations authority in the way in which we are proceeding offers Saddam Hussein an advantage if he were to comply with the United Nations resolutions? The United Nations, so strengthened, could begin to settle some of the other middle eastern disputes, especially that with Israel, which are long outstanding. It would be in Saddam Hussein's interests as well to reinforce United Nations peacekeeping operations.

Mr. Kinnock: That is a good point, tellingly made. It is one which we hope will have a wider impact, and it is interesting that in the House there is an even more general understanding of the validity of the argument that the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) advances that there was only a few weeks ago. That atmosphere and that sense of strength of the international community are rightly being encouraged in the current circumstances.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): My right hon. Friend is making an extremely powerful case for a new world political order for the 21st century after the east-west conflicts have been removed. Does he recall that the Prime Minister tells us consistently and persistently about the failure of appeasement before the second world war? Does the right hon. Lady recall that there was also a great failure in political collective security, which is what my right hon. Friend is advocating?

Mr. Kinnock: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that intervention. I think that everybody understands, including the Prime Minister—I mean no disrepect to the right hon. Lady, but the period to which my hon. Friend has referred was a formative one for her, as it would have been for anyone of that age at that time —that in thinking—[Interruption.] It is extraordinary that we still cannot refer to a woman's age, even in this place, without getting a laugh. At the same time we can say anything that we like about a man's age. Is not that strange?

The Prime Minister has drawn strongly on her abomination of appeasement—rightly, in my view—and her understanding of the failure of international resolve in the League of Nations before the second world war. As circumstances change, she may be among those who are more than ready to subscribe strength to the idea of an effective, workable and enforceable international order. I believe that the right hon. Lady can be sufficently forward looking to make that position common between both sides of the House as it is patently of such good sense in terms of the welfare of this country, every other country and all generations.

I am anxious to move on, as I do not want to take up the time of the House when so many hon. Members wish to speak. Many approaches have been postulated in the debate about the directions of policy and action that need to be followed in the conditions arising after the resolution of the immediate crisis. At this juncture, I simply say that, whatever happens after the immediate objectives of the United Nations resolutions have been achieved, it should be founded on the basic fact that the current crisis is a direct result of the invasion of Kuwait and of the wider threat posed to the region by Iraq. Consequently, our dual interrelated purposes must be to accomplish the clearance from Kuwait and to secure the dissolution of that threat.

It is essential, therefore, that, after the primary objectives of the United Nations resolutions have been attained, there must be, first, a complete and sustained embargo imposed both on arms sales and on the provision of arms manufacturing equipment to Iraq. Secondly, Iraq's chemical weapons and its chemical weapon manufacturing capacity must be destroyed. Thirdly, provision must be made for the thorough and continual monitoring of the nuclear plant and weapons-making capability of Iraq. Fourthly—this is not an exhaustive list —Iraq must make reparations, especially to the poor countries that have been further impoverished by its aggression.

I realise that there are those who, even though they want the United Nations objectives to be achieved, say that embargoes, weapon and plant destruction, and international monitoring and reparations are steps too far. To them I say that the nature and the scale of the actions to be taken following the achievement of the immediate UN objectives must relate to the nature and the scale not only of the proven aggression, but of the actual and potential threat in the region. Action to respond to and to prevent the extension of the aggression was and is justified. Action to prevent the continuation of the regional threat is also justified.

It will not be vindictiveness—it will be a basic requirement of justice, order and security. It will not be an unwarranted intervention in the internal affairs of a sovereign country—it will be the legitimate exercise of preventive power by an international community which has suffered, and could again experience, the results of the most unwarranted form of intervention—the armed invasion and occupation of one country by another.

The fate of Saddam Hussein may well—indeed, is most likely to—be affected by the implementation of such reprisals for his actions. There are many who would understandably include his downfall among their list of publicly stated objectives. I think that it would be far better for them to understand that, however much we long for the ending of tyranny, we cannot include that among our motives in the case of Iraq, as that would amount to a determination to impose a form of government on what is an offending but, nonetheless, sovereign country.

Saddam Hussein may well retain his position in his country in the wake of this crisis. However, he cannot be allowed to retain his power to jeopardise the region. The crisis has been inflicted upon the world by the ambition and aggression of Saddam Hussein. No one will be unaffected by the economic effects of what the Iraqi dictator has done. Millions of people in his country and elsewhere are experiencing and will experience great misery because of his actions. Some, including refugee children, have already died and thousands have lost their liberty. The world must now impose its will upon Saddam Hussein. His defeat must be a victory for the international community. I know that I, my party and, I am sure, the great majority of the British people want to assist in achieving that victory.

Mr. Edward Heath (Old Bexley and Sidcup): It is natural, at a time of crisis, that the country as well as Members of the House should wish to see the House united in its view. I do not today, or tomorrow, see any difficulty about that.

The view that has been expressed in the House and in the country about the invasion of Kuwait is unanimous. The outstanding characteristic of the crisis is that it has been handled by, and is under the control of, the United Nations. That is something which has not happened for many years.

We may therefore forgive those who are somewhat sceptical or cynical at that event when they look back over the past decade and see the number of occasions when matters equally serious have occurred in which no leadership has been given by the United States or by Europe.

As a result, we see a situation in which the President of Iraq may well have made a false judgment about the invasion of Kuwait. If his attack on Iran produced no very great reaction from the western world, and if his use of poison gas in his own country and elsewhere produced no very great reaction, why should the occupation of a small country such as Kuwait produce any great reaction? The fact that it has produced a world reaction—as I say, under the control of the United Nations—cannot fail to make an impact, not only on the President of Iraq, but also on his generals and his supporters in his own country.

We therefore come to the question stated by the Leader of the Opposition to be at the heart of the matter—the use of articles 51 and 42. There is nothing new about that. There was argument about that at various legal levels, right up to the highest, at the time of the Suez crisis and there were those who always had doubts about some of the legal recommendations.

My point of view today is that for practical purposes we can agree. I do not see why we should differ on legal questions of this kind. As I have said, the characteristic is that this is under the control of the United Nations and, for practical purposes, it is there that we wish it to remain and where it must remain. For those practical purposes, therefore, the United Nations must be the governing force.

One must look at the practical questions. If, for example, Saddam Hussein were tonight to launch an attack on Saudi Arabia or on any other part of the Gulf, the response must be militarily immediate. There can be no question about it. We would be absolutely justified, with the Americans and our allies, in taking that action. What is more, I hope that we would, as far as we possibly could in a month, be prepared to take it. Let us not think for a moment that it would be very agreeable or that the results would be other than bloody, because they would be, from many points of view, but that surely is unanswerable as a position.

On the other hand, if there is no direct attack by the President of Iraq on any country, and he remains in his stationary position while sanctions go on, it is difficult to imagine a position in which we would launch a deliberate attack without at least having the authority of the United Nations. That seems to me, from the practical point of view, to be a perfectly clear situation and there is no need for the House to divide itself on that question when we are dealing with such practical matters.

With regard to the other issues, I would ask that the Government, who have acted speedily and efficiently with America and her allies, should be cautious—as, perhaps, should the Leader of the Opposition, too—about the commitments that they make at this stage.

One of the advantages of the House meeting a month after the start of this episode rather than when it began is that it is able to view the matter in better proportions and in perspective. No one can tell what the solution to the crisis will be. If Governments and Oppositions over-commit themselves, the possibility of reaching a solution that will be acceptable will be greatly diminished. I ask for caution in that respect.

I refer to the situation in Kuwait in 1961, which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister also mentioned. As Lord Privy Seal at the Foreign Office, I was responsible for negotiating Kuwait's independence. We always had a private understanding that, if there were to be any serious threat from Iraq, which was the only likely quarter, we would be in a position immediately to reinforce Kuwait because we were still in Bahrain, Aden and Cyprus and could quickly take action. That was always understood. Therefore, when, in the summer of 1961, the Iraqis started massing forces along the Kuwaiti border, we, in close conjunction with the Emir, took immediate action. The result was that the Iraqis withdrew. However, that was not a permanent solution, in Kuwait's view or in ours.

The permanent solution was found by the Arab League—by the Arab countries themselves getting together and saying, "We must have a means of guaranteeing the security of Kuwait as well as that of other countries, and then we can ask the British to withdraw." Having reached such an agreement, the Arab League asked us to withdraw, and we did so. That was part of the understanding in respect of Kuwait's independence.

I ask that we be careful in making absolute commitments, because on this occasion it is possible that Arab countries themselves will work out a solution to the security of their own region. That will not be easy, but it has been done on previous occasions. I refer to the disputes between Abu Dhabi and Saudi Arabia. They were sorted out, as were the disputes between the emirates, and between Bahrain and Qatar. They have been sorted out in the past two decades, and I hope that it will be possible for the Arab countries themselves to find a permanent solution to their stability and security.

There is no doubt that that is what King Hussein of Jordan and many others want. I believe that such a development would be welcomed by the Saudi Government, who have themselves made plain—in a speech by the Saudi defence minister last weekend—that they do not want to see an attack being made on Iraq unless those concerned are forced into taking such action because of an attack by Iraq itself.

I was glad that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister raised the question of Israel and the Palestinians, because in my view it will not be possible to reach permanent stability and security in the middle east unless the question of the Palestinians and of Israel is first settled. I was pleased that the American Secretary of State said so himself in his speech to the congressional committee. He was quite clear and plain about the matter.

If the Americans are now prepared to use all their power and influence to make Israel observe the United Nations resolutions—and resolution 242 in particular—in the same way that we are saying that the resolutions concerning Iraq must be observed—that marks a major change in American policy, which can contribute to the peace and stability that both the American President and Secretary of State have said they want to see in the middle east. Again, it will not be easy to achieve that, but it is an essential part of the solution.

There are those who say that the two should not be connected—it is perfectly understandable that Israel is among them—but that does not alter the fact that many of the stresses and strains in the middle east are connected with the question of Israel and the Palestinians. Therefore, I strongly support the Government's action and I strongly urge them now to continue—as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said in her broadcast on Sunday—operating sanctions. My right hon. Friend said herself that it will take some time to make them as effective as possible

The one proviso that I have concerns Jordan. I personally feel that King Hussein has been badly treated by the American President and by some western countries. He is in no way responsible for the situation or for the crisis, yet his people and country are suffering above all at this particular time. It is not enough to say, "We'll give you some money." Jordan desperately needs food and equipment, but above all it needs an organisation to deal with refugees going into the country. It is not sufficient for us to say, "Well, the Red Cross can help or this or that organisation can do it."

The present situation demands two things. First, a major airlift is needed, which should be centrally organised and ceaseless, like the airlift we organised to Berlin, so that we can get all these people out—incidentally, we could try to increase our staff in Baghdad to help the excellent ambassador there. Secondly, we need to deal with the hundreds of thousands of refugees in Jordan and to get them satisfactorily dispersed. That will mean dealing with a large number of countries. Many refugees come from Indonesia, from other Arab countries and some are from Europe. It is a major operation to arrange their dispersal and it will not be met by contributions to individual charitable bodies but requires a centrally, and highly organised, operation of aircraft and personnel. I hope that the British Government will give a lead to bring that about.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): It always seems to be my lot to have to follow the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) in debates on events such as this. It is a difficult task, because he says so much with which I profoundly agree. I do not think that there was a word in his speech with which I would find fault. I hope that the Prime Minister will have listened carefully to the right hon. Gentleman's words about calling on the Government to provide a lead on the issue of refugees.

Having requested the recall of Parliament for the past two or three weeks, my colleagues and I are naturally delighted to have the opportunity to debate this important crisis. Anyone who has listened to the previous three speeches will recognise that this is a serious debate and that, so far, speeches have dealt with the issue with great seriousness and concern. I have a great deal to say which echoes the tone and much of the content of those speeches.

The invasion of Kuwait by Saddam Hussein was a brutal and tyrannous act which contravenes international law, threatens the stability of the Middle East and poses a potent and immediate threat to the peace of the world. My party joins all the other parties in the House in expressing an implacable determination to ensure that Saddam Hussein is defeated in this aggression. The Prime Minister is right: there can be no compromises on the terms of the United Nations resolutions that Hussein's troops must unconditionally withdraw from Kuwait, that Kuwait must be returned to its legitimate Government and that foreign hostages must all be freed.

The Prime Minister has said that the Government's aims in this crisis are, similarly, those and only those laid out in the United Nations resolutions. In that, they are also fully supported by hon. Members on these Benches. The Government also receive and have received our unequivocal support for the actions that they took with the United States and others to respond to Saudi Arabia's request for help, by sending troops to join the multinational forces five weeks ago today. In our view, the swift and decisive action taken then by Britain the United States and others to put deterrent forces in place to prevent further aggression by Saddam Hussein was necessary and right.

The fact that that action was later backed up by a United Nations resolution, which expressed international condemnation of Hussein and gave effect to the means by which sanctions should be enforced, has greatly strengthened the hands of those who now oppose Saddam Hussein and has given hope to those people who believe, as we do, in an enhanced role in the future for the United Nations in preserving world peace.

The Government are entitled to feel satisfaction with their handling of the first military phase of this crisis. We are now in the second, political phase. We have to win this phase as comprehensively as we won the military phase, because it is only by building the strongest international consensus now that we shall establish the strength to ensure that sanctions can be made to bite later.

I especially congratulate the Foreign Secretary on his recent visit to the Gulf, and on the care with which he has been concerned at all times to build up maximum international support for our position. He has remained calm and measured: the voice of reason on all occasions. He appears to understand the vital importance of this attitude in the more difficult political phase of the crisis. He has also been well aware that, however welcome, the close co-operation between this country and the United States, which has been necessary during this crisis, Britain's best interests are as a European power acting primarily in concert with our European partners in the long term.

[Mr. Paddy Ashdown]

I urge the Prime Minister to resist any temptation that she may feel to argue that this crisis is a reason for resurrecting a nostalgic illusion of a special relationship with the United States at the expense of fulfilling our destiny in a closely integrated Europe. In the political phase of this crisis, it is vital that we strengthen international—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House to give the right hon. Member a fair hearing.

Mr. Ashdown: In this phase of the crisis, it is vital that we not only strengthen international consensus to provide a foundation for the actions that will be necessary over the next few months, but that we also effectively deny Saddam Hussein his most potent propaganda weapon. The world must know that this is not just a United States/British action. In our attitudes, we have perhaps done too little to stress the international nature of our operation. Frankly, we could be doing much more to emphasise the Arab components in the multinational force. It must be made clear that, if Saddam Hussein attacks, he will be fighting fellow Arabs as well as the western forces.

I hope that no one will underestimate the courage that many Arab states have shown in standing up to Saddam Hussein, often at great cost to themselves. In the west, we should demonstrate that we are sensitive to the views of moderate Arab states and especially to their concerns about the future of the holy places.

The United Nations has rightly chosen sanctions as the weapon to defeat Saddam Hussein. We are told, and the Prime Minister has just repeated it, that that is Government policy and United States policy. That is all very well, but sanctions must be given a chance to work. The Prime Minister has said that that may take a few months. Mr. Jim Baker, the United States Secretary of State, made it clear on Tuesday that it would take a considerable time, and that is what he asked of the American people. We must also provide a considerable time to allow sanctions to work. I doubt if they will really start to bite until perhaps the end of this year at the earliest, and will probably not develop their full effect until some time after that, but I repeat that they must be given the chance and the time to work.

I think that it is right for us to contemplate what action we should take to fulfil the terms of the UN resolutions if sanctions do not work. As all three of the previous speakers have already said, that is the nub and heart of today's debate, bringing us full face with the issue of whether and in what circumstances force ought to be used.

First, I agree with the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup—that, if any further aggression is initiated by Saddam Hussein, it should be clear that the multinational forces will feel free immediately to respond against him with the full measure of our military capability in the area. If such a response to Hussein's further aggression should open a military possibility of freeing Kuwait, well and good—the Government can be sure of the support of my party in any such action—but what about the use of force initiated by the multinational forces if sanctions in the end are seen to fail?

Those who are not prepared to countenance the use of force in such circumstances must be prepared to countenance the possibility that Saddam Hussein will be allowed to hang on to the ill-gotten gains of his tyranny —and that is unacceptable to my hon. Friends. We accept, then, that the use of force may have to be an ultimate option, but it must be just that—the last option.

I have heard talk about pre-emptive strikes and surgical wars. I have learnt from bitter personal experience that when the armchair theorists and the Whitehall generals start talking of a surgical war, it is time to start running for cover. A war is never surgical for those who have to fight it—except in very specific terms, which I am sure are not encompassed in that phrase. It may just be possible to fight a contained war in the south Atlantic, but it is not possible elsewhere in the world, and I believe that it is specifically not possible in the middle east.

If there is a war, I believe that it will have unimaginable and incalculable consequences. We shall place in jeopardy not just the lives of many thousands of human beings, but our chance for stability in the middle east in the long term and, possibly, our hopes for a new world order as well. Force, therefore, must be the last option and when it is used, it must be used on behalf of the community of nations as a whole.

Mr. Dalyell: The right hon. Gentleman has military experience. Has he any clear idea—I ask this simply as a question—what the rules of engagement will be for someone holding the kind of rank that he held, who may have to make a vital decision in a very short time? Is there any clarity about those rules?

Mr. Ashdown: I know that the hon. Gentleman has a special interest in rules of engagement. Let me tell him, as one who was at the other end of the decision by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup to send the troops into Kuwait in 1961—I was among the first troops to land there—that I was perfectly clear about what my rules of engagement were: if someone attacked me, I would respond immediately. That seems to be so self-evident that we scarcely need a House of Commons debate to discuss it.

As I have said, if there is a war the consequences will be incalculable. That is why I say that war must be the last resort, and must be undertaken on behalf of the community of nations as a whole. Measured force of last resort, supported by moderate Arab nations, by the European Community and by the Soviet Union, is one thing; a rash Anglo-American military adventure, undertaken unilaterally, would be another. I believe that the Government would find it extremely difficult to carry public opinion in this country—and international opinion abroad—if they were to embark on such an adventure without the backing of the United Nations.

UN support is not of itself the main issue, although a UN Security Council resolution would be the most effective outward and visible sign that the world community shares a common resolve. To shatter that resolve through impatience would be foolish, and even a successful military outcome could nevertheless represent a serious political failure.

Let me say this to the Government: our joint cause, the defeat of Saddam Hussein, stands its best chance if the Foreign Secretary continues to build a common resolve for future action, rather than threatening unilateral action on whatever basis. Let me make it clear that I do not say that we should avoid unilateralism because this is safer; I say that we should preserve international co-operation and support because it makes us stronger. The unanimous, worldwide condemnation of Hussein, and the international support that we have for our actions, should be our greatest weapon in his defeat, and it would be an act of folly to sacrifice such a priceless asset.

It is by ensuring that our actions remain the expression of the voice of the international community that we also provide the greatest degree of safety of our hostages. Saddam Hussein must be made to know that, for his treatment of our hostages, he will be held to account not just by Britain but by the entire world community.

We must also recognise—as the Prime Minister suggested in a very welcome statement—that the middle east will never be the same again after this is over. I do not believe that the resolution of this problem can be achieved except in the context of the resolution of other middle east problems. Jim Baker, the American Secretary of State, implied as much when he spoke earlier this week. The fulfilment of UN resolutions in one area will be bound to give rise to legitimate demands that they be fulfilled in others too.

We are not fighting for a re-establishment of the status quo in the middle east; rather, we should be aiming to establish a new structure for peace and stability in the region. The west may have a role in helping to bring such a structure into being, but our guiding principle must be that we leave the settlement of regional affairs to the nations in the region concerned.

I cannot end without touching on the plight of the refugees now haplessly caught in the demilitarised zone on the Jordan-Iraq border. These are the innocent flotsam and jetsam of this terrible crisis: they are as much the children of Hussein's tyranny as are our children. It would be terrible if, in fleeing death from the tyranny of Hussein, any one of them found death in the desert because of our neglect. The Prime Minister has announced a welcome extra £2 million. Let me say to her that, as this country has led in the process of preserving peace and security in Saudi Arabia, I hope that we shall now lead in preserving the lives of those in the desert. I hope that the Prime Minister will pick up the suggestion made by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup, and that we shall send a massive airlift out there now to provide rescue for those unfortunate people.

The outcome of this crisis will decide five things. It will decide the freedom of Kuwait, the future of Saddam Hussein, the long-term stability of the middle east, the means by which we provide for world peace in the future and how Britain will play its role in that effort. My hon. Friends and I believe that the most powerful weapon with which to free Kuwait, defeat Hussein, establish stability in the middle east and give the United Nations the role for which we all hope in the future is international action. If the Government act to ensure that Britain continues to play its part within that international framework, they will continue to receive our full support.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): The speech of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was both clear and fine—it fitted perfectly this sombre occasion; her leadership is one which we all recognise and admire. So, too, was the speech of the Leader of the Opposition. He spoke well. Although there may be some difference of emphasis, I see in practice no difference between the two Front Benches in their approach to this crisis. Both speeches suggested clearly what the objectives were, and are, of the world powers in this affair.

In recent weeks it has been suggested in the media that the objectives of the world powers and of the allies are blurred, but in all the world crises that I can think of the objective has never been clearer than in this one. It is as defined in resolution 660: the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi troops from the state of Kuwait and the restoration of the legitimate Government. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said, there can be no negotiation about that, because there is nothing to negotiate. That should be the limited and measured, but very clear and unquestioned, aim of all our efforts and endeavours and of all the material and financial resources mobilised worldwide—not just by the west, not just by the Americans—to force Saddam Hussein to shed his spoils and retreat to where he stood on 1 August.

Should one go beyond that, as many would like, and insist on the overthrow of this monstrous man? My belief is that as far as the immediate United Nations objective is concerned; it is wrong to think in terms of higher and further missions and goals. Both my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition confirmed that belief.

We may not like this most unpleasant man. He has the most repulsive habits. He is evil; he takes hostages; he is cruel; he has waded to power through a sea of blood. He has, if I may make a personal reflection, the rather unfortunate habit, when he makes a Cabinet reshuffle, of shooting or strangling the outgoing Ministers. He is not, of course, the only despot in the world who does that, so that in itself would be no reason for the United Nations or the world powers invading his country. We must keep clear the immediate aim that was laid down by the United Nations. The nations of the earth came together and defined that clear aim. That is what has to be achieved.

Ahead lie matters for consideration. It is not too soon for the House to turn its mind to considering the issues raised by my right hon. Friend concerning the new security structure for the Gulf and the middle east. How do we cope with the chemical weapons capacity, and perhaps the emerging nuclear capacity, even of a defeated Iraq—even of an Iraq without Saddam Hussein but with some new gang or despot in Baghdad? There will be nobody except a despot in that area. These issues will be raised in setting up the new security structure. They were the kind of issues to which Mr. Secretary Baker turned his mind in his constructive and valuable comments to Congress yesterday and the day before.

They open up the opportunity to confer again on and address the other problems of the middle east, of which the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) has constantly reminded us. These issues existed before the invasion of Kuwait and they will exist long after that issue has been resolved. The problems of the west bank and of the Palestinians in Israel will have to be addressed in the future, but I counsel against confusing those essential problems, which will have to be resolved, with the immediate and limited task set by the nations of the earth, through the United Nations, of getting the Iraqi dictator out of Kuwait.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On the question of limiting the spread of nuclear weapons, is it not important that the Government should express their strong and continuing support of the United Nations nuclear non-proliferation treaty and the implementation of all its articles, including article 6, which means that the nuclear powers must themselves set an example by diminishing and removing their dependence on nuclear weapons?

Mr. Howell: Certainly the diminishing of nuclear weapons and the pursuit of disarmament and weapons control has been a major objective of western Governments, with some success. The hon. Gentleman is quite right to say that, after the present crisis is over, the new security order ought to be one that mobilises renewed pressure—possibly with the backing of the permanent members of the United Nations Security Council—to insist on even more rigorous control not only of nuclear weapons but of the filthy and revolting chemical weapons —the so-called poor man's nuclear weapons—that are present in the middle east and threaten not only the middle east but all of us. These are matters to which we shall have to turn our minds in intense detail in the weeks and months ahead. At the moment, however, it is a question of uniting totally around the single objective of getting this man out of Kuwait.

The second point that I want to make is simple. Again, it was emphasised in the clear speech of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. This is not now, nor has it been from day one—the beginning of all this—anything other than an international effort. It has been the aim of Arab propaganda, and of many of those with a deep and instinctive bias against the United States—saying that whatever it does is wrong—to depict the whole exercise as either an American, or an American-British, or an American-British-Zionist imperialist operation which is not supported by the wider international world. I believe that what is taking place is not just an American effort —although undoubtedly the Americans have had to shoulder the logistical burden and probably will have to continue to do so—and not just a western effort.

We have seen the Soviet Union, after a slightly shaky start—understandably, because it is in a very weak state —beginning to give increasingly clear support for the task set out and the methods needed to get Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait. We have seen the Arab nations themselves first combine together and secondly call strongly for the support of the western allies in both defending Saudi Arabia and in due course driving Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait.

President Mubarak—one should not underestimate the difficulties that such a man faces, due to domestic internal pressures—has put possibly his life, certainly his political life, on the line. He, King Fahd and the other emirs, who, in a sense, are no more or less democratic in their positions than the despot in Baghdad—although he talks about it in other terms—have put their political lives on the line. They must see—and rightly would feel totally betrayed if they did not see—the fulfilment of the United Nations mission, with America and Britain playing their part in achieving that ambition.

This is a totally international effort. Those who feel that they cannot send logistical support should be pressed, as they are being pressed—rightly so, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said—to make massive resource contributions. As the Leader of the Opposition reminded us, that most definitely includes the Japanese and the Federal Republic of Germany, although the federal republic has huge extra imposts on its budget as the cost of unification grows and grows.

This is the time for everyone to do more than put their hands in their pockets and make fine speeches. They must contribute to the international effort—approved and supported, we hope, at each stage by the United Nations. It must be an international effort at every level. I feel that this is the time not to make accusations against some of the backsliders, although there has been backsliding, but to encourage them and to insist that they should play a growing part in the joint international, world-based task of driving Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait. Any alternative, any bickering in our own ranks, any turning round and saying that people are not playing their part carries the danger of sending signals to Baghdad that the west is divided and of giving this wretched man more of an opportunity to continue on his way by trying to expose and expand those divisions.

As to the means of fulfilling the objective on which we are all agreed, Saddam Hussein has excluded the prospect, if it ever existed, of voluntary withdrawal from Kuwait. He has annexed Kuwait, changed the Administration and dug in. He has indicated that he understands only one language —pressure and force. Short of the right pressures and forces being applied, within whatever time scale, he will not budge.

The embargo on the high seas, vigorously applied by the world powers, may do the trick in the months ahead, but the long haul—this is why it is appropriate for the House to gather—may be an empty haul. As the months pass, it may not be possible, through the sea blockade alone, to achieve what the United Nations, the free nations and the other nations of the world have decreed—Hussein's ejection and eviction from Kuwait.

That is why it seems to me that, although today we may believe so far so good, a grim crossroads lies somewhere ahead. I cannot see whether it will be months or even half a year away, but there will come a time when we must ask whether the sanctions embargo by sea has worked, what leakage there has been by the vast fleets of jumbo aircraft, which cannot carry oil but can certainly carry in supplies, and whether other subterranean networks are continuing to supply oxygen to the Iraqi regime. I suspect that more pressure than the embargo and the blockade will be needed.

That amounts to the clear and obvious injunction that we must do nothing in the House, nor should the legislatures of other nations involved, to tie the hands of our Executives and Governments in dealing with and mobilising the necessary pressures in the months ahead.

If this man is left in possession of Kuwait, the message is quite simple: violence will have won. All Arabs—and all despots around the world—will draw their own conclusions. The moderate Arab leaders whom I mentioned will fall and be destroyed and we shall open the way to a decade of endless violence, endless terror and endless world instability. In a few months' time, should Saddam Hussein still be in place, we would find ourselves walking around the rim of the volcano of nuclear and chemical holocaust.

Someone said—perhaps I should be better educated historically—that all the great political decisions are a choice between the disagreeable and the intolerable. If the Governments here in London, Washington and elsewhere now have the courage, as I believe they have, to take disagreeable risks—things cannot be done without some risks—to avoid the much darker and intolerable conditions that would ensue for years ahead, I for one will give them my wholehearted support.

4.32 pm

Mr. Denis Healey (Leeds, East): The House will agree that Saddam Hussein will go down in history for at least one unique achievement: he has united all parties in the House of Commons, all permanent members of the Security Council and the overwhelming majority of members of the United Nations both on the objective of getting him out of Kuwait and on the best method of doing so—a blockade supported, if necessary, by appropriate force. I think that those are the words of the resolution.

I believe that the blockade will be effective and will lead to Saddam's withdrawal, even if it is applied to oil alone, because 90 per cent. of Iraq's hard currency has been derived from the sale of oil, and 80 per cent. comes from the sale of oil carried by two pipelines, through Turkey and Saudi Arabia. Even without the naval blockade, the closure of the pipelines is likely to be effective, provided, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) pointed out, countries do not give Iraq credit when it has no currency to offer.

I hope that all Governments, including our own, have learnt something from their experience. Iraq owes about $80 billion to Arab and western Governments, divided roughly equally. It owes an enormous sum to the Soviet Union, although I do not think that figures are yet available, and the west has lost over $10 billion in recent export credits to Iraq. That includes the United Kingdom, which in recent years has given Iraq £900 million in export credits. In the main, that was for civilian goods, but it freed Iraq's hard currency for the buying of arms from various parts of the world.

The combination of the blockade and the denial of credit is likely to work. Indeed, I gather that Iraq has already lost $3 billion of revenue in the short period during which the pipelines have been closed.

The blockade is bound to take time to be economically effective. Most people believe that the minimum period will be four or five months. It might be politically effective in a shorter time, or it might take longer to be politically effective than to be economically effective.

The most heartening feature of the past week is that the American and British Governments have accepted that it will be a long haul—that the blockade can work, but it cannot work within weeks and is much more likely to take months.

Fortunately, because oil-producing countries, particularly Saudi Arabia, have agreed to make good the oil lost to the world because of the unavailability of oil from Iraq and Kuwait, although there will be temporary difficulties with refining the right grades of oil from the crude available from Saudi Arabia and other countries, the direct economic effect of the crisis is likely to be very much less than the oil crisis in 1973—the first OPEC price increase—or the oil crisis in 1979 which was made worse by the Gulf war.

In real terms, yesterday's price levels are still two fifths lower than in 1985, and it is worth bearing that in mind before we panic about the economic effects on the world as a whole. The economic effects for certain countries, however, are catastrophic, particularly Iraq's neighbours, Turkey and Jordan, and for countries that previously relied for much of their revenue on remittances from people working in the Gulf who are now getting out as fast as they can, mainly through Jordan.

I agree with all that has been said about the need to provide help to cushion the shock, and in particular to get the refugees through Jordan back home as fast as is practically possible.

The success of the blockade and the whole operation depends on maintaining unity inside and between the countries concerned. That has been a remarkable and an unprecedented feature of the operation over the past five weeks, but it depends on Governments, singly or jointly, not carrying out a unilateral first strike against Iraq. I fully agree that we cannot rule out the use of force in certain circumstances, such as if we are or our allies are attacked, and possibly in certain other circumstances, but it is important for the House and for the public to recognise that the use of force against Iraq to get it out of Kuwait would be immensely dangerous both politically and economically in any other circumstances than as a response to attack. It could be absolutely disastrous if it did not take place within the framework of the authority of the United Nations.

During my somewhat turbulent holiday over the past few weeks, which I enjoyed as much as I hope that other hon. Members enjoyed their holidays, I was able to read the views of military analysts in the International Herald Tribune, the Financial Times and The Times about what a war against Iraq would involve. I was happy to see that they all disagreed with one another. I share the view of the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) that nobody who has not fought in a war has much right to talk about what will happen if a war takes place. The one thing that one learns if one has been in a war—there are still a number of venerable gentleman present who were—is that sod rules. One never knows at the beginning how things will turn out at the end. Nothing ever happens as one expects.

However, some general considerations should be borne in mind. First of all, in the desert, neither side should rely too much on the advantages of advanced technology. The right hon. Member for Yeovil will recall that our intervention to help Kuwait in 1961 was successful because we did not have to fight. The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) will recall, because he was involved, that our troops were not acclimatised and that if they had been called upon to fight, there could have been a disaster. It is impossible to predict the consequences of fighting in those conditions, particularly if one has to meet the possibility of chemical attack.

The idea of a surgical strike is a fantasy. Mr. Gerasimov, that master of our English language, mixed his metaphors to good effect when he said a couple of days ago that if we tried a surgical strike, our scalpel would turn into a club and have a boomerang effect. That was an entertaining mixture of images, but the House will see the justice of his point.

The record of the United States in making surgical strikes is, frankly, not encouraging. We had the fiasco of the attempted surgical strike against Tehran to rescue the hostages, which ended hundreds of miles short of Tehran in the desert, when sand got into the engines of the helicopters. The Stealth aircraft was used first for a surgical strike in Panama and all the reports from Washington are that it was most inaccurate—about as accurate, the Secretary of State for Defence will not mind me reminding him, as the V-bombers in their attempts to crater the airstrip in the Falklands.

The surgical strike on Colonel Gaddafi was not terribly successful, although that was also carried out by F111 aircraft, which have also been deployed in the Gulf. It killed a lot of civilians, but did not kill Colonel Gaddafi and the intelligence, on which the raid was based was wrong, because Gaddafi was not in Tripoli but in his camp in the desert. A surgical strike requires not only extraordinarily accurate weapons but extraordinarily accurate intelligence, and I doubt whether we have that sort of intelligence on Iraq.

It is said that the objective of the surgical strike should be to get rid of Saddam Hussein. My old friend Henry Kissinger suggested this in a recent article, but he might recall that he carried out a surgical strike on Cambodia. It was not particularly surgical, because he used a lot of aircraft without the authority of Congress to do so. The main result of the strike was to replace Sihanouk with Pol Pot, and the consequences of that disastrous blunder are still being felt, as the Foreign Secretary will know.

Iran has already chosen the Iraqi Shi'ite Muslim fundamentalist whom it will promote to lead Iraq if Hussein is toppled. We must not assume that Hussein, horrible though he is, is the most horrible thing that could ever happen in the middle east. A few years ago, we were saying that Khomeini was so much more horrible that we would escort all tankers going to Iraq so as to protect them againt attacks by Iran. The attacks against ships going to Iran were just as numerous after the patrolling of the Gulf as they were before it, but at least we kept Saddam alive to fight another day. The most worrying factors about the idea of defeating Iraq in war are that it would leave Iran once again the dominant military power in the Gulf, and that could be a terminal setback for the present unsteady movement towards a more pragmatic regime in Tehran.

Worse than that, the destruction of Iraq in war would inevitably unleash a large number of other conflicts. Quite apart from the risk of Iran trying to take the Kurdish areas, there are already signs that Turkey is again considering occupying the oilfields that it lost in 1923. One of the reasons for the current Turkish proposal to allow, for the first time, its troops to fight abroad is to free them for that purpose. There is an interesting article in the Financial Times today on that possibility. The possibility that Syria would turn east is also a real one.

To destroy Iraq or to bring down the Iraqi regime could not be guaranteed to be in the interests of stability in the middle east. Moreover, a war largely conducted by the British and our American and NATO allies would produce a situation in which the monarchical regimes in the Gulf might find it difficult to survive. There would be a wave of Arab nationalism combined with a wave of Muslim fundamentalism.

Most of the Gulf states rely on foreign labour and Arab labour from other countries not only for getting oil out of the ground—there are 350,000 Palestinians in Kuwait alone—but, in the lower Gulf, for a large part of their armed forces. In my day, that included some British forces —I am not sure that it still does. That is why Prince Sultan, who is the Minister for Defence in Saudi Arabia, told the press the other day that he did not believe that it was in Saudi Arabia's interest to carry out a military strike against Iraq and that no such strike should be carried out without Saudi Arabia's agreement. That is why the Saudi Government did not allow the United States to base B52s in Saudi Arabia, although, according to the Arab press, it had asked permission to do so.

I hope that the Foreign Secretary will talk to us frankly about his recent trip round the middle east. Oman is the one country which is comparatively independent and still a good friend of Britain. In Oman, the Foreign Secretary was advised to rely on diplomacy and on economic sanctions, rather than on military force, to achieve his objective. Surely that is wisdom, not just for Oman, but for the other Gulf states and, indeed, for Britain and for the United States. I was glad to see that, in Amman yesterday, the Foreign Secretary—if he was rightly reported—did not rule out negotiations with Saddam Hussein, once Saddam Hussein leaves Kuwait.

The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup was quite right to say that, if it was possible to produce more stability in the Gulf and in the rest of the middle east through the initiative of the Arab countries, that would be far better—even if they reached agreements of which we should not wholly approve—than trying to impose it by western force.

I must raise another consideration. One cannot be sure what would happen if there were full-scale war between Iraq and its opponents in the Gulf. However, it is at least possible that a large part of the oil facilities on which the whole world depends would be put out of action for a long period by one side or the other. In that case, the world would face the prospect of $50 oil lasting for years, not for weeks or for months.

In the present world economic situation, that would certainly produce a world recession and could produce the collapse of the fragile American financial system, as the hon. Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell) will know. It is not an option to be considered lightly and if, in the end, we have to consider it at all, my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn and the right hon. Member for Yeovil, the leader of the Liberal Democrats—I do not know whether, as an old man, I keep up with the changes of nomenclature—were right to say that it must be done under the auspices of the United Nations. If China imposes a veto in the Security Council, we could find a way of doing it through article 42, which deals with regional security.

No action should be taken without the full public support of all our NATO allies, of all our partners in the European Community, of the Soviet Government and of many Arab Governments. I know that that is a lot for which to ask, but nothing less would suffice.

We must remember that the Sovier Union is far closer to the Arab world than we are. It is about 300 miles from the Iraqi frontier to the frontier of the southern Soviet Union. The Soviet Union has a perfectly legitimate interest in the stability of that part of the world, and it must be involved in any decision regarding the pursuit of the United Nations resolutions. For that reason, it is important that the summit meeting between President Bush and President Gorbachev reaches a reliable and clear agreement this weekend on some of those matters.

I want to turn to the up side of what has hitherto been a rather gloomy story. If we can keep Soviet co-operation in defeating aggression in the Gulf and in increasing stability in the middle east, the way is open for a whole new world of opportunities. As Gorbachev predicted in his first speech to the Communist party congress, the ending of the cold war enables us all to move, groping in the dark as it were, to an interdependent and integral world. We now have, for the first time in history, the opportunity to give the United Nations—a world organisation—the role envisaged for it by its founders. We may need it to develop that role not only in other parts of the middle east, but in Africa and in many parts of Asia, where the tension between Pakistan and India currently threatens to explode into war at any moment.

Thank God we now have the opportunity to learn a lesson from a long concatenation of blunders by all the external powers in their policies towards the middle east. Not only the United States and Britain, but France and, equally, the Soviet Union have made blunder after blunder, from all of which they have gained nothing and lost much. Some of the blunders reflected the strains created by the cold war, such as the "Northern Tier" experiment, which led to the downfall of a moderate Government in Iraq, and the Russian support of Nasser and later of Syria. That factor is no longer there.

However, there is one constant factor to which I must refer—the blind determination of all Governments in arms-producing countries to stuff arms down the throats of all the regimes of the middle east, regardless of their external or domestic policies and, above all, regardless of their stability. The result is that the arms we loaded on to the Shah of Iran in the belief that he would dominate the middle east and the Indian ocean fell, just like that, into the hands of a religious maniac. We found ourselves involved in trying to defeat the Khomeini regime with the help of Iraq. Incidentally, when Iraq invaded Iran, the matter was not raised at the Security Council and sanctions were not imposed.

I hope that Iraq has learnt something from that invasion. Saddam Hussein has killed 1·5 million of his own people for absolutely nothing. In the agreement that he made with Tehran a few weeks ago, the last gain that he could claim from the war disappeared into thin air.

Surely we can learn something from that history. There was no effective protest from Britain when the Syrian Government murdered between 10,000 and 30,000 people at Hama in 1982. There was only the mildest slap on the wrist for Saddam Hussein when he killed 4,000 Kurds inside his own country with poison gas in March 1988. The United Kingdom immediately doubled its export credits to Iraq.

Mr. Waldegrave indicated dissent.

Mr. Healey: It is no good for the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, to wag his head. If he consults his friends in the Box, they will be able to confirm what I have said. At the Baghdad arms fair which followed in April 1989—just over a year ago—there were 17 British companies, 35 French companies and three Italian companies. None of us has very much to be proud of over that.

When some Labour Members protested against those arms sales in the defence debate last October, we were told by the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Clark), who is a Minister of State, that we were talking claptrap. It was the same fatuous philistine who was chosen by the Prime Minister to tour the Gulf as a sort of John the Baptist to the Foreign Secretary.

There is not, and cannot be, any guarantee that arms which are sold to such regimes will not be used for aggression and will not be used against us. It has happened too often in the past.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): Am I not correct in believing that the right hon. Gentleman was Secretary of State for Defence at the time when, in his words, we were stuffing arms down Iran's throat, when the Shah was in power, and that those arms later fell into the hands of Khomeini?

Mr. Healey: It was a great mistake, and I have the sense to admit it. I did it because I was assured by the Foreign Office—[Interruption.]—that the Shah would be there for ever.

I appeal to the Government to take up the suggestion made recently by Mr. Shevardnadze, the Soviet Foreign Secretary, to ask the General Secretary of the United Nations to organise talks between the major arms suppliers, the overwhelming majority of which were in one or other of the cold war alliances, to see whether we cannot now control the supply of weapons, at least to the third world.

I refer not just to the weapons that we are particularly proud of possessing—nuclear and chemical weapons and missiles—but to conventional weapons generally. The bulk of the 20 million people who have died in wars in the third world since 1945 have not been killed by weapons of mass destruction. Enormous numbers have been and are still being killed, particularly in places such as Beirut, by small arms and hand-portable weapons. If there are to be more wars in the middle east as a result of instability, much of the killing will result from the use of such arms.

We need international control of arms supplies, not just in the middle east but in Africa and Asia. Overwhelming evidence is now coming from United Nations organisations that arms imports are ruining the prospects of economic development in many of those countries.

We must also try to deal with other local problems in the middle east, and I am glad that Secretary Baker, the Prime Minister, my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition and all who have spoken in the debate have asked for that to be done.

There is no question but that one of the most urgent problems there is that of the Palestinians. Because the world, when it set up the state of Israel, made no provision for the Palestinians who were expelled initially into Jordan, that has been a source of continuing and increasing trouble. That trouble could reach crisis point again in the next year or so if the emigration of up to 1 million Jews from the Soviet Union leads to the expulsion of the Arabs from the occupied territories of Israel. It is an urgent and dangerous problem and I hope that we shall take advantage of the weather window which Secretary Baker seemed to open in his speech to get down to tackling that issue immediately.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I have enjoyed the right hon. Gentleman's speech. Does he agree that a strength that Saddam Hussein gains throughout the Arab world is the perception that he, and perhaps he alone, can deliver a Palestinian state? If, as a main plank of western policy, of United Nations policy, we were now to commit ourselves to resolving that problem, would not that undermine some of the strength of Saddam Hussein?

Mr. Healey: Yes, and one reason why Saddam Hussein is playing that card is that 350,000 Palestinians are living and working in Kuwait, largely involved in producing oil. Indeed, Palestinians of stature are engaged all over the middle east in important managerial roles.

A clear lesson resulting from this affair is that there is no answer to the problem—or to any of the multifarious problems which will torment the world with the end of the cold war—other than a multinational answer under the auspices of the United Nations. I was immensely encouraged by one sentence—there were many others—in the speech of the Prime Minister, when she said that she thought that the future security structure in the Gulf must be under the United Nations. I am glad that she seems to have dropped the ridiculous idea, made in a recent speech, that NATO should take it on.

Like a diminishing band of colleagues in the House, I am getting on in years. I was born in 1917. My boyhood and youth were tormented by the failure of governments after the first world war to turn the League of Nations into an effective instrument of international security. When I left the Army in 1945 after the second world war, I believed, like many young men and women, that we really had a chance to do it under the United Nations. But Stalin destroyed that opportunity, and the last 40 years have been dominated by the cold war between the communist and western blocs.

That war is over. The world now faces its third opportunity to create a world society. It has the instrument to hand. All the great powers have said that they want to use it. I pray to God that we do not fail this third time.

5.6 pm

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): I am grateful to have been called to speak, albeit unexpectedly. We have had an outstanding debate so far, in which the unity between the two Front Benches has been a most encouraging feature of the solidarity that we all feel at this time of considerable history and anxiety for the world.

I have been a visitor to the Gulf for over 20 years, first as a young private secretary to our former colleague Selwyn Lloyd, latterly as a journalist, business man and Member of Parliament. I feel deeply for the peace-loving people of those Gulf countries who in this hour face the possible agony of war. We must be aware of the great anxieties that they feel.

Two scenarios have been outlined in the debate, the first being the policy of patience—the patient long haul by which sanctions are applied—backed up by a blockade. We all hope that that policy of patience will bring down the monster who is dominating the world's headlines, Saddam Hussein.

The problem with playing it long is that it might also mean that we do not win in the end, because there are many worries over the long haul. Its obvious disadvantage is that there could be gaps in the blockade. I am not full of admiration for the course that King Hussein has played in the crisis so far in his apparent reluctance to enforce sanctions.

By playing it long there will be military problems. The American service men now in the desert, in that hostile environment, need their R and R—their rest and recreation—or after a few months troop morale will go stale and the American service men will not be able to perform key functions. However, there are no R and R facilities in Saudi Arabia. There are no Budweiser beers, red light districts or worlds of Suzie Wong in downtown Dhahran.

Therefore, there are anxieties that playing it long will place all sorts of pressures, not just on American service men, but on American political opinion. We are told by the media anchormen that American public opinion cannot stand the problem of many months of waiting for a result. I think that the anchormen may have underestimated the American public's resolve, but, nevertheless, playing it long, being patient, has worrying problems.

Even more worrying are the difficulties involved in being impatient. I entirely agreed with the Leader of the Opposition when he said that there was enormous peril in a first strike policy. I do not believe that the American Government are contemplating such a policy, which would certainly lose that most precious of all assets at present, the international consensus and backing. It must be politically right to have the world united, as it is today. To throw that ace card away would be a foolish mistake.

At the same time, we must recognise that, although there is political wisdom and desirability in keeping the international world united, with the United Nations totally on side and approving—the desirable first prize—should that option be available to us, we should not shrink from using the legal backing of article 51 of the United Nations. I am not sure that the Leader of the Opposition made that distinction in his speech. Article 51 enables this Government, the United States Government or any other Government to act with due legal sanction.

I wonder how the scenario will evolve. One topic that has not yet been mentioned in today's debate is what is happening inside Kuwait at present. I believe that the resistance inside it is more formidable and forceful than generally reported. What the Iraqis are doing in Kuwait has all sorts of sinister signs and portents, and includes mining all the oilfields with high explosives. In what could be going on in Kuwait lie the perfectly justifiable seeds of a request from the Emir of Kuwait, under article 51, for military intervention—somewhere between the patient and the impatient scenario.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Is it not clear from what we have heard from the Kuwaiti ambassador and others that the country is being devastated and laid waste by the Iraqis, even as we debate?

Mr. Aitken: There is no doubt that the position in Kuwait is more horrific than has generally been recognised. It is not surprising that Saddam Hussein, who has been so accommodating to the international television networks, has in no way helped them to gain admission to Kuwait to tell the true story of what is going on there.

The central theme of the debate is what I think the Leader of the Opposition called being interested in success. What is success, and what does it mean? We know the United Nations list of priorities and demands, and I think that we all agree with them. As a House, we should discuss whether those requirements should also mean the fall of Saddam Hussein, which is immensely desirable. However, that is the business of the Iraqi people and not directly ours, which is to ensure that, at the end of the crisis, Saddam Hussein, or his successor, is so politically humiliated and militarily castrated that we cannot be faced with this dangerous volcano once again, fearing that chemical weapons, perhaps even nuclear weapons in two years' time, could be used.

The prize is great; it is not just ending the reign of a monster in Iraq or cooling the highly tense and volatile situation that exists today, but what several speakers have called maintaining the wider new world order. There is a glittering opportunity that out of this terrible act of aggression could come the chance to get justice for the Palestinian people and a settlement that would guarantee stability through a multinational force and a United Nations umbrella. Those are great prizes.

If we stick to the solid and united front that we have shown in the House today, continue to back our allies in the Gulf as we have done, do not lose our nerve and show either too much impatience or go too slowly because we have become too legalistic and keen on the United Nations rubber stamping everything in every eventuality—which would simply be impossible—but strike a firm but middle line, there may yet be a good and sensible outcome to this terrible tragedy.

5.15 pm

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): Having worked for so long on one case of occupation and annexation, I am heartened by aspects of the Government's public response in the face of the current crisis. They have consistently cited the requirements of international law and insisted on the need for that law to be given teeth by the international community in order that the occupying power, in this case Iraq, should understand that no state may tear up the international order and expect to pay no price. They have given proper prominence to the authority of the United Nations and the need for consensus in the international community as a basis for action.

The Government have insisted that their nationals and all civilians in occupied Kuwait are protected persons and have fundamental rights that must be protected. They have reminded Iraq that some acts against those protected persons give rise to individual criminal liability and that those committing such violations may be subject to the equivalent of war crimes trials.

A position based on international law is not only the correct one in respose to violation by a state, in this case Iraq, but the only one holding any hope for a proper resolution of the conflict. Retaliatory measures or unilateral interventions that violate the law will do nothing to resolve the crisis. We must always remember, when citing the law, that illegal measures by states are illegal no matter what the reason for which they were undertaken, whether in pursuit of aggression or in pursuit of confronting aggression. There is no need to resort to measures outside the mandate that already exist for states to react to violations of international law. Despite the frequent bewailing of the inadequacy of the mechanisms of enforcing the basic rules of international law, we have found that there are a variety of structural mechanisms for dealing with states that violate international law and refuse to comply with United Nations resolutions.

I welcome the imposition of stringent sanctions on Iraq and firmly support the role of the United Nations in directing the international community of states in the implementation of those sanctions. Other legal mechanisms of conflict, control and resolution that can be achieved through the forum of the United Nations include various forms of negotiation, arbitration and litigation and, perhaps most appropriately on this occasion, the presence of United Nations forces. I hope that the crisis can be resolved peacefully, through the enforcement of the sanctions imposed through the United Nations, and that all those involved will confine themselves to actions that are unequivocally based on international law and consensus.

All these points are familiar to me. I have frequently addressed them to the Foreign Office in the context of a different conflict in the middle east. For the past 18 months, I and others have been addressing the Government on the issue of the consistent and objective enforcement of the provisions of international humanitarian law, or the laws of war, as a means of providing protection for the civilian population of the Israeli-occupied territories and as a contribution to the search for a just, durable and peaceful resolution of the Israel-Palestine conflict.

We have always stressed the universality and the absoluteness of the minimum standards of behaviour of states laid down in major instruments of international humanitarian law—the Hague convention of 1907 and the Geneva convention of 1949. It has been our contention that the rules contained in international humanitarian law, if properly enforced, are sufficient to dissuade and prohibit states from carrying out an illegal agenda of occupation and annexation of the type that the international community now confronts in the form of Iraq.

I have heard the view expressed that it is erroneous to make such a comparison because the circumstances in which Israel invaded and occupied the Palestinian territories in 1967 differ from those in which Iraq invaded and occupied Kuwait this summer. I cannot agree with that view, but to argue it through now would be a distraction from a consideration of the fundamental functioning of the law between states.

As I understand it, the purpose of the law is to lay down minimum standards of conduct for all states and to provide means of insisting upon those standards being applied, regardless of which state is breaking the law.

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a distinction between the Israeli position and the position that we are debating? It takes two to make peace in the Israeli position, whereas in the circumstances that we are debating, one side wants peace and the other does not.

Mr. Ross: I shall deal in a minute specifically with what my right hon. and learned Friend has said.

The Prime Minister has made it clear that if the other side in the Israeli conflict accepted certain resolutions and renounced violence and terrorism, she would try to ensure that a peace conference would be held. That has been done; at least the other side has played its part.

The situations in occupied and annexed Kuwait and in the Israeli-occupied territories are governed by international law and are quite properly the concern of the international community from a legal point of view. Both occupations have given rise to unanimous resolutions of the United Nations for the occupying power to withdraw, and these resolutions have been flouted by both nations. Indeed, Israel has flouted them for over 23 years.

In both instances, the fourth Geneva convention applies. It confers certain fundamental protections on civilians in the occupied territories. I have no doubt that, if the occupation of Kuwait continues, we shall have resolutions similar to the almost countless number that now exist, and which call upon Israel to respect the convention and to condemn its violations. Palestinian civilians who are under occupation are entitled to the protection that is provided by minimum standards of behaviour.

In Kuwait, those minimum standards apply to the Kuwaiti population and nationals of many other states, including those of Great Britain. These protected persons are dependent for their welfare upon the firm resolve of the international community to ensure that legal provisions are enforced and implemented until the occupying power complies with the United Nations commands to withdraw.

The major difference in legal terms between the Israeli and Iraqi occupations lies in the reaction of the international community, and especially that of the United States and Britain and its European partners. The difference lies in the willingness and determination of the international community, and especially of the states to which I have referred, to enforce the law against the perpetrator of the offence.

In the middle east, failure by the international community to apply the principles and the rule of international law neutrally and consistently has led to the law falling into disrepute, at least to a certain extent. It may be said that the breakdown of these principles led the Arab regime into believing that it could break the law with impunity. We have discovered to our cost, and to the cost of many of our nationals, the ultimate implication of allowing any state to break the law that applies to states generally without paying the price of illegal actions.

Had the west not tolerated other illegal actions in the middle east, by failing to act upon its frequent but only verbal condemnations, and had instead reacted routinely to violations of international law and United Nations resolutions in the way which we are now seeing, the stakes would have been raised. It would have been much more difficult for any other political leader in the area to contemplate and carry out such actions. States—especially those with vulnerable economies—would have known that they would face economic collapse if they contemplated going beyond the legitimate constraints of state action.

The enforcement of international law thus has an exceedingly practical effect, as well as a humanitarian value, but only if it is implemented consistently and without regard to the identity of the violating state. International law is assailable only if it is selectively enforced and implemented to coincide with political expediency. Past weakness, with the consequent devaluation of the law, is one factor in the context of the current crisis.

We have before us a problem and an opportunity. We have shown resolve to seek compliance with the only standards that all states have in common beyond language, culture and religion, and that is the minimum provisions of the law of war and the binding resolutions of the United Nations. We have seen the consequences of the wilful ignoring or idiosyncratic interpretation of international law. Regional instability, threats to national interests and threats even to world security arise when we permit departures from minimal rules.

Having cited the rules in the context of the dispute that we are debating, and acted upon them within the context of international consensus, we must show a firm commitment to the rules and not one that is based merely upon who is breaking them. If that commitment is not maintained in future, the future for international law and order will be at stake. If we do not provide the law with necessary and legitimate teeth in other contexts, we may never again cite it as a basis for action. Instead, it will be merely an excuse in the terms of a political agenda, and effectively there will be no law.

I am not suggesting that two wrongs make a right—that, unless the international community takes action to restrain Israel from its violations, it has no right to restrain Saddam Hussein from his. I firmly support all efforts made within the terms of international law to restrain Saddam Hussein, but in future we must fulfil the same legal obligations without a hint of selectivity. If we fail to do so, and there is, in effect, only one right, there will be a great many wrongs. That will injure those in the middle east who have suffered most already—civilians suffering in time of war and belligerent occupation. These wrongs will necessarily have a fundamental effect on our own interests in future.

In 1990, Britain and its European partners, and even the United States, have recognised the importance of international law. There was that recognition in 1945, which led to the framing of the United Nations charter. Similarly, in 1949, agreement was reached on the text of the Geneva conventions. They were seen as major instruments to govern the conduct of states in time of war and belligerent occupation. It is a pity that we have had to wait until certain more visible interests were involved to remember the importance of these principles and the utility of enforcing their contents. When the crisis is resolved in accordance with fundamental rules, we must not allow them to be forgotten again. Selectivity in enforcing the law, as we have seen in the middle east, can lead only to its devaluation and inevitable violation.

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): Some Opposition Members seem to be hypnotised by the concept of a surgical strike. I do not know to whom they are referring, as they have not been specific. There is one body from which I do not hear talk about a surgical strike, however, and that is Her Majesty's Government. It is time that someone paid tribute to the Government for the great skill with which they have handled what I regard as the most dangerous international crisis since 1945.

The Government have not put a foot wrong. In particular, they have acted with great skill in the United Nations. Suggestions have been made by Opposition Members that the Government may not have paid much attention to the United Nations and the five resolutions of the Security Council. I have no doubt that the Government played an important role in securing those resolutions, and not least resolution 665, which was the most difficult to secure of them all.

Several hon. Members have said that we are in a new phase at the United Nations. I have observed the United Nations for nearly 40 years, including two complete General Assembly sessions some time ago. We all know that, until now, it has been bedevilled by being used as a forum for one nation to make points against another rather than as a forum for securing results.

With the end of the cold war, we all agree that there is now a real possibily that we can make the United Nations a more useful place. However, it would be a great error to argue, as some have done, that the allied forces ranged against Saddam Hussein should take further military action only if authorised by the Security Council. The right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey)—who, I regret, is no longer in his place—said that the use of force must be within the framework of the United Nations. We can all agree with that, because article 51 is within the framework, of the United Nations. The point is not whether the use of force, if it became necessary, should be within or without the United Nations; it is whether it requires a further Security Council resolution.

I welcome what the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) said on that point. He referred to a number of examples where force could be used legitimately without a further Security Council resolution such as, a request by Kuwait or further aggression. There could be other examples. To deny ourselves the ability to take further military action without another Security Council resolution would delight Saddam Hussein. It would certainly make him more stubborn and it would reduce the chances of achieving what we all want to achieve, which is the evacuation of Kuwait by peaceful means. That would be the perverse result of such self-denial.

If, as I believe, the right hon. Member for Islwyn is saying that it is desirable that further military action has the backing of the United Nations, I can only agree with him. However, I emphatically disagree with the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), who said recently that further military action must have a further Security Council resolution.

The House should be aware of why article 51 is part of the charter. It is not an unimportant article. It was greatly debated during the three years between 1942 and 1945 when the United Nations charter was in the process of gestation. The founders of the United Nations—who, in general, were the victors of world war two—believed it necessary to include such an article because they were not prepared, especially the major powers, to deny themselves the right to take military action against aggression or against a threat to peace simply because it might not be possible, because of the veto, to obtain the sanction of a Security Council resolution. Article 51 is essential to chapter VII, which deals with threats to the peace and with acts of aggression, and it was central in the minds of the founders of the United Nations.

Mr. Archer: The right hon. Gentleman is accurate about the reason for article 51 being included in the charter. It was because there could be no certainty that there would be a general agreement among the United Nations. However, where a consensus is attainable, would it not be a step back to rely on the right of self-redress?

Sir Peter Blaker: I agree with what the right hon. Member for Islwyn said—that it is desirable to have the clear backing of the United Nations if that is attainable. However, we should not deny ourselves the opportunity to act even if it is not possible to obtain a Security Council resolution. As the House will recall, we relied on article 51 for our action in the Falklands.

The Soviet Union recently suggested that there should be a comprehensive conference dealing with both Iraq's aggression and the question of Palestine. I do not know why it made that suggestion, which I believe is unwise. It would risk obscuring the main issue, which is to ensure that Saddam Hussein does not profit from his aggression. We must obtain his withdrawal and ensure that there is no possibility of further Iraqi aggression against Kuwait or its small neighbouring countries. Measures must be taken to deal with Iraq's nuclear and chemical weapons capability, and a security regime must be established in the Gulf.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is there not a danger that in agreeing to an international conference—which I hope will not be the case—it would give the dictator of a criminal regime the status to say, in effect, that what he has done in Kuwait has led to an international conference to deal with all sorts of other issues? Those of us on the Labour Benches who were strenuously opposed to the Suez aggression in 1956 made it clear that we did not want an international conference, but an end to the aggression—which was supported at the time by France and Israel. Our view remains the same. The aggression that began on 2 August must be ended before there is an international conference to deal with all the other issues, including the position of the Palestinians which, at some early stage, must also be discussed and resolved.

Sir Peter Blaker: The hon. Gentleman made a number of valid points. An international conference would enhance the status of Saddam Hussein. An additional, important point which was implicit in what the hon. Gentleman said is that it would enable Saddam Hussein to divert world attention to the question of Palestine and unite the Arabs behind him in opposition to Israel, which would be highly undesirable.

The world faces enough problems over the Gulf without adding the question of Palestine in the same forum. Of course we must not lose sight of the Palestine problem, but if we attempt to treat both those issues in the same forum at the same time, we are in danger of failing on both. We must first concentrate on solving the problem of Iraq's aggression. If we are successful, we may then find the further momentum to tackle, as we should, the question of Palestine.

5.38 pm

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Many hon. Members have said that this is the gravest crisis that we have faced since 1945, and I share that view. In the light of that, can anyone doubt that it was right to recall the House of Commons so that we could debate the matter outside the television and radio studios and without relying upon the mass media? There has also been a demand—quite properly in a crisis—for a degree of unity, and that unity has been present in a number of important respects. No hon. Member supports the act of aggression by Saddam Hussein against Kuwait. So far as I know, no hon. Member is other than strongly supportive of the sanctions taken by the United Nations against Saddam Hussein and the resolution for their enforcement. We also have something else in common—none of us will be killed if a war breaks out.

But as Members of Parliament, we have responsibilities which cannot simply be subordinated to the role of the Government. This is not the place to deal with it, but under our constitution, military deployments, acts of war and treaties of peace come under the Crown prerogative. Parliament has no legal or constitutional right whatever to decide the matters that are before us for debate.

[Mr. Tony Benn]

But we have a duty to represent people. We have a duty to represent—as far as I can make out, some Conservative Members have done it with tremendous energy—British citizens in Iraq and Kuwait. We have a responsibility for them and their families. That has hardly been mentioned except as an instrument for denouncing, quite properly, the man who is detaining them. We have service men and women in the middle east, and perhaps more are to go there if the stories in today's papers are right. They and their families are entitled to have Members of Parliament to represent them. There are the refugees, thousands of them without water and food, and as human beings we have a responsibility to them. I might add that the tragic pictures that we have seen of people in the desert without proper food or shelter would be as nothing to what would happen if war broke out.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, because we discussed it yesterday, I intend to oppose the motion tomorrow that the House should now adjourn. The motion to adjourn the House is usually a formal one. The House adjourns at night and meets again at 2.30 pm. But this is the one rare occasion when whether we should adjourn for another six weeks while events take their course is the real question.

If anyone says to me, as some have said in the face of the crisis, that we should send a united message to Saddam Hussein, I remind the House that on 5 May 1940, when Hitler was at the gates, there was an Adjournment debate on the handling by the Government of the Campaign in Norway, and a vote. The then Prime Minister won the vote and resigned, and Winston Churchill became Prime Minister. So let us not be told that the duty of the House of Commons is to unite behind whatever the Government of the day does, because that is not what the House is there to do. We are here to represent people and to contribute our own opinions as best we can. I have no complaint of any speech made today about how we feel that the crisis should be handled.

I will use plain language. I fear that the United States has already decided that, when it is ready, it will create a pretext for a war. That is what I believe. I acquit the Foreign Secretary of being in that hawkish clan because, in so far as one can penetrate the inscrutable corridors of power and the minds of their inhabitants, he seems to be a bit of a dove. But let me say this, too, without offence. Britain is a minor player in this game. We have had a debate today as though everything hinged on whether the Prime Minister decided to go to war. The Prime Minister, too, is a minor player in this unfolding tragedy. She decided to go in with President Bush, perhaps because of the transatlantic relationship, the so-called "special relationship", or as thanks for the Falklands, or because she did not want to get mixed up with the EEC.

But she is a minor player and once she and the Cabinet decided to commit even a notional number of forces—including the RAF and the RAF regiment and now the troops—she was locked into what President Bush intended to do. It is important that we should not discuss, as if we were in a position to decide the post-cold-war order, what the Prime Minister will be doing here and there. We are a minor partner in an American strategy.

It must be known by now that I am opposed to a war against Iraq. I am opposed to action outside the United Nations. I believe that it would divide the Security Council. It might not exactly unite the Arab world, but it might bring many Arab countries together against us. The outcome of such a war could not be sure, because President Saddam Hussein would certainly have the capacity, were he to choose to do it, to destroy so many oil installations that, even though he himself might be destroyed, it would inflict a burden on the world economy and the middle east which could not be contemplated.

Mr. Cormack: Nobody in the House is enthusiastic for war, but is the right hon. Gentleman saying that he is prepared to let Saddam Hussein keep his loot?

Mr. Benn: No, I am not saying that at all. I said at the beginning of my speech that there is unanimity for sanctions. I share the view of, I think, either the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) or my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), that a country dependent for its revenue on oil cannot survive when its oil pipeline is cut.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Benn: No, I shall not give way again.

I believe, therefore, that the sanctions will be effective; but that has to be put against what would happen otherwise.

I must also say something else to the House without in any way being offensive. Governments of any colour in any country are not the main practitioners of morality. America went into Panama and 3,000 people were killed. America went into Grenada. America supported Iraq when it attacked Iran. America did nothing when Cyprus was invaded and partitioned by Turkey. America has no moral authority, any more than any other super-power. The same would be true of the Soviet Union after Afghanistan, or wherever. It has no moral authority.

Nor, might I add, because these things must be said and nobody else has said them, can we defend the Emir or the King of Saudi Arabia, neither of whom practise any democracy. I am not saying that they are not entitled to the protection of the UN charter—I have already said that they are—but, given the denunciations of the breaches of human rights in eastern Europe by Ministers, one might have expected one of them, in this dispute, to point out that a person found guilty of shoplifting in Riyadh will have his hand chopped off. Are we to live in a world where morality is seen as the product of a parliamentary majority?

The real issue is this. Everybody knows it and nobody has mentioned it. The Americans want to protect their oil supplies. I think that I am right in saying that not one Member on either side of the House has drawn attention to what the former Attorney-General of the United States, Ramsey Clark, said on the radio last night. He said that the United States forced Saudi Arabia to accept its army there because it wanted to protect its oil.

We are experienced as an imperial power and that will not shock the Conservatives. I am not asking anyone to be shocked, only to recognise the fact that stares us in the face. America has benefited much recently from cheap middle eastern oil. It was reported in the Financial Times that it has reduced its oil production and increased its oil imports from 31 per cent. to 52 per cent. It has become hooked on this cheap fluid that now has to be controlled by the American army. That is honestly the position. The United States wants a permanent base.

I have not had a distinguished military career like my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East, but I served in Egypt in 1945 and I still have my identity card saying that I was exempt from Egyptian law. I looked at it the other day. We had a base at Tel-el-Kebir in Egypt from 1888, when Mr. Gladstone put it there, to 1956. If one talked to any Egyptians, all they did was read a list of promises by successive British Governments about when we would withdraw our base. We withdrew in 1956 and were in again with the support of the right hon. Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Amery)—he and I clashed at the time—within a few weeks.

Then there is the arms trade. That has been brought out a bit. A couple of years ago, in Algiers, I met a former Egyptian Foreign Minister who told me that there had been a seminar in Cairo about the crusades and that during the crusades European arms manufacturers supplied arms both to Richard Coeur de Lion and to Saladin. Nothing has really changed. Arms manufacturers have made billions of pounds from selling instruments of mass destruction, partly to hold down those colonial people so that the sheikhs will supply cheap oil, and partly because it is highly profitable to sell arms. I shall not try to differentiate between Governments, because the Labour Government did it too.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East said that it was wrong, and I shall have to put footnotes to that effect on every page of my diary—but at the same time, we did it too. The arms trade is a corrupt trade. If our troops have to fight those of Saddam Hussein—I hope that that does not happen—they will be fighting against modern weapons in part sold by Britain, France, America and Russia for profit. That is a major issue.

If we go to war—and there are those who think that we might—what will be our war aims? That is not an unreasonable question. Will it be to free Kuwait, to topple Hussein, or to destroy Iraqi weapons? My right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition went further than the Prime Minister in setting the objective. She said that it was to arrest Saddam Hussein and to bring him before an international crimes tribunal. The Prime Minister said that on television. Are British troops to be sent in to fight before their objective has been clarified? The Government have never made clear what is their aim. However, it is clear that the United States, having helped to arm Hussein, is determined to bring him down and to establish a new base.

I do not need to dwell on the consequences of war. They include a massive loss of life and possibly an air attack on oil installations. In the peculiar circumstances, we would to some extent, if not in every sense, be taking on Islam. Stalin is remembered for asking a very silly question. He asked how many battalions the Pope had. [HON. MEMBERS: "Divisions."] We should ask how many divisions the prophet Mohammed had. There are 105 million Muslims in India alone. We have some here, too. I am sure that the BBC World Service will explain that that has nothing to do with the situation, but there are people who will see our action as an attempt to reimpose a white, rich control over an area once dominated by the British empire.

The Prime Minister courteously gave way to me when I asked what I hope was a relevant question. She said three times—so she must have meant it—that she already has the legal right to attack Iraq and that no further stages are necessary. The only consideration is that that will be done not at her discretion but at that of President Bush. I say to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition that anyone who goes into the Lobby with the Government tomorrow night will be endorsing the view that no further action is needed to legalise an attack on Iraq.

Those who vote with the Government tomorrow will be voting for giving the Prime Minister a free hand or a blank cheque. Those who vote against the Government will be accepting the view expressed in my early-day motion, which calls on the Government

"to make a clear and unequivocal statement that it will not commit British Forces to offensive military operations against Iraq that have not been explicitly authorised by a Resolution passed by the Security Council and under the provisions of the UN Charter, which deals with the use of force by the United Nations and under its military command."

I referred to two points of view, but others may think that it is better to reserve judgment and not to vote at all. Even those who cannot go with my view may not want to give the Prime Minister a free hand between now and 15 October.

Yet another view has been constructively touched upon by other speakers—the belief that peace is possible, but that one must take a broad view of the factors involved. One must look both at the withdrawal of Iraqi troops from Kuwait and UN resolutions relating to the west bank. One cannot pick and choose between Security Council resolutions. One must have both a Palestinian state and security for Israel. One must deal also with the oil companies that are busy exploiting the situation as much as they can.

There has been a 7 per cent. fall in oil production worldwide but a 100 per cent. increase in its price. How is that justified? Thank God for Winston Churchill, who in 1914, when he was First Lord of the Admiralty, nationalised the Anglo-Iranian Petroleum Company for £2 million. His speech on that occasion made the strongest case for public control and ownership of oil companies that one can find. Winston Churchill said that countries were being squeezed by the oil companies.

If there is to be a peace-keeping force, it would be better if it were Arab, but I turn to the longer, post-cold-war perspective to which our attention has been properly drawn by a number of speeches. One cannot have a new order for the middle east based on the redeployment of white power in the form of a permanent American army in Saudi Arabia. That will not work. One is no longer dealing with the natives who featured in Rudyard Kipling's poems but with a quite different world. For me, the United Nations is the General Assembly, not the bigwigs, permanent and rotating members who sit on the Security council. I personally would like to see direct elections to the General Assembly. They might only return one British Member of Parliament, but I would certainly be a candidate, if that were possible.

We are always being told that we must come to terms with reality and that we must not live in the past. The fact remains that we live in a very small world of many religions. There are fundamentalist Christians. When

[Mr. Benn]

President Reagan spoke of an evil empire, he was declaring a Christian jihad against communism. Anyone who has visited America and listened to those Christian fundamentalists, who have not got into trouble and been removed, will know that they make their reputations out of their religious wars against communism. However, as right hon. and hon. Members know very well, the Americans stimulated Islam to defeat communism—but when communism changed, fundamentalism remained.

We shall have to plan and share the world's oil. America has only 2 per cent. of the world's population but uses 25 per cent of the world's resources. That situation cannot be allowed to last, even if America has a big army. The real function of the United Nations is to act as the custodian of social justice. It should not serve just as a policeman. The first meeting of the UN General Assembly took place in Central Hall, Westminster in 1945. Then, Gladwyn Jebb was its acting secretary-general. Some people may remember that. I was just back from war. My right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East and a former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup, know that the UN was the great hope to end wars. However, it was more than that. It was meant to promote social justice.

Those right hon. and hon. Members who support the Government's interpretation of the law, and their readiness to use their discretion without referring back to the House again, will vote with the Government in the Lobby tomorrow. Those who oppose the Government will vote with us, while others should abstain. I urge caution, because many other western European nations are being very cautious and have not sent troops. Many of the non-aligned countries are not really behind the action being taken by America and Britain.

It is time to try to take some of the hatred out of the situation. I shall never forget the day I was first elected to Parliament. No one ever does. It was 30 November 1950. That same day, President Truman said that he might drop an atom bomb on China. We were then using against the red Chinese the language that we are now using against Saddam Hussein. They were seen as worse than the Russians. Nevertheless, there was a Peace for China Committee, and China was later admitted to the United Nations. Whatever the Chinese Government may have done in Tiananmen square, no one wants a war with the Chinese, otherwise they would not have been given Hong Kong—[Laughter.] So much for the right of self-determination.

Mr. Heffer: Does not my right hon. Friend agree that it is not just a question of giving the Chinese Hong Kong but that the Americans have just agreed that they should have a special relationship and make special economic arrangements with China, despite the events of Tiananmen square?

Mr. Benn: I know that my hon. Friend, whom I much respect, will agree with me that morality and power march uneasily together in public life. At the time of the Suez crisis, the Father of the House and I clashed—something of which he generously reminds me occasionally. What was said then about Nasser is exactly the same as what is being said now about Saddam Hussein.

The Falklands may be too close for comfort. Not all that many people looking back, think that that huge expenditure was justified—[Interruption.] I do not think so. I have been in a minority before, and I might be in one now, but that does not worry me—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Benn: In 1986, there was the bombing of Libya which tried to kill Gaddafi—it killed his god-daughter, I believe. Our bases were used for that. Some people took the opposite view.

I urge caution because it is not the hardware of military weapons that frightens me. A gun cannot go off by itself. It is the hatred which makes people want to use weapons. That is the fuel of war and in the past few months we have had the most vicious war propaganda pumped down our throats. The temper of peace, of which Pandit Nehru used to speak, is what we need, and we want to be cautious and to let it work its way through the United Nations. For that reason, Mr. Speaker—it would not have been possible without some help from the Chair—I intend to divide the House against the Adjournment motion tomorrow.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the House that the 10-minutes rule on speeches will operate between 6 and 8 o'clock.

Sir Dennis Walters (Westbury): As the 10-minute rule applies, I shall not be able to deal with a number of the points made in an eloquent speech by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). He always speaks eloquently, but his conclusions are usually wrong. In any event, it is absurd for anyone who knows the middle east to compare Nasser with Saddam Hussein. Their records and their respective countries are totally different.

Undoubtedly there is massive support in the House and in the country for the Government's policy on the Gulf crisis. The facts are abundantly clear. President Saddam Hussein's attack on Kuwait, which was a member not only of the United Nations but of the Arab League, was an act of blatant aggression. It was callous and unprovoked and was particularly beastly because for eight years, while Iraq fought for its life against Iran, Kuwait gave Iraq generous and unstinting support. Saddam Hussein's accusations launched at the Emir of Kuwait were a grotesque distortion of the truth. Sheikh Jaber al-Sabah is one of the most independent-minded and wise of Arab leaders.

I have been a member of the Kuwait Investment Advisory Board—an interest which is duly recorded—for many years and I was therefore able to witness at close quarters Kuwait's munificence to Iraq during the war and, for much longer, the enlightened investment policies pioneered by the Emir. There are not many countries whose principal investment portfolio is the "future generations fund", which is precisely what its name indicates. It was established to support future generations of Kuwaiti citizens without having to rely on oil revenues.

The Government obviously are right in what they have done and said. This act of aggression must not be allowed to succeed. Co-operation between the United States and the Soviet Union has been the most encouraging aspect of the crisis, and it is essential that it should continue. Saddam Hussein's two crucial miscalculations were, first, that a puppet Quisling regime would speedily emerge in Kuwait and, secondly, that the Soviet Union and the United States would immediately be at loggerheads about how to respond to his aggression.

Hopefully, the economic action taken will have the desired effect. Sanctions should start to bite before too long, and bite severely. Eventually it is not unreasonable to expect that Saddam Hussein or his successor will be forced to comply with the United Nations resolution calling for the immediate Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait. Should that not happen, we must accept that action, under article 51, will have to be contemplated.

As has been said, the legitimate Government of Kuwait would be entitled to ask for the removal of the Iraqi presence from Kuwait. Should action become unavoidable, it is essential that the United States and the Soviet Union should act in concert. British and European Community diplomats should employ all their skills to help to cement the new Russo-American understanding.

I shall now mention the wider scene in the middle east. It is simply not good enough for the United States and the world community to deal exclusively with one act of aggression. It would not be acceptable to the Arab masses, who cannot and should not be lightly dismissed. if the United Nations, under American leadership, dealt speedily with one outrage while allowing others to continue festering. Why is King Hussein, one of the best friends of Britain and the west, so disturbed? Why is the Arab world partially divided over Iraqi aggression? The answer is relatively simple for anyone willing to take an objective view of the area and its history. It is Palestine and the running sore of the Arab-Israeli dispute, which is still unresolved and where efforts to do so have been at best half-hearted and often contemptible.

Twenty-three years have passed since Israel was called upon to withdraw from Arab territories occupied by force in 1967. United Nations resolution 242 is quite explicit, but Israel has not budged, and, what is more, it has continued to pursue a policy of savage repression against the Palestinian people on the west bank and in Gaza and no one has bothered to do much about it.

In the past two years alone, 159 Palestinian children under the age of 16 have been slaughtered and thousands wounded. What has the international community done about that? Some years ago, Israel invaded Lebanon, and its artillery mercilessly bombarded Beirut for weeks on end. What did the international community do then? Some years ago Israel bombed Tunis—the capital of a sovereign state—which was a clear act of international piracy. Again, the international community failed to take appropriate action.

Regrettably, the realities of internal American politics in the past have not allowed the United States to act even handedly in the area. This continuing exercise in double standards has created a seething and unfathomable sense of bitterness, frustration and anger in the Arab world.

President Bush and Mr. Baker have rightly said that they want a stable middle east, but they will not get it unless they face up to this reality. Therefore, it was most encouraging that Mr. Baker seemed to recognise this fact when he told the House of Representatives Foreign Affairs Committee that > "America accepted that regional stability in the Middle East must include a settlement of the Palestinian issue."

Subsequent reports from Washington seem less encouraging, but I hope that the quotation I have cited represents the authentic view of the American Administration and I hope that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, who has just returned from an important and successful visit to the area, will be able to confirm that that is so.

We now face a genuine opportunity for good and one for evil. For good, after Iraq has agreed to withdraw from Kuwait, the United States and the Soviet Union should jointly sponsor an international conference to deal with all the middle east's territorial and economic problems, especially the Palestinian problem, and the role of the United Nations should become genuinely effective.

For evil, there exists a real danger that King Hussein may fall and be replaced by a fanatically anti-western fundamentalist regime. The King is facing gigantic economic and political problems, and needs major help and understanding—not the kind of idiotic comment that was made by some American senator or congressman the other day, describing him as a wimp.

Should Jordan be destabilised, this could be the moment for which the Shamir Government have been waiting for in order to implement the transfer solution so beloved by Likud racialists: that is, to expel the bulk of the west bank population. Such a move would have catastrophic and irredeemable consequences for western interests, and for the whole of the middle east. Wars and chaos would rage. It must not be allowed to happen: the opportunity for good must be seized, and, after the Iraqis have been obliged to leave Kuwait and the Emir and his legitimate Kuwait Government have been restored, the Palestinian problem must be dealt with immediately. That unresolved cancer, which is at the root of almost all the dangerous turmoil in the middle east, must finally be tackled and resolved.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): I hardly need to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I share most of the sentiments expressed in that excellent speech by the right hon. Member for Westbury (Sir D. Walters), who is an old political friend of mine.

No apologist could clear Saddam Hussein of his crimes. The Iraqi dictator has an appalling record of repression, torture and murder; he has brought upon himself the near-universal condemnation of the world community. His occupation of Kuwait was a criminal misjudgment which could drench that region in blood.

I deplore the invasion of Kuwait, and pray that sanctions may succeed; but it is only fair to Iraq itself—not to the dictator—to state that there may be some validity in its claim to Kuwait, which lay in that region of the Ottoman empire and which was a British creation in the colonial post-first world war carve-up. Are we going to go to war every time some country in Asia or Africa or the middle east has a boundary dispute over the colonial boundaries that we drew? Of course we are not.

There was a special factor in Kuwait, and that was American interest. The United States has jumped at the opportunity to benefit from Hussein's action. It has clear war aims; do not let us fool ourselves about this. The first is, in the memorable phrase of an American commentator, "to make the world safe for gas guzzlers".

The Americans intend to control the supply of oil from Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states to ensure their immense consumption of oil. To do that, their second aim is to destroy the Iraqi regime and, by their continued military presence, to ensure a compliant successor. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Faulds: Oh, they can mumble away; they do not want to know, because they do not want to learn.

The Americans intend to control the supply of oil from Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states to ensure their immense consumption of oil. To do that, their second aim—I am repeating this for the benefit of those who did not want to hear—is to destroy the Iraqi regime and, by their continued military presence, to ensure a compliant successor. They are playing the role that we played earlier in setting up regimes which would conform to our requirements for the supply of oil.

But their third aim is the most sinister: to bring about the dominance of Israel in the area. Even most Members of the House probably know nothing of the strategic alliance that Reagan set up between Israel and the United States. No one so far has mentioned it. Of course, one should never underestimate the ignorance of the House of Commons on major matters.

Reports have it that Israeli politicians and strategists are urging America to war. Military commentators are urging, "Do it now," and, once the war starts, under the strategic alliance—which hon. Members should perhaps learn something about—and its web of options, there will undoubtedly be attacks by Israel on Iraq's strategic targets: nuclear and chemical sites and missiles and communications.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Faulds: No. I have 10 minutes, and I am going to use every moment.

In leading their great moral crusade, what hypocrisy the United States Government display! Their aggressions since the last war have been flagrant: in Vietnam, the war they lost—America can lose wars: against Nicaragua: in Panama; and in the great military victory in one of Her Majesty's realms, Grenada. Why, when Israel invaded Lebanon, was no such stringent action, led by the United States, taken against Israel? Instead, the United States supplied Israel with its latest weapons to try out against the Lebanese civilians, who died in their thousands.

What action does the United States pursue to bring to an end the Israeli Government's harassment, torture and murder of hundreds of Palestinians in the illegally occupied territories? What is the difference in moral terms between occupied territories in Palestine, Lebanon and Syria, and occupied territory in Kuwait? What nauseating hypocrites American politicians are—and that, of course, applies also to some of our own home-grown variety.

James Baker, the United States Secretary of State, is now attempting another gloss—the establishment of a new security structure. The purpose of the operation is to lead the world towards a middle east settlement to remove the region's threat to global order. Are the Americans going to induce Israel to give up the occupied territories? Are they going to cease to provide Israel with the newest armaments which give them control of the region? James Baker's scheme to remove the region's threat to global order entails the removal of Iraq's chemical, nuclear and ballistic missiles. What about Israel's nuclear and chemical threat, and its ballistic missiles? Are they to go to remove the region's threat to global order, or are they to remain in site to guarantee Israel's and America's control of the area? What utter, nauseous hyprocrisy this is.

What about our Prime Minister's role in all this moral charade? She always has to be more macho than the male, of course. She leapt in to support the United States. She thrives on the whiff of grapeshot, but she really does not know the background to developments in the Gulf—or anywhere else in the world, come to that. She is ignorant of history, and unaware and unconcerned about the beliefs and cultures of people in the world outside. She committed British troops—with the support of the "Gotcha!" and gutter British press—but she delayed consulting the House of Commons. We are just to rubber-stamp her jingoistic jaunt. But, most significantly, she backed the United States Government's policy in the middle east without any reference to our EC colleaugues, which shows her disregard for our European involvement. Then she proceeded to insult most of them for not tagging on quickly enough.

Can there be a resolution without war? The redrawing of a colonially imposed boundary would be a small price to pay for peace. It appears that Saddam Hussein has offered to link some Kuwaiti realignment with Israeli withdrawal in Palestine and Syrian withdrawal in Lebanon. Might it not be worthwhile to examine such an arrangement? But, better still, might it not be advisable, before war breaks out—as it will if we continue on this course—to respond to Mr. Gorbachev's proposal to hold a middle east conference where all these necessary steps could be pursued, and justice achieved for all the aggrieved parties: Lebanese as well as Palestinians, Kuwaitis as well as Syrians? It would make much more sense, and be juster and much more successful, I guess, than Mr. Baker's pursuit of a pax Americana—which might have very little "pax" about it.

Mr. Julian Amery (Brighton, Pavilion): Like the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), the hon. Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds) managed to inject the music of controversy into the debate, but without—as far as I could see—really disagreeing with the fundamental proposition that the Iraqis have to withdraw from Kuwait. It cheered us up, but it did not add a great deal to the debate.

The right hon.—and gallant—Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) reminded us of the dangers of war. He was quite right: on that journey, men know where they start but not where they will end up. The right hon. Gentleman then treated us to a charming autobiographical account of his own ideological progress. He has occupied a distinguished career, which could, I think, be described as the triumph of intellect over consistency. If anyone is responsible for the debate that we are holding today—although I would not want to attribute too much to any one man—it is the right hon. Member for Leeds, East. We are discussing the crisis today because he initiated the dismantling of the British security system in the Arabian peninsula without ensuring that an alternative system was put in its place.

It is easy to see what I mean. In 1961, when the Iraqi dictator of the day threatened Kuwait, the British Government—the Macmillan Government—said, "Is this for real or is it bluff?" We could not tell. Intelligence reports gave us the troop figures, but we did not know what would happen. We said that we could not take the risk, so we put in the Army, the Air Force and the Navy. The Iraqi dictator retreated and was toppled. We could not have done that unless we had had a major base in Aden and facilities in Oman and Sharjah, an advance base in Bahrain and stockpiles in Kuwait.

When, a month ago, the present Iraqi dictator concentrated his troops on the borders of Kuwait, the Americans had no facilities, even if they had had the will, to meet the crisis. Their nearest base was Diego Garcia, 2,000 or 3,000 miles away. There were no stockpiles and no facilities that they could have used, so Kuwait fell. We were lucky that Saddam Hussein did not push his luck further and go for the eastern province of Saudi Arabia.

The lesson is clear. The states of the Arabian peninsula, friends as they have been to us over the years, do not have the resources, the population or the strength to protect the oil resources that are vital to the economies of America, Europe and Japan. They cannot defend those oil resources by themselves.

I am sorry that he is not here, but I take issue with my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath). I do not believe that, by itself, an Arab solution would work. The Arabs are bitterly divided. They make European union look like federation. We could not rely on them to protect the oil resources. A great many of them are interested in the issue only because they hope to get some of the oil wealth for themselves.

We—when I say "we" I mean the United States, which is quite rightly playing the leading role, Europe and Japan —will have to accept the responsibility for a regional organisation. I was glad to see that Secretary Baker gave his support to that concept. It has as yet to be developed, whether under the United Nations—that would be ideal —NATO, or an offshoot of NATO—perhaps. Something new is needed that includes those Arab countries that want to join us. But there will have to be an organisation with bases and facilities to protect those interests that are so vital to the role of the industrial world.

I shall be told that this is neo-imperialism. I do not believe that it is. The states of the Arab peninsula never wanted us to go. King Feisal begged us to stay in Aden and offered to subsidise the maintenance of the British base, until the right hon. Member for Leeds, East rejected the proposal as turning British forces into mercenaries. There was a chance then, and there is a chance again today, for the industrial countries of the west and Japan to contribute both forces and finance in order to set up a regional organisation to protect those resources on which the industrial world depends.

We in Britain are playing a supporting role. I do not believe that we should become too deeply involved militarily unless we are also involved in planning the strategy. However, we have unique experience of that part of the world. We have something else, too. Our continental European friends have not shown quite the response that I had hoped for to the crisis in the middle east. In December, we shall be talking to them about financial and political union. I hope that we shall drive home the lesson that there is not much point in talking about financial union if they are not prepared to defend the most important economic interests of the west, and that there is not much point in talking about political union if they are not prepared to come together with us to meet the threat that faces us. Here is an opportunity for us to give the lead.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): It may be useful to consider what Saddam Hussein is planning at this stage, because then we might be better able, in the words of the Leader of the Opposition, successfully to prevent him. He intends to sit tight. Having annexed Kuwait, he intends to absorb it fully into Iraq. He does not intend to provoke a conflict. He has already instructed his forces not to respond to any United Nations naval intervention on the high seas. He intends to allow his aeroplanes to put United States, Saudi and British aeroplanes on full alert by flying close to the border, but he will not cross it. Unless there is a miscalculation, he does not intend to provoke war; he will just sit tight.

Some people say that sanctions will bring him down. I should like to be able to believe them. We must tighten the air embargo. At the moment, considerable air traffic is going into Iraq, so that sanction must be tightened. There are long borders around Iraq and there are traditional black market routes along which, over the centuries, goods have entered Iraq. This leader does not care about privation for his own people. His country had to put up with tremendous privation during the Iran-Iraq war. Given that, for humanitarian reasons, we cannot starve Iraq, it will be very difficult to make sanctions work. They will work only if there is the fullest support from the Soviet Union.

Easily the most hopeful event is that at last the Security Council is working as it was envisaged that it would work. The creation of the military staff committee is immensely important. I hope that the United States will give up some of its anxieties about the military staff committee being made fully effective. I hope that the Soviet Union and China will be involved fully and absolutely in the implementation of the embargo. It would be no bad thing if the military staff committee discussed some of the problems of the multinational force on the ground in Saudi Arabia. There is no reason why they should not be discussed.

Technically speaking, because of the way in which the military staff committee has been constructed, it will not be provided with a full mandate to discuss the United Nations embargo. However, it is operating flexibly and developing new techniques. It is massively important that President Bush is to speak to President Gorbachev on Sunday. It is understandable that President Gorbachev is faced with an immense dilemma.

There are many who call for United Nations action and who rule out any other action. It is nonsense to rule out action under article 51. If Saddam Hussein is to be pressurised to come out of Kuwait, he has got to fear the possibility of a massive attack. Let us be clear about this talk of a first strike. The only first strike was that by Saddam Hussein of Iraq against Kuwait. Any action that is taken in consequence of that is secondary.

I believe and hope that, by means of diplomatic pressure and in particular the involvement of the Soviet Union, we can make Saddam Hussein give up Kuwait by the further tightening of sanctions, economic pressure and more Arab unity. I believe, however, that that man would prefer to give up Kuwait as a result of a military battle, and I am afraid that that is what eventually it will turn out to be.

Some say that we have to wait indefinitely. Some of the speeches—I regret the speech of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath)—gave the impression that we could wait indefinitely. We cannot wait indefinitely. A very sophisticated army is building up in Saudi Arabia and in the Gulf which is on full alert. It can be on nothing other than full alert, day after day, in the most appalling conditions. Some people believed that our task force off the Falkland islands could wait indefinitely for a diplomatic solution and for a UN peace settlement, which we now know General Galtieri had no intention of giving.

There will come a judgment, and it may be before Christmas, when people will have to consider whether Saddam Hussein will give up Kuwait without force. All that has been said about using force is absolutely true, and nothing is truer than the comments of some of those who have experienced war. This will be a bloody fight, because there is little doubt that he will use gas. He used it at the start of hostilities, and frequently, against Iran, and he has used it against the Kurds. It will be difficult to combat.

For all these reasons, it would be a tremendous advance for a new security order if the Soviet Union could be persuaded to use article 39 and do what happened in Korea, and for the United Nations to vest responsibility for a United Nations force in a United States commander. I know that the circumstances were different—Russia was not participating and China was represented by Chiang Kai-shek—but if one looks back from our new world and reruns 1950, one sees what a difference there would have been if a military staff committee had operated as it is now. What a difference there would have been if we had been able to involve Russia and communist China. Had that united action taken place, the Korean war would have been over in months and we would never have seen the Russian and mainly communist Chinese push.

Historic parallels are always flawed and there are many flaws in this. It is almost impossible to believe that Gorbachev could endorse such a United Nations force under article 39, but the inconceivable has been happening in the Soviet Union over the past few months—more than any of us predicted—and it is worth going every mile to try to achieve that. That may mean giving Gorbachev an assurance that the United States will take very seriously the resolution of the middle east, involving the west bank, Israel and Syria. Syrian forces are on the ground as part of the multinational force, and Syria is not a moderate Arab state but a radical revolutionary Arab state. Gorbachev has the right to know that the United States will take the principles of international law and the authority of the United Nations fully into account—not overt linkage, because the problems are separate and different—in trying to get an Arab-Israeli solution as well.

Gorbachev wants many other things from the western democracies. His economy is virtually collapsing around his ears. He is no longer a super-power and it is doubtful whether he could commit forces in a major way. If he cannot get over that article 39 threshold, and I understand why he may not be able to, we have at least the hope that he will understand why we may be forced, under article 51, to take military action involving other Arabs at the request of the legitimate Kuwaiti Government and the Saudi Arabians. If we maintain the consensus that has developed among the multinational force—it is a historic miracle to have got those forces together—there might be military action that would not last very long and would not involve a great deal of loss of life.

Listening to this debate, if I had been Saddam Hussein I would have been pleased to hear a few of the speeches that have been made. They seemed to be an invitation for him to go on sitting tight, spinning it out and letting people get generally exasperated. I pray that force will not be necessary, but history shows us that, when dealing with aggressors who have no regard to international law and to the lives of their own citizens, let alone citizens of other countries, one must be ready to use force.

It would be a massive mistake if from this debate in the House of Commons came a message that Britain was not ready, in the right circumstances, backed by international law and the multinational effort of many different colours, creeds and beliefs, to uphold international law.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): When the House met in emergency session in 1982 to debate the invasion of the Falkland Islands, the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) made one of the most compelling and responsible speeches. If I may say so, I think that he did so again on this occasion. His speech was a timely if sombre reminder that we shall have to use resolve and patience in this crisis.

The speeches of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition matched the overwhelming view and mood of the House and, indeed, of the public at large. Although there are undoubtedly differences of inflection in the legal interpretation of the UN resolutions, we should all pay respect to the alacrity and clarity with which the Opposition came to the support of the Government in supporting the United States and British deployment shortly after the invasion.

As a House, we should pay a wholehearted tribute to my right hon. Friends the Foreign Secretary, the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, and Ministers at the Ministry of Defence. They have worked extremely hard and have dealt with the issue sensitively, forthrightly and with a keen understanding of where the national and international interests lie.

Arabs have been taking over each other's wells since time immemorial, but the stakes on this occasion are of a different order. It is not so much the sovereignty of Kuwait or the supremacy of the al-Sabahs which is paramount, although these are important to reinstate. There are greater issues at stake. Not only is there the security and independence of other Kingdoms in the Gulf region but there is the economic self-interest of the western world. The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) seemed almost to deride this as a criterion that we should not consider. It certainly is legitimate to consider our own sources of essential energy supplies. The cost would indeed be great if we were to allow a disproportionate amount of oil supplies from the Gulf to be vested in the hands of one aberrant and abhorrent dictator. The cost would be great for mankind and for the world. We simply cannot allow it to happen.

There is, however, a principle at stake which transcends even the regional or economic issues—the basic sovereignty and independence of nation states and the principle of self-determination embodied in the United Nations charter. If we stand aside and allow invasion and subjection to take place in wilful disregard of international law and civil liberties what country can proclaim its freedom and what hope can there be for a more secure world order?

So far, the world has held together in this crisis. We all know that it will take time. It may cost lives, it will certainly cost money and public patience may wear thin as the possibility of humiliation eats away at public resolve. Those are the times for the House, which can lead public opinion, to say to the Government that they can count on us for support. As a House, we trust the individual judgments of the Prime Minister and of Ministers vested with responsibility.

However, there will be a real problem if we voluntarily give away the right to take what military action is necessary under resolution 661. One of the considerations that the President in Baghdad will take into account—I am among those who have met the man and he does seem to change his opinions from day to day—is the likelihood of military action being taken against him. If we voluntarily relinquish that, we have to rely entirely on the hope of sanctions. If we then say, "Let us rely on secure sanctions," what happens in three, six or nine months? Let us suppose that we are here in a year's time and, against all probability, the status quo continues. If we return to the United Nations, does anyone seriously believe that the United Nations will agree unanimously, "Yes, we will go to war against Iraq next week"? Even if it did, what would be left of Kuwait by then? What is left of Kuwait already? That land has been laid waste and its assets have been raped.

In my judgment, as in the judgment of the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport, it may be in the near future that decisions have to be made of a pre-emptive nature and of a selective nature to back up secure sanctions with the firm use of military power. What counts is not just the deployment and possession of military power but being seen as being willing to use it. Saddam Hussein must understand that we, with others, will stand up for international rights. If we fail to do so, we shall be failing our people and any hope of a new world order.

Mr. A. E. P. Duffy (Sheffield, Attercliffe): This recalled Parliament—especially those hon. Members who have supported the arguments of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition—has a vital opportunity to clear its mind about what sort of fight we are engaged in with Mr. Saddam Hussein, and about what outcome we seek. It is vital that our American ally is also clear about these matters. Two of the aims of President Bush have been declared. The unspoken third poses an increasingly worrying prospect.

The first of the stated purposes was to draw a line in the sand along the Saudi border. The second was to get Iraq out of Kuwait. So far, the path towards these goals has depended crucially on sustaining the international consensus that aggression shall not pay and the legal and moral basis for that, set out in the United Nations Security Council resolution.

Some voices, notably that of The Sunday Times on Sunday last, have asked what will happen when sanctions fail to force Iraq to retreat from Kuwait. The Sunday Times went on to argue that there will then be no choice but a full-scale war aimed not only at the total defeat of Iraq but at the toppling of Saddam Hussein. I trust that the United States and the United Kingdom will contemplate such a course of action with great reluctance.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) said, there is no such thing as a clinical action in warfare. My right hon. Friend knew combat conditions and there are still some hon. Members who knew not only combat conditions but combat roles. If there is one recollection above all that I carry with me, it is of the unpredictability of stratagems.

Even an invasion of Kuwait would be fraught with great difficulty and risk, and an invasion of Iraq would mean a battle with the whole of its 1 million man army. American air superiority would be decisive after a time, but the ground war would be the main hazard. What is required is not naval or air forces, but land forces. The United States will not have enough land forces or tanks, and unless there are vastly increased land forces, in place and provided with stiff logistical backing, there will be problems. Those of us watching closely know how far that is going astray and how far behind is the timetable.

The pursuit of any one of these aims would run the risk of there being a heavier toll on America and its allies than many people have assumed. Already, reinforcement and supply have encountered serious delay. I hope that the United States will entertain such options only after the gravest consideration. Therefore, I join those who have called for caution.

Furthermore, Iraq is a good deal less vulnerable than has been assumed. Even our key weapon—sanctions—involves a prolonged confrontation in which twists, turns and pitfalls aplenty will test nerve and resolve. If it holds tight, the embargo could be decisive, given that Iraq normally imports 80 per cent. of its food. However, such a strategy needs time, and how much will President Bush give it? He has to calculate whether, with only an embargo and blockade, he can hold out for victory over Mr. Hussein.

I have recent experience of opinion within North Atlantic Assembly circles, as I led a delegation to the middle east in the past two or three weeks which included representatives of 13 of our allies. The US senators and congressmen in that delegation said that they do not want unilateral action by their country. They want multilateral action. They want allies. They do not want to be left to go it alone.

I notice that several of America's allies, and ours, while supporting what Mr. Bush says, would still like to draw a more distinct line. They would like to pause for breath between enforcing the UN embargo and deciding what to do about Mr. Hussein's regime. Is it not premature, at this critical juncture, to proceed on the basis of too flexible an interpretation of article 51? None of us will believe that Mr. Hussein is not aware of this. We know that, if he is smart, he will sit tight and hope that the resolve of his enemies will crack before his does. His speech yesterday suggests that he will try to exploit the gap between the peoples and the Governments of the Arab world.

Mr. Hussein's appeal will almost certainly grow as the confrontation continues. Two strong currents flow through Arab politics—the secular nationalism that made

[Mr. A. E. P. Duffy]

Nasser a hero in the 1950s and 1960s and an older but newly reviving faith in militant Islam. Usually, these currents flow in different directions. Mr. Hussein, sitting tight, will portray himself as a proud Arab under siege by the west, and will try to merge the Arabs behind him. To many Arabs, Mr. Hussein offers the prospect of two things they have long wanted—a rediscovery of Arab unity and the power to defy the west.

So far, relations between the Saudis and the United States forces have gone well, but there are dangerous undercurrents. One must not underestimate the forces of conservatism that remain the bedrock of modern Saudi Arabia. The non-Gulf Governments in the Arab League —even that of Egypt—are uneasy about the growing western army in Saudi Arabia. The divisions among the Arabs may grow if they come to believe that America wants not just to free Kuwait but to overthrow Mr. Hussein. Difficulties will undoubtedly arise for the Prime Minister and the President if the Iraqis start mistreating hostages or if the Americans decide on military action before any United Nations discussion on the further use of force. How would American and British public opinion react to the bloody reality of a shooting war or to weeks of television of pictures of haggard hostages and their relatives?

As Saddam Hussein plays his cat and mouse game with the hostages, the United States, Britain and their allies should make it their highest priority to maintain the international unity of purpose that is their most powerful and legitimate weapon. The time for negotiations is not yet ripe. Sanctions first have to bite and even diplomacy would be ill-timed and futile before full British and American military power is in place to back it up. Until that time, what is needed, as other hon. Members have said, is a steadiness of nerve and political determination, and avoidance of defeatism.

If conflict becomes unavoidable, we shall have to gird our loins, because the alternative would be only a wringing of hands. As time goes on and appeasement proposals proliferate, the strains on our allies' unity will undoubtedly grow. All wars are popular for the first few weeks, but if shooting starts, much blood will be shed and it will not be just Iraqi blood.

Mr. Richard Luce (Shoreham): I am glad to follow the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Duffy) and to stress, as he said—he was, of course, right—that it is important that we take action with the greatest degree of international support. That is exactly what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary have been endeavouring to do so vigorously over the past few weeks. I am sure that that will continue to be the Government's main objective.

I cannot help but reflect on the speech of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). I do not think—I hope that I am right—that Saddam Hussein will have heard of the right hon. Gentleman. I suppose that that is some consolation, because it would be very bad if his speech were the message which got across to Iraq as the clear message was that, in the right hon. Gentleman's view, aggressors should be allowed to get away with aggression. That is entirely unacceptable.

The right hon. Gentleman also has an instinctive prejudice against the United States. However, without the immediate reaction of the United States in deploying forces at the request of the Saudi Arabian Government, Iraqi forces would be in Saudi Arabia now. The price that we would have to pay for the pursuit of the right hon. Gentleman's policies would be wholly and utterly disastrous for the world. I watched the right hon. Gentleman's expression carefully as he spoke. Clearly, he was enjoying himself. I am not absolutely convinced that he was convinced by what he was saying, but that is a matter for him to justify.

I want to join other colleagues in congratulating my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and her colleagues on the skill, wisdom and resolution with which they have tackled this very difficult crisis over the past few weeks. We are embarking on a course in which there cannot be one hon. Member in the Chamber who does not want a peaceful outcome. However, many of us know that there is a real prospect that some measure of force will have to be used. When we are risking the lives of our own service men, it becomes all the more essential that we maintain our clarity of purpose in the exercise and that we keep our sights on the real objective.

To that extent, I welcome most warmly the robust speech by the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock), the leader of the Labour party. That, rather than the message of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield, is the important message going out from the House. The message from leaders of all parties is that aggression must not pay, and the Iraqis must take notice of that message. We all know what is at stake. In the interests of international order, we must demonstrate that aggression never pays.

We also know that there are interests not just for the western world, but for the Japanese, for the Americans and for many others. We depend on the middle east for so many of our oil supplies. If they get into the hands of a tyrant who can control the supply and prices of the oil, he could hold the world to ransom.

We should not forget that this country has many friends of long standing in the Gulf. Throughout the bulk of this century, we have worked closely with them, and it is right that we should continue to do so.

We must keep our sights on the main objectives—the defence of the Gulf states, the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait and the re-establishing of the legitimate Kuwaiti Government. All of us in this Chamber agree that that must, if possible, be achieved by peaceful means, so we must hope that sanctions will work. The history of sanctions this century does not give us a very encouraging signal. Nevertheless, because it is possible for geographical reasons to exercise tight control on the supply of oil to Iraq, sanctions may bring results over a short time span.

It would be fatal if we gave a message to the Iraqi leaders that, at the end of the day, we were not prepared to maintain a military option. We must send the right signal on that from this Chamber. It would be fatal if we were to tie the hands of the British Government, the United States Government or any other Government who are prepared to contribute militarily to the middle east. I am glad that many hon. Members have endorsed that, and that we agree that article 51 provides the umbrella. We wish to do all that with the fullest possible international support. We have achieved it so far and we must go on working for that aim.

The third objective is to secure the longer-term stability of the region. I am glad that quite a lot of the discussion has been on that issue and that many hon. Members have welcomed the excellent speech made by Secretary of State Baker.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Amery) made an important speech on the Gulf. Until the early 1970s, Britain played the leading role in protecting the Gulf states. If they wished to call on British forces to defend them, we were there and ready to do so. That has not been our position for the past 15 years, but my right hon. Friend is right to look to the longer term in the Gulf and to say that we must have multinational arrangements, with as much United Nations co-operation as possible, and with Arab participation.

However, to expect the Arab world to work on its own in the present context would be unrealistic. It was, of course, right in 1961 when we had that special link with Kuwait for us to be able to put in forces and to deter invasion. An Arab League force was formed soon after that, but in the current circumstances, with the strength of the Iraqi forces, it is not realistic to expect the Arabs to do it on their own.

We must be ruthless internationally in the enforcement of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty and in dealing with the chemical problem. We must also be careful about the Palestinian issue. There is an indirect link. We must solve the problem of the Iraqi invasion before we can deal, as we must, vigorously and internationally, with the Palestine issue. So long as that issue is unsolved, we shall be sitting on a powder keg which could go up at any time.

Other positive factors, such as the end of the cold war era and the sudden emergence and willingness of the United Nations, with some Soviet encouragement, to act more positively, are working in our favour, and we can build on them. It is important to bring the Soviet Union as closely into this as we can.

Although many of us feel that European Community countries and other European nations have been slow to respond with contributions to the middle east, we must get across to our European allies the fact that we have exactly the same interest in seeing stability in the middle east, and that it is wrong to leave the whole matter to the United States.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence will speak tomorrow. There is a clear message for our defences in this country. We know perfectly well that, although we may have seen the end of the cold war era, the prospect of regional disputes is as strong as ever and we cannot risk diminishing the strength of our defence forces.

The message going out today and tomorrow must be absolutely clear, and there must be no misunderstanding by Saddam Hussein. In 1984, I visited Iraq and had one hour with Saddam Hussein. It is not an experience that I should like to repeat. I was told then that he modelled himself on Nebuchadnezzar, who specialised in expanding his empire. Our message to Saddam Hussein must be that aggression will not pay. He would do better to spend his time recreating the excellent hanging gardens of Babylon.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): Like other hon. Members, I do not rule out the use of force to prise Kuwait away from the Government of Iraq. But we have not reached the point when a decision on that must be made, and it has been an error of the debate for the House to be considering, as it were, simply the status quo —effective universal mandatory economic sanctions— having in view, after that, the need for the use of force and circumstances, legal and otherwise, under which force might be used. We must address ourselves more realistically to the interim period, of some months, before we may be faced with the possibility of using force, when the battle for hearts and minds in the middle east and elsewhere will be waged fiercely.

I hope that when replying to the debate the Foreign Secretary will comment on the fact that we have not heard anything about efforts being made to discredit Saddam Hussein in the middle east and in his own country. Do we have broadcasting mechanisms in Saudi Arabia, Cairo and elsewhere by which the exiled Kuwaiti Government can broadcast to their people in Kuwait, giving encouragement and answering the lies and arguments of Saddam Hussein, all the time pointing out the total lack of legitimacy of himself and his rotten party's rule in his country? We should be making that type of counter-move.

If sanctions are to be really effective, we must look after those countries that are more vulnerable even than Iraq to them. We should be in no doubt that, for example, Jordan is in a state of acute crisis and that Egypt and Turkey are facing enormous difficulties and dangers. If the sanctions policy is not to be undermined, the international community must come to the aid of countries which are behaving well in terms of the United Nations collective endeavour but which are at great risk in their economies and even in their political systems.

If we are to help those countries and sustain their will to enforce economic sanctions, we must be prepared to engage in burden-sharing for the cost of the whole operation. It cannot be met by the United States alone. The whole world community must contribute, and if that means that we as a country must face an additional special international security levy in the coming Budget, we—hon. Members on both sides of the House—should be prepared to accept it.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) rose——

Mr. Shore: I have only 10 minutes in which to speak and cannot give way.

We must take effective action on the whole issue of oil. There has been immense disparity between the oil price as quoted immediately before August 2 and the price today. It has moved from $16 to about $30 a barrel. Now that we have an OPEC guarantee to make up the balance of lost production from Kuwait and Iraq on the world market, the time has come to examine international stockholdings of oil. We have 90 or more days' supply. We should try to operate on the market to bring down the price to a more reasonable level. It should now be not $30 but in the region of $25 to $27. We have large reserves, and we should use them.

It is important for us to take seriously the economic problems that arise from the conflict, and I take a contrary view to that of some of my hon. Friends on this issue. The United States is not being the world's greatest beneficiary from what is happening. America is not the country that most needs middle eastern oil. Continental Europe, Japan and above all, third world countries which are not themselves oil producers are the main beneficiaries. We recall the misery that was suffered as a result of the vast indebtedness that afflicted many third world countries in 1974.

It is not a question of American imperialism grabbing the oil of the middle east. It is vital that the world in general—all of us, and above all the developing countries of the third world—has access to oil supplies at a price that exploits neither the producers nor consumers of oil. We should be thinking about such measures now, and I hope that the Foreign Secretary will deal with those issues when he replies to the debate.

We would be wrong to allow ourselves to become involved too deeply in what I regard as the excessive legalisms of articles 51 and 42. The legal arguments are finely balanced and, like other hon. Members, I could make a decent case to justify the use of force under either article. We must consider the political judgment, wisdom and effectiveness of what we do, and my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition adduced a good argument when dealing with that issue.

If we get substantial agreement in the United Nations —it may fall short of unanimity in the Security Council —among the nations of the west, of the third world and of the Arab world, for the use of military action to free Kuwait, we shall then have every reason to pursue that course, if we must do so and if economic sanctions do not work.

It must be said, in balancing economic sanctions with the possible use of military sanctions, that terrible things are going on in Kuwait. While we talk about the problems of mobilising military force and keeping troops at the ready, let us remember that the people of Kuwait fear not only the collapse of the state but the real meaning of annexation, which is a problem of population movement affecting Kuwait. There are only 800,000 or so Kuwaitis. Now that Kuwait has been declared part of the province of Basra, what is to stop Saddam Hussein moving people in large numbers out of Kuwait and replacing them—there is evidence that this is starting—with people from other parts of Iraq? Should we sit back and watch that being inflicted on the people of Kuwait? If we do, and if such a ruthless policy is undertaken, there will be no gain at the end of the day for us if Kuwait has been destroyed.

I do not believe that it is possible to take seriously the United Nations as an institution if we do not accept that the meaning of collective security—above all in this post-cold-war age—means the willingness to use international force, economic or, if need be, military, to achieve the goals of international security and justice which many of us came out of the second world war determined to achieve.

Sir Julian Ridsdale (Harwich): This has been an interesting debate, marked by unanimity between the two Front Benches. It is a change to speak in the House without the need to use the slanging political phrases that we use too often against each other and to be able to apply our minds to perhaps the most serious situation that we have had to face internationally since 1945.

I was at a NATO conference in Hamburg in 1988, and there was a party on board a British frigate. I asked a German general who was at that party where he was in 1936. I told him that I was in the second brigade of the first division. He replied, "It is curious that you should talk about 1936, because I was thinking about 1936 when I came on board this British frigate. I was only so high in 1936, but my father was a company commander of the German troops that went into the Rhineland. He had orders that if there was any sign of resistance on the part of the British or the French, he was to withdraw."

That is a lesson that we should think about now. We should consider what is in our opponent's mind as well as some of our fears. That is why I was so encouraged by the immediate action taken by the United States President, having listened to the advice of our Prime Minister, when he reacted to the aggressive, Hitlerite seizure of Kuwait. I am certain that that decisive action preserved the independence and security of Saudi Arabia and other Gulf states.

I am not an expert on middle east affairs, but for the past 10 years I have served with the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Duffy), who is now president of the North Atlantic Assembly. In the endeavour to reach agreement and win the cold war against the Russians, we have been dependent on the weapon of nuclear flexible response—a nasty thing to have. We had to face the reality of what would happen if we used a flexible response. I hope most sincerely that, in exactly the same way, sanctions will fulfil their purpose in these circumstances. If we were to do away with the military option that is needed, I fear that we should not achieve victory in the crisis we face today without the shedding of blood.

Let us remember the ghastly confrontation and the forces on each side of the cold war. We must pay tribute to President Reagan and our Prime Minister for having won the cold war without the shedding of blood. That would not have been achieved if we had not kept cruise missiles, Pershings and flexible nuclear response. That is why I advise the House that, horrid as it may seem, especially to those of us who have fought in war, prepared for war and faced the fact that we should have gone into the Rhineland, in these circumstances we must follow through decisively. We must realise that we won the cold war because we had a flexible response.

President Reagan and our Prime Minister won the cold war at great cost to the American people. In 1980, America was the biggest creditor country, today it is the biggest debtor country in the world. We now live in a post-cold-war period and are trying, as we all wished when we established the General Assembly down the road from here in the Methodist central hall in 1946, to achieve peace in our time for the generations who suffered in the war. We had to suffer the awful period of the cold war and now, for the first time, the Security Council can act as many of us wished it to act at the end of the war. I am sure that that is the long-term solution for many of today's ills.

I am optimistic that in the end we shall be able to prevent what is happening in the middle east without the shedding of blood. The military option is vital. How encouraging it is today that the five Security Council members are in agreement.

The right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), who made an excellent speech, underlined the importance of our relations with Russia and China. If we can use our diplomatic skills through the United Nations and the Security Council we shall be able to deal not only with the middle east problem, but the much more serious problem of the proliferation of nuclear and chemical weapons. If the matter comes under the Security Council, with all the great powers in agreement, I am hopeful that, without fighting a battle of Waterloo to preserve a pax Britannica, as we did in the 19th century, we shall now, with our deliberations and wisdom, be able to create a world in which the Security Council will solve some of our problems. We should do so collectively.

There has never been a time when the world has been more interdependent than it is at present. It is important that those not taking military action on the ground should contribute financially to the grave burdens that the United States and many of the world's other debtor countries are playing today. I am sure that the richer countries will do that, but it is vital that we all do so together, or we shall all sink together.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): May I be allowed, first, to join the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and Mr. Speaker in paying tribute to colleagues who are now deceased? I sympathise with their parties and families on behalf of my hon. Friends and, as I believe everyone will understand, particularly on behalf of the people of Northern Ireland in respect of Ian Gow, who showed himself a solid Unionist, determined to maintain his position against all terror. It is apt that, on a day when we are dealing with one who, by terror and destruction, would seek to impose his mind and will on a region of the world, we should pay tribute to one who resisted terror in our own nation.

I have been a little happier with some of the more recent speeches than with some that took place in the middle of the debate. I welcomed the general unanimity on the Front Benches as right hon. and hon. Members tackled the issue. The right hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce) omitted to say that, if Saddam Hussein is modelling himself on Nebuchadnezzar, he is in for a sticky end.

I noticed some confusion during the debate and among the advice given, and was reminded of the old statement to the effect, "I don't know what you are doing to the enemy, but you are certainly scaring me." In my judgment, some of the contributions gave more succour to President Hussein than they did to either the hostages or the men and women stationed in the Gulf region at present at the behest of our and other Governments. During this debate, we have a responsibility to give them succour. I know that, in these hours of uncertainty and torment, we dare not forget the welfare of those Britons and other nationals who are trapped in Iraq and occupied Kuwait. I am sure that all my colleagues will agree that their safety is paramount amid all the talk of hostilities.

I put on record our tribute to Douglas Croskery, who was murdered while helping others in a brave bolt for liberty. I praise the efforts of my friend the hon. Member for North Down (Mr. Kilfedder) in seeking to help Douglas Croskery's family.

Without any qualification, I express the general support of my party for the way in which Her Majesty's Government have responded to the crisis, which is, in the final analysis, a dispute between the forces of peace and international harmony on the one side and despotism, tyranny and subjugation of the liberties which we cherish on the other.

I suggest that those who have been ready to throw stones at the Americans might also have been the first to throw stones at them if they had not come into the fray on the side of Kuwait and the international community.

As I see it, we have two clear choices. We either appease a dictator and allow both ourselves and the United Nations to fall into the same depths of mendacity and shame as our predecessors pre-1939 or we stand for those hallowed principles that we profess so vehemently in times of tranquility. Those who look back to 1938 and are reminded of the horrors that ensued must not be ignored, because the threat remains the same. A dictator, revelling in the cult of personality which he has constructed for himself, has run roughshod over the rules of international behaviour and morality which we, as a nation, are pledged to defend. The integrity of Kuwait has been violated. Are we to accept that as a fait accompli? Is it to be treated as another Czechoslovakia so long as Britain does not become embroiled in a conflict which, some say, does not involve us?

Surely Britain's national interests cannot be regarded as so inward looking as some have suggested. Are we so selfish that we should turn our backs on the oppressed and bullied of the world simply to preserve our own position? Surely we are not involved merely because of the interests of our economy, or those of any other nation's economy and the oil industry. There are other issues at stake.

Appeasement of a dictator breeds only the hunger for more territory, an insatiable desire for living space for a vibrant and thrusting state which the tyrant feels he has created. Here, the threat is compounded by a desperation to roll back the physical and psychological losses of an eight-year conflict. That leads inevitably to an irrationality that is blatantly oblivious to the codes of international morality.

I am happy that the consensus that is emerging from the debate is that our nation must show the world that our resolve to resist aggressors shall not be weakened and that our love of freedom and national integrity are not merely the ostensible ramblings of a once influential world power.

The politics of Saddam Hussein must never be allowed to become excusable in the world. His actions threaten more than a delicacy of relations between the powers in the middle east. The appeasement of Hitler and Mussolini in the 1930s was practised in the mistaken belief that both were basically honest and rational men who practised the accepted art of diplomacy, but with only a little more zeal, to achieve their objectives. We must not fall into the same naivety in our handling of Saddam Hussein.

Over the past two years, many of us have warned those who have gleefully advocated the disarming of NATO and the world in the aftermath of the bi-polar cold war. Those advocates should stand corrected. The crisis in the Gulf should demonstrate to all that the world will never be immune from the threat of megalomania or the evil designs of the despot. Our nation, with its friends and allies, must remain on guard against that threat and those designs.

The Foreign Office has, to this moment, faced the challenge of Saddam Hussein. I pay tribute to those who are representing our nation. They are few in number, but they have done tremendous things in seeking to be helpful, and under tremendous odds. The Foreign Office as a whole will need to have the courage and conviction that, in my judgment, has been so demonstrably absent from its deliberations on Northern Ireland, where it provided a framework whereby British interests and the interests of Britons would be undermined.

As we and the United Nations look into the future, we should take steps to have all territorial claims on neighbouring territory withdrawn. Such claims historically foster strife. In Northern Ireland, the claim inspires terrorists to implement the constitutional imperative of the Republic of Ireland. As we look to the future, those issues must be faced, as well as the crisis in the Gulf. We must stand on guard against all hostilities.

Mr. Michael Heseltine (Henley): I take issue with the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) on just one small, cavilling point. That is his comment that, if Saddam Hussein had been able to hear our debate he might have taken comfort from it. I do not think that he could take comfort in any way from it. I believe that it reflects overwhelmingly the view of the British people that a great wrong has been done and that Britain is determined to play its full part in putting it right. That is the only conclusion that anyone who has listened to the debate could draw. It is positively healthy that there has been the occasional speech, representing a negligible quantity of opinion, in which a different view has been taken. The very isolation of those speeches indicates the strength of the overwhelming majority in this place.

The Government's position I find exemplary. I have said consistently, as have so many others, that the Government have taken precisely the right view from the beginning of the crisis. However much we may have been out of touch during the past two or three weeks—we followed events as best we could, often only through the media of other countries—it is obvious that the process adopted by the Government has continued as it began.

The position that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister set out this afternoon is clear and exactly right. It is completely compliant with resolution 661 of the United Nations. The Prime Minister has set out for none to misunderstand her interpretation, backed by the best legal advice available to her. She has made clear, on behalf of the British Government, what she believes the resolution to mean. It means that we shall apply mandatory sanctions, that we shall enforce them and that, within certain circumstances, as my right hon. Friend defined, that might need the use of force.

It is necessary to have read only the occasional speech of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary to know that the last thing that he wants, the Government want or our allies want is the use of force. No one can have any doubt, however, that in the mind of the Government, and presumably in the minds of our close allies, that context is not ruled out. It is not anticipated in any way in the short term but it is within our interpretation of resolution 661.

We are an open society and part of the open world. If there are those in the United States who believe that we have misinterpreted the resolution and who wish to disown what we claim to be the meaning of the vote that they cast, they have plenty of time to make their position clear. They can start to do that now. They can react at once to what we are saying the resolution means by saying that, when they voted for it they thought that it meant something else. If they do not do so, they cannot complain if we act upon the interpretation that we set out at an early stage.

The issue is whether we should return to the United Nations for further clarification if sanctions do not achieve the desired objective. Powerful arguments were put by the Leader of the Opposition and reinforced by the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey). It is not that the law may be defective, but that there is a political dimension to the enforcement of that law which it might, on some subsequent occasion, be wise to pursue as opposed to legally necessary.

I wish to put another view. We all want the sanctions to work—that is not in question—but let us suppose we reach a stage where it is perceived that they are not working. We are not playing cricket. The object then would be to win at the lowest possible, though doubtless awful, cost. A lonely judgment will have to be made by a limited number of people about whether their action, unheralded, would be more or less likely to secure the objectives of the original resolution. They would have to weigh that against the advance warning of a change of tactics that going back to the United Nations would imply.

The announcement of a new dimension to the policy could provoke a first strike—or, as the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport said, a second strike, but from the Iraqis. Do we want that? I can think of no argument for saying that in a few weeks or a few months we should alert the Iraqis to a new dimension to our policy. Our task then will be to win quickly and decisively. That is the overwhelming reason why I hope that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, in replying to the debate, will give no further assurances. All the necessary assurances have already been given in the clearest language. To do so would only undermine the strength and clarity of our position in a way that he would be the last person to want to do.

The tragedy of the crisis is that it is dynamic and events are unfolding. I have agreed with the right hon. Member for Devonport from the beginning—I do not think that the Iraqis will launch an attack on us or move into Saudi Arabia, because that is the way for them quickly to lose. They will try to bust the sanctions. By now, they will be combing the world to find ways to do what sanctions busters have always done, which is to get around the sort of peaceful coercion that the United Nations has imposed. No one knows whether they will succeed, but that is their best chance of success.

If that happens, the dynamics will unfold and the moderate Arab leaders will begin to wonder whether they can win. The advocates of fundamental Islam will latch on to a new hero who is likely to advance their cause. The kingdoms of the Gulf will begin to wonder whether they can contain the ever larger numbers of people injected into their societies to spread the word that their days are numbered. All over the world, people will begin to say, "It is the Americans, the imperialists, the western powers and no one else." Indeed, they will probably say that it is just the Americans. We have heard that today, but, to the source from which it came, it is always just the Americans. If the Iraqis got out of Kuwait as quickly as the Americans got out of Grenada or Panama, who would be complaining as loudly as we are likely to have to do?

The most difficult point of the debate—it is not just enmeshed in this particular policy dilemma—is that the reason why the Americans are hated is because they can act. They are prepared and they have the strength and the coherence to move decisively and quickly——

Mr. Faulds: Even if they are wrong.

Mr. Heseltine: That is a judgment that the hon. Gentleman must defend, as he did in his speech. This House overwhelmingly believes that, in this case, the Americans are right.

The issue is whether the Americans want to be isolated, alone and the big brother. Like so many right hon. Members, I served as a Defence Secretary in the NATO alliance. I agree that the Americans hustled us along. We have been trying to get the initiatives right and trying to keep our nerve. It would be a brave hon. Member who said that we could have done it without them. I could not say, with my hand on my heart, that all the European members of the NATO alliance were always in such agreement that they could be relied upon. I remember the footnotes and the qualifications. I remember the phone calls from national Parliaments saying, "Don't do this, qualify that, hold back, wait a minute." It was always the Americans who took the lonely, tough decisions, and that is where we are today. They have taken those decisions, and because our Government were the first to back them, we have contained the appalling damage of the occupation of Kuwait.

Now we want to try to help, but how? The way to help is to strengthen the American support. Other nations of like mind to ourselves should increase their commitment, whether military or financial, to the American endeavour. The greater the endeavour that we make, the more we can ask to be consulted and the more influential we shall be in——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but he has overrun his time.

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): I am sure that we all regret the fact that we did not hear the end of the speech of the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), but we understand that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, must enforce the rule across the Chamber.

There is a clear consensus in the Chamber, as there should be at such a time. In enunciating the consensus, we are in the process of elaborating a principle that will play a great part in the future destiny of this planet. The purpose of the debate is to formulate what that principle is and what it is not.

The principle is not that we are prepared simply to support the Americans. In this instance, our objective of resisting military aggression by Iraq is one that we share with President Bush, but it does not follow that our motivation is the same as his. For this purpose, it does not greatly matter. His reason may be that he does not share the political views of the Iraq Government, and nor do we. But I hope that we would not make it part of our foreign policy to overthrow Governments with whose views we politically disagree.

It is fair to say that nothing has been said during the debate to commit us to that principle. Indeed, there are many influential people in Washington who are now questioning the sort of policy, typified in Vietnam, of seeking to establish around the world miniature clones of Uncle Sam. Washington itself is now a very different place. However, that is not the issue in this debate.

I do not believe that the principle is about maintaining the supply of oil. Indeed, our motivation should not be even to enforce human rights in Iraq. Some of us have sweated blood over many years to find ways to compel all tyrants and potential tyrants to have regard to human rights. We have had our successes when we managed to persuade enough people to care about human rights to do something about it. We have drawn attention to the victims of infringements in Iraq—the Kurdish people who have been treated with such inhumanity, and also individuals within Iraq.

However, I hope that that is not the issue in this debate. I hope that we are not establishing the principle that we are prepared to enforce international law against Governments with a bad record on human rights but not against Governments with a better record. That is not the way to secure the observance of human rights.

The principle that has emerged in the debate is that a flagrant breach of international law, by whomsoever, will be resisted by the entire international community. That is the new world order to which my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition referred. If it can be established that gross infringements of international law do not pay and that they will not be permitted, we will have begun the process of making the world safer—safe for small nations, safe for human rights, safe for human life.

That is not a matter of dividing the world into good and bad guys. If we are classifying individuals, President Saddam is a bad guy by any standards: we would all agree on that. But that is not why he should be compelled to comply with international law. If we see someone stealing, we do not, before we decide whether to arrest him, inquire about his views on privatisation, Salman Rushdie or transubstantiation, nor about the standard of his morals. We arrest him because, unless the law is enforced against each and any individual, we are all at risk. That applies, and it must be made to apply, in the middle east, Africa, Asia and central and south America.

Establishing the rule of law on a global basis is likely to be a lengthy and difficult undertaking, not because of the shortcomings of international law; there is in existence a substantial body of recognised international law. We need to do more in extending and clarifying it by agreements and conventions. We need to improve and to expedite the procedures of the various international courts and tribunals. In the process of that we may be building a consensus, as we did recently in Copenhagen, which will make it difficult for individual Governments to disregard it.

But minds will be concentrated on all that only when everyone knows that international law will be effective and that decisions will be enforced. That is an urgent problem, and it is becoming more urgent with every day that passes. With the proliferation of nuclear and chemical weapons and the continual increase in the number of national Governments in a position to launch war on a devastating scale, the time left to us may be running out.

It is not only in relation to military aggression that activities of nation states need to be brought within the rule of law. If the planet is to survive, a wide range of human activities can be safely regulated only on a global scale. Energy policy can no longer be confined within the frontiers of nation states—not since Chernobyl, nor acid rain, and certainly not since the dependence of international economies on oil prices.

But all that depends on the principle that activities which need to be regulated by international law are the concern of the international community, and that they will be enforced by the whole community. Today, we are discussing a situation in which we can take that first step towards establishing the principle because we have achieved a virtual consensus among the whole community.

If that principle is to be established, it requires three conditions. First, the sanctions to be applied must be no more than are required for the purpose. No one in his right mind would want to resort to military action if there was a prospect of achieving results by economic sanctions, for reasons that have been fully ventilated in the debate, and also because that is the only way to achieve an enforceable international law. It is vital that economic sanctions should be made to work.

That leads to the second condition. Those who seek to apply the sanctions should act, and be seen to act, with the authority of the international community if that can be achieved. This is not the occasion to embark on an analysis of article 51, but it is worth pointing out that it was included, that the right of self-redress was reserved in the charter, because it was recognised that it might not always be possible to achieve consensus. If that consensus can be achieved, to resort to self-redress would simply be a step backwards. So I hope that we will seek to proceed on the basis of clearly worded United Nations resolutions.

The third condition is to recognise that, if the rule of law is to be maintained, it matters not only what people do but the reasons that they give for doing it. They need to say that they are acting to enforce legality, not for other reasons. I do not want to introduce a sour note, but I would have been happier if the Prime Minister had made fewer references to our allies, partners and friends. We are talking about the international community.

This is only the first step. I believe that ultimately there is no alternative to securing a monopoly of war-making potential in the hands of an international authority. Anarchy in Britain ended in the 13th and 14th centuries, when the Government established a capacity for enforcing law and order which could not be challenged by any robber baron, or ultimately by any combination of robber barons.

That was not the end of local government or pluralism. We may have come close to that in the past 10 years, but that is not because the Government can enforce law and order. The rule of law enforced by a single authority is not inconsistent with a full range of other powers to individual states and local communities within those states. That is not an objective that I have just formulated. I can quote the authority of Emmanuel Kant, William Penn, Jeremy Bentham, Richard Cobden, Lord Tennyson, Teilhard de Chardin and Clement Attlee.

I recommend to the House a book by a former colleague in the House, Henry Usbourne. He is now well into his eighties but he is still reflecting on these matters. His book, "Prescription for Peace", will amply repay time spent in reading it. I believe that nation states as we know them will no longer have a part to play in the 21st century. President Saddam has provided us with the opportunity to take the first step. I hope that that will be the message which goes out from the House tonight.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): We can all agree or we can have a debate. In this democracy we should not be fearful of having a debate. I have visited Iraq and the Gulf as a guest of the respective Governments, so the House will make its own judgment about whether I am better informed or biased.

I agree with all that the Government have done to date. They have handled the matter brilliantly. We were right, when the United States found their interests threatened and felt that they had to go into the Gulf, to go along with them. The special relationship demanded nothing less, and we want to retain influence over events as they unwind.

We are also totally right to insist on the enforcement of United Nations sanctions. Publicly, we are right not to rule out offensive action. But privately, I trust that we do not contemplate it. Some of my colleagues seem to believe that there is a switch which can be turned and out will go Saddam Hussein; that there will be victory marches in Whitehall by Christmas. War is much more difficult and dangerous than that.

We have heard a lot about Britain's aims, but what about our interests? We have British citizens in Iraq and Kuwait whom we wish to bring home with dispatch. The cornerstone of our foreign policy is our relationship with the United States. We want to see the United Nations grow and flourish after the ending of the cold war. But, unlike Germany and Japan, we are not dependent on the oil of the Gulf and the middle east. Apparently, they have a constitutional embargo against supporting international action. Perhaps they just lack the constitution for it.

The United States is highly dependent on oil from the middle east, and United States politics is heavily dependent on support of the state of Israel. It may be in the interests of the United States to consider offensive action and war, but it is not necessarily in our interests as well.

There is a temptation to look upon these events and foreign policy as a moral issue. I hope that my country's foreign policy is moral, and that moral arguments can be used to sustain it. However, foreign policy is always dictated not by moral issues but by national interests, for the very good reason that different people have different moral outlooks. It is proper and one can ask a man to die for his country but I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, who has been brilliant throughout this difficulty, would not wish anyone to die for his personal views of morality.

What is it about Saddam Hussein that may make it proper to contemplate an offensive war against him? His evil has been compared with that of Hitler. Many speakers in today's debate seem to have returned to 1939, saying that we were threatened then by a major country in Germany and had to stand up and fight against it. The present situation is not like that. As other right hon. and hon. Members have said, Iraq is a long way away. We are not the major player in this issue. We must consider our interests, so any comparison with Hitler does not ring true.

Perhaps it is that we want to make the world a safer place, by proving that no nation can with impunity assault, attack or take over its neighbour. Anywhere in the world? Indonesia, Indochina or Israel? Why have we decided, specifically in Britain's interests, to draw the line at Iraq?

That brings me to the Arab question—the question that will be asked by the Arabs—not by the Egyptians, who are the second biggest recipients of United States aid or by the feudal overlords, with whom we have had good relations in the past for very good reasons—but by the Arab in the street.

Israel has exploited, humiliated or imprisoned 1·5 million Palestinians, and has denied them human rights, for generations. The Israelis have invaded Lebanon and laid waste Beirut, and at a weekly whim have been aerially murdering a few Palestinian families in refugee camps. When Israel invaded Lebanon, the casualities were far greater than those reported when Iraq went into Kuwait.

That is the question that will arise in the minds of the Arabs after the event as well. Israel annexed Golan and has a Quisling Government in southern Lebanon. Saddam Hussein may have chemical weapons, but Israel has nuclear weapons. The question asked by the Arabs will be why we are using force against Iraq when we have not used force against Israel. Is it because there are more Jews than Arabs in New York? If the Kuwaitis grew carrots rather than pumped oil, perhaps different attitudes would prevail.

Mr. Cormack: My hon. Friend should go and join the National Front.

Mr. Marlow: This is meant to be a serious debate.

Let us consider the military scenario. There is an idea that there can be a quick, surgical strike, but I suggest that my hon. Friends read carefully the wise speech of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey). I am no military expert, but I wore a uniform for 11 years, and for all the ordnance and technology that the Americans have at their disposal, recent United States military experience has not been happy. Iraq's armed forces also have military technology and although—like any other forces—they probably have major weaknesses, Iraqi forces have just sustained eight years of war without flinching.

Rather than turn tail at the first sighting of the United States Air Force, is it not more likely that they will turn towards Jordan and Israel? What effect would that have on the alliances that have been carefully built up? What then is the likelihood of the use of chemical or even nuclear weapons? What will happen to Arab opinion when the perception is that Arab blood is being shed by western imperialists selfishly seeking to secure for themselves cheap oil and seeking to destroy the only Arab state capable of standing up against Israel? How secure then will be the heads that wear the feudal crowns?

There are many fundamental differences in attitude between Europeans and Arabs, but there is one of particular importance that we should bear in mind. We are British first and European second. The French are French first and European second. Any Arab—be he a Jordanian, Iraqi, Libyan or Moroccan—is an Arab first. If there is a war and blood is spilt, it will be Arab blood that is spilt. Supposing that the hawks predominate—and there seem to be plenty around me at the moment—and there is a magnificent military success, will we then see a United States army of occupation on Iraqi soil? How long would it remain there, and how would that stabilise radical Arab opinion? We have see the ayatollahs at work in Iran—what if they cross the Gulf?

If there is no army of occupation, what then will happen to Iraq under whatever leadership then obtains? Iraq is rich in resources. It has oil, two major rivers, potential agricultural wealth, and 17 million people, many of whom have highly developed skills. If one takes away Iraq's chemical and nuclear weapons potential——

Mr. Cormack: What about the Kurds?

Mr. Marlow: I do not support such action. What is my hon. Friend suggesting? I am saying that if Iraq is humiliated, that potentialy powerful and wealthy country will resent that humiliation and will be more aggressive in the future than it has been in the past.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point) rose——

Mr. Marlow: I cannot give way to my right hon. Friend because time is against me.

If there is a war, peace must follow it. The second world war arose because of a lack of a proper peace after the first world war. Let us think ahead.

Mr. Cormack: So my hon. Friend favours appeasement?

Mr. Marlow: I am not concerned about appeasement, but about British interests.

Psychologically, the Government are right to wave a big stick and not to rule out the use of force. However, the reality is that the use of force would solve nothing but would make things worse. It is easy to start a war but difficult to predict its outcome, apart from the deaths of thousands of people, the destruction of thousands of homes, and the legacy of many crying and desolate women and children in starvation. No British interests can be served by such a war.

Sir Bernard Braine: Will my hon. Friend give way now?

Mr. Marlow: I put it to my right hon. Friend, who seems more hawkish than I, that it is not his life that would be at risk but the lives of British service men. What have we to say to the young men who will be expected to put their lives on the line?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Member but he has run out of time. Mr. Dennis Canavan.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): This is the first emergency recall of Parliament since the Falklands war in 1982. At the end of that debate, which was on a technical Adjournment motion, there was no vote, and afterwards the Prime Minister tried to use that as a mandate from the entire House of Commons for her subsequent conduct during the Falklands war, which included the dispatch of the task force and its deployment, the sinking of the Belgrano, and the escalation of a conflict which cost more than 1,000 lives. In retrospect, many people in this country realised that that was a needless conflict.

The fact that the Prime Minister received a virtual blank cheque on that occasion meant that she was able to do more or less what she wanted. Three weeks or more after that initial debate, some right hon. and hon. Members managed to divide the House. About 30 of us voted against the Government in a subsequent debate on the Falklands. I do not regret my action on that occasion. My only regret is that we did not take it earlier, so that we could have stifled at birth the myth that the Prime Minister had the unanimous consent of Parliament for her subsequent action.

We should not make that same mistake twice. A full-scale conflict in the middle east could be far more destructive and devastating, and involve far greater loss of life, than any conflict in the south Atlantic—particularly when one bears in mind that it could escalate into chemical or even nuclear conflict at some future time.

I hope that we are all unanimous in unequivocally condemning Saddam Hussein's invasion of Kuwait, the destruction of human life that has taken place already, and the hostage-taking, as absolutely unjustified aggression. However, our response must be firm and measured, and it must have the support of the international community. There is widespread—well nigh unanimous—support within the international community, and virtually unanimous support in the House, for the use of sanctions, but they take time to have their full effect and there is therefore a need for patience and caution, especially in our attitude to the possible use of force.

I should make it clear that I am not an absolute pacifist. I believe in the basic right of self-defence and the right to go to the defence of others who are the victims of unjust agression, but history and experience have surely taught us that in many instances the precipitate use of violence merely begets more violence. If force is to be used, it ought to be minimum force, and it ought to be used as a last resort.

I am concerned about the possible use by the United States—and the United Kingdom might get involved—of some sort of pre-emptive strike action, which could make the situation worse rather than better. I am also concerned about the double standards of some people who rightly support the use of sanctions against Iraq in the present situation, and yet did not support the use of sanctions against South Africa. I am concerned about the double standards of people who rightly deplore the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq and want to see the removal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait as soon as possible, and yet did not deplore the Israeli invasion of the West Bank but kept strangely silent about it, and still do.

Those double standards confirm my suspicions that the United States of America and the United Kingdom are taking stronger action over the invasion of Kuwait simply because of the threat to western oil interests in the Gulf. Oil is important, but people are more important, and an awful lot of people stand to get hurt or annihilated if there is a full-scale conflict in the middle east.

There is more chance of the whole crisis escalating into a full-scale conflict if it is the perception in large parts of the Arab world that the heavy military build-up in the Gulf is predominantly an American, neo-colonial force, backed up by the United Kingdom and other American allies. In terms of Arab perception, it is very important that there is United Nations control and explicit United Nations approval for the conduct of the whole operation.

I was very unhappy when I heard the Prime Minister earlier this afternoon, with her legalistic interpretation of article 51 of the United Nations charter. It makes me suspect that she may indeed be hell bent on trying to use her interpretation, or misinterpretation, of article 51 to resort to force without the explicit approval of the United Nations. We have witnessed her warmongering jingoism before, and I for one do not trust her. I certainly do not trust her enough to give her another blank cheque, and that is why I intend voting against her and her Government tomorrow.

8.4 pm

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): Timing is the essence of crisis management. It was absolutely right to recall Parliament now. To have done so earlier, before the blockade authorised by the United Nations Security Council had been put into place and when Saudi Arabia, with oil resources so important to the world economy, was wide open to attack, might not have commanded the unanimity that has been emerging in this debate.

More than in any other crisis debate I have heard in the 40 years I have sat in the House, I was struck by the clear lead given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, the effective response of the Leader of the Opposition and the clear, effective and thoughtful speeches from experienced former Ministers—for example, my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), and the right hon. Members for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), and for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore)—from different parties but all of whom have had extensive experience of foreign and defence affairs. I now feel sure that we are moving towards a unanimous view which justifies the timing of the debate.

The situation that we now face is fraught with grave dangers and, unlike others, I shall not speculate—nor is there time to do so—on what might yet happen. There are too many imponderables. However, I remind my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow)—whose speech surprised me—that in Saddam Hussein we are dealing with a man who has not hesitated to murder any individual who stood in his way, who has used poison gas to snuff out the lives of thousands of men, women and children in his own country—in Iraqi Kurdistan—and whose fruitless eight-year war against his Muslim neighbour, Iran, cost over 1 million lives. Who can say what he might yet do if he is not soon tumbled? But as a student of history, who has watched the passage of events from the sidelines, I know that one thing that one does not do is to announce in advance what steps one will take in an emergency to enforce the will of the United Nations, when one is dealing with a man of that kind.

By now we should know where we in Britain stand on this grave issue. The United Nations resolutions are not negotiable. The aggressor must withdraw from Kuwait and make reparation for the damage inflicted upon that small state and that must be seen to be done, not at the behest of the Americans or of the British, but by the command of the world community.

The taking of hostages is a crime under international law. Every single one of them must be released, and appropriate compensation paid. That is not merely the British or American stance, but the agreed position of the United Nations and of the Foreign Ministers of the 13 Arab League countries who met in Cairo last week.

All this begs the question, "Where would we be if the Americans had not been prepared to act?" Would we have been able to do anything on our own, even if the desire had been there? We must keep all this in perspective.

In as grave a crisis as any since the second world war, the firm stand taken by our Prime Minister in support of President Bush, the diplomatic skills shown by our representatives at the United Nations and in the Gulf and, throughout, the calm and sensible approach of our Foreign Secretary, all deserve the highest praise. I like to think that I know what my constituents are thinking from what they write to me, and that view is very widely expressed. It can best be expressed to the world as a whole by this freely elected Parliament giving full endorsement to what has already been done to uphold the rule of law, and by giving our unanimous support to the Government in their determination to see this crisis through.

I was sorry to hear the speech of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce), who said that he was not sure whether the right hon. Gentleman really believed in what he was saying: there was a gleam in his eye and a smile on his face. He is an engaging person, and in a way I felt sorry about the speech since I did not think that it added much to our knowledge.

Let me assure my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North that I know of no Conservative colleague who wants war to happen. That means that we must make our purpose clear. There can be no return to normality until Iraq disgorges Kuwait, releases the hostages and bows to the will of the United Nations. It would be fatal to give the impression that we would be willing to tie our hands in advance as has been suggested —laughable, but fatal. By all means let us not lose sight of our present objective, but we must never allow ourselves for a moment to forget that the world is now too small a place for dicatators anywhere to do what they like with impunity where their weaker neighbours are concerned.

That brings me to a specific point. When I say that there can be no assurance of peace or stability in the middle east until Iraq's nuclear and chemical capabilities have been destroyed, I hasten to add—I think that this is in keeping with the spirit of our debate—that I do not see that problem in isolation. Some good may come out of this crisis. For there simply must be a fresh look at world security problems as a whole, and firm action will have to be taken with regard to the traffic in sophisticated weapons of mass destruction.

It is shameful that European companies have supplied Saddam Hussein with the means of killing en masse, including his own people. It is obscene, and it must end. I hope that, as a result of this experience, the world as a whole will adopt a new posture, and I think that there is real hope of that: the changes that have taken place in eastern Europe and the new attitude of the Soviet Union give promise that we can look forward to a better world, if we are bold and resolute now and do not exhibit the weakness and flabbiness of the recipe advanced a short time ago by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North. We have an immediate problem, but let us never lose sight of what ought to be on the agenda for the future.

For the moment, then, we must steel ourselves to face the prospect that the blockade may continue for quite some time. It will not be easy to maintain substantial forces in continuous readiness in the difficult conditions of the Gulf, but it must be done. We need to send a clear message to Saddam, and also to our friends, about where we stand.

Last night, opening a book at random, I read the words that Winston Churchill uttered in the darkest days of the Second World War, in March 1942:

> "We must confront our perils and trials with that national unity which cannot be broken, and a national force which is inexhaustible. We must confront them with resilience and ingenuity which are fearless, and above all with that inflexible willpower to endure and yet to dare for which our Island race has long been renowned."

If there is to be a vote, I hope and trust that this Parliament, like its predecessors in times of great peril, will rise to the occasion and demonstrate to the world that our people have not changed.

8.14 pm

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): I am grateful for the opportunity of following the Father of the House, the right hon. Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine). He has referred to the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), whom I am glad to see in the Chamber. My right hon. Friend mentioned Saladin, and he was in good company, because the Prime Minister did so as well. He also mentioned the question of the General Assembly of the United Nations being directly elected, and said that he would be a candidate.

There has been talk of Richard the Lionheart too, and the right hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce) mentioned Nebuchadnezzar in connection with his meeting with Saddam Hussein in 1984. I, too, think of Nebuchadnezzar and I wonder whether Saddam Hussein has read the Book of Daniel lately. That book tells us that Nebuchadnezzar was once so powerful that > "all the peoples, nations and languages trembled and feared before him, but when his heart was lifted up and his mind hardened in pride, he was deposed from his kingly throne and they took his glory from him."

Mr. Dalyell: He was a Kurd.

Mr. Bell: As my hon. Friend says, he was a Kurd.

I see Saddam Hussein more as the Ozymandias of the poem by Percy Bysshe Shelley:

> "My name is Ozymandias, king of kings:
> Look on my works, ye Mighty, and despair!"

Shelley describes the huge monument in the desert which had been broken and dislocated:

> "Nothing beside remains. Round the decay
> Of that colossal wreck, boundless and bare
> The lone and level sands stretch far away".

I surmise that that will be the ultimate future of Saddam Hussein. However, at this moment we know that the lone and level sands stretch far away with the refugee camps of those who have come from Pakistan, Bangladesh, the Philippines, the Yemen and Palestine. All those people who were living and working in Kuwait had a certain standard of living—a life style, and savings in the bank, all of which disappeared in four hours with Iraq's invasion of Kuwait.

My right hon. Friends the Members for Chesterfield and for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) have given quotations from the Labour Government of 1964-70. I am glad to see my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) in his place. He may recall a conversation which took place in, of all places, what was formerly Lockets, between the late Dick Crossman and Lord Jenkins of Hillhead. They were discussing public expenditure cuts, how to balance the books and the prospect of restoring the prescription charge. Crossman put forward the idea that, to save £12 million, we might be able to withdraw from east of Suez. We made that decision as a Government in 1967-68. We agreed to withdraw from east of Suez and from the Persian Gulf, although it was the Government of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) who actually carried out that policy.

We left a vacuum in the Gulf, which the United States sought to fill with Iran, making it a super-power there. As a consequence, the Shah was overturned and we had the Ayatollah. Twenty years later, there is another vacuum and a crisis waiting to happen.

I was interested by a comment made in London yesterday by the Crown Prince and Prime Minister of Kuwait. When asked why Kuwait had supported Iraq's military build-up, he replied that the Kuwaitis had supported the build-up because they had believed that Saddam would help to liberate occupied Palestine—"but, unfortunately, the Iraqi army was used against our country." That oil-rich state has poured thousands and thousands of millions of pounds into Iraq in the vain hope that Iraq would turn its gaze to the north and avert it from the south and from taking over Kuwait.

We have heard a great deal today about the state of Israel and about how the problem between the state of Israel and the west bank of the Jordan should be resolved. When Secretary of State Baker referred to this he called it a "fester". It cannot be in the interests of the state of Israel that this problem should continue to exist. We live in a world of chemical and nuclear weapons and of long-range nuclear missiles which can be fired into Israel from a far distance.

We should also examine what the Palestine Liberation Organisation has done in this crisis and think about the 350,000 Palestinians in Kuwait who overnight lost their livelihoods, jobs, security and money in the bank. After having lost all that they had, can they thank Yasser Arafat for that? What of the Saudi Arabians? Four years ago I was in Saudi Arabia with the hon. Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken). We talked with the Saudi Arabian Government, who were concerned about the state of affairs on the west bank of the Jordan and deeply anxious about self-determination for the Palestinians in the area. After having poured thousands and thousands of millions of dollars into the PLO, what must have been their reaction when they saw Yasser Arafat go by aeroplane to Baghdad to support Saddam Hussein?

When we talk about self-determination for the Palestinians, which is necessary even for the state of Israel, how do we place the PLO in that context? How can it have a role to play? How can we have a new state created on the west bank, linked to that kind of regime in Iraq coming in through Jorden to threaten and menace the state of Israel? That cannot be a consequence of the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq. There cannot be a linkage between the affairs of the state of Israel and the west bank of the Jordan and a resolution of this problem. They are separate problems and they need to be addressed separately. It is in the interests of the state of Israel that this problem should be resolved, but certainly not as a consequence of the dispute and certainly not with the PLO, whose deputy to Yasser Arafat during the last few days has said that in the event of a war the PLO would unleash upon the west a terrorist campaign the likes of which we had never seen before. That may be one of the unforeseen consequences, if there is a war in the area.

We have heard a great deal about United Nations article 42 and article 51, but it is clear that the Government and this Parliament cannot send tele-messages and greetings telegrams to Saddam Hussein saying what we will or will not do in a particular situation. It is not for us to do that; it is for us to keep him guessing about what the consequences will be if he defies the sanctions that have been laid upon him.

Can anyone really believe, however, that the United States of America—subject to a pre-emptive strike on 7 December 1941 by Japan, without any warning or any knowledge that the attack was coming, for which Japan was to pay grievously—will launch a pe-emptive strike against Iraq? There would be no purpose in it. There would be no purpose in taking this issue out of the global consensus that we have entered into in this new, global village of ours. I believe that our Government believe that it will be a long haul and that sanctions will not work quickly. They will have to work hard and it will take a long time. The House is united in believing that a long-term attempt should be made to make sanctions work. At the end of the day, I believe that they will work.

A time of crisis is a time of opportunity and as my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) pointed out, the United Nations, after 45 years and the days of Stalin, now has an opportunity to show that there can be a new world order. The Father of the House, the right hon. Member for Castle Point, quoted what Winston Churchill said in 1942. In his final volume, "Triumph and Tragedy" about the end of the war, he said:

"the great democracies had triumphed and so were able to resume the follies that had so nearly cost them their life."

Out of this crisis we have to find long-term solutions and a sense of peace in the world for future generations.

It is a time for patience, for diplomacy and, above all, for leadership—for the leadership of people weaned on a television diet of quick fixes and facile solutions, a diet that requires overstatement and oversimplification of complex issues, but which does not permit a nation state to assess its priorities or even its duties. There must therefore be statesmanship to persuade people that we are in for a long haul in the Gulf, that sanctions will work sooner or later, and that if it is to be later rather than sooner, so be it. Time is not on the side of Saddam Hussein. Time, like the justice of the cause, is on the side of the world community.

I welcome the unanimity that we have seen today and the strong expression and analysis of the problems in the Gulf by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition. The message from the House will be clear—that we are resolved, that we know what we are doing, and that in the long term we shall triumph.

8.25 pm

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): Saddam Hussein is an evil despot who has long maintained himself in power in Iraq by a tyrannical regime, run for the most part by a small group of his personal henchmen, drawn from his own home village. He has eliminated, often after torture, any of his political colleagues who have attempted to stand in his way. It is widely reported that immediately before the act of aggression against Kuwait he had a number of his senior officers executed who opposed this attack on a fellow Arab state. We are dealing with a monster: let us be perfectly clear about that.

The debate has reflected the feeling in the nation as a whole, overwhelmingly, that this act of aggression against

Kuwait and its occupation has to be reversed and that Kuwait has to be liberated. I, like many hon. Members, spent most of the month of August abroad. I did not meet a single person of any nationality who was not in favour of bringing pressure to bear to ensure that Kuwait was liberated. I spent the first half of this week in my constituency. Every constituent whom I met said to me that we have got to get the Iraqis out of Kuwait. This debate has sent a clear message to Saddam Hussein, and the world, that Britain is united behind her Government in the steps that they have taken by giving full support to President Bush's magnificent leadership on this issue.

The question one has to ask is how we are to achieve the objectives on which we are all agreed. I am not convinced that the long haul is a practical solution. I first went to Iraq 40 years ago. I have been there seven or eight times since. It is easy for those who have not been to Iraq to imagine that that country holds certain characteristics in common with western European countries. However, despite the great potential oil wealth of that country, the great mass of Iraqis still live in grinding poverty. They are much less subject to the kind of economic pressures that sanctions would impose than those that would face a more prosperous country. They have been through the ghastly war with Iran, for which Saddam Hussein was entirely responsible. Despite having endured all that, they cannot escape his rule because of the machinery of terror that he operates inside Iraq. Anybody who tries to criticise him is liquidated. I have an Iraqi friend in London whose brother was hanged by Saddam Hussein last year simply because my friend had made a critical speech about Saddam Hussein in London. He will stop at nothing.

That is one side of the problem, but the other side is whether the American troops will be able to face month after month of sitting it out in the desert. I spent nine months in the desert at Aqaba when I was 19 and 20, but I had the advantage of having spent 10 years at boarding schools immediately before, so a warm slit trench in the desert seemed rather luxurious accommodation. Some of the specialist American technicians, who are used to operating the most advanced weaponry, have not had the advantage of having been at public school for many years before going to the desert and, although this is not a criticism of them, spending month after month in the heat and dust will take a considerable toll of their morale.

The dust will also get into their machinery. We saw what happened when helicopters landed at Desert Strip One outside Tehran and were on the ground for only a few hours. There is no doubt that there will be great technical problems with advanced weaponry being on the ground in such terrain and climate for a long period.

The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) said that this is the most dangerous situation that the world has faced since 1945, and several right hon. and hon. Members have echoed that sentiment. I accept that it is a dangerous situation, but we must not make our position more difficult by exaggerating the dangers. I do not believe that it is the most dangerous situation that we have faced since the war. The Berlin blockade and the Cuban missile crisis were much more dangerous because of the danger of confrontation between the two great powers of the world, America and Russia, and of nuclear weaponry being brought into play. Mercifully, as a result of glasnost and President Gorbachev, that danger does not arise. Therefore, do not let us tell our constituents and ourselves that the situation is anything like as dangerous as some of the crises that we have had to face since the war.

I hope that President Bush's meeting with President Gorbachev in a few days will clear the way for American military action, because it will not be in the interests of the United Nations for us all to continue with a blockade that may last for six or nine months.

The right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) spoke of the possibility of oil prices reaching levels which might put the American banking system in danger. There will be great economic strains on the world economy if this long haul is pursued. I am sure that the Prime Minister was absolutely right when she said earlier today that we must keep our options open under article 51 to use military force if that seems necessary, and I believe that it will become necessary. I hope that when that time comes, and when the American chiefs of staff are confident that effective and quick action can be taken, we will give full support to the Americans in that action.

Many hon. Members have said that it is easy and ludicrous to be an armchair warrior. I understand that but, in the desert, air command is of dominant importance. It is not like Vietnam which, like many hon. Members, I visited many times and where I flew in choppers low over the jungle where one could not see the Vietcong. In the desert, even in Allenby's campaign of 1916 and 1917, the aeroplane was of vital importance. A tank cannot be moved in the desert without its being visible from a great distance, even to infantry on the ground.

With modern aircraft dominating the skies, in a few weeks the American air force will be in a position completely to take out the Iraqi air force within a matter of days, as the Israelis did to the Egyptian air force in 1973. Once it has done that, the Iraqi tank force will be absolutely useless. Tanks are dependent on petrol, ammunition and water, and with an enemy dominating the skies nothing could be more frightening than to be an Iraqi tank commander, with his tank blowing up if a rocket lands anywhere near it. We should not exaggerate the military dangers that would be involved.

The Americans intend to take military action. I think they will take it very effectively and will win. Saddam Hussein is a clear loser, and Arabs throughout Arabia are beginning to realise that.

8.35 pm

Mr. Jim Sillars (Glasgow, Govan): We support the action taken by the Government to invoke the United Nations procedures. We also support what the Government have done in respect of the naval blockade to support the Security Council's decision on sanctions. We also support action taken to engage in a multi-military organisation to protect Saudi Arabia from possible Iraqi aggression, which, as I understand it—I stand open to correction—is an entirely separate matter from the United Nations Security Council decisions in respect of Kuwait.

I wish to make three points. One concerns a matter raised by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), who said that it is important that we try to take on board Saddam Hussein's tactics. He said that they probably are simply to sit tight, having, in a sense, annexed Kuwait, and to hold that territory. We must understand that when dealing with Saddam Hussein, as well as dealing with an evil individual, we are dealing with someone who is by no means stupid and who has displayed considerable political ability inside the Arab world. He already has one political mark in his favour: he split the Arab League and, from his point of view, that was a considerable thing for him to have done.

If we are dealing with a man of that capability who has decided to sit tight, we must, as a matter of tactics, consider the military option. It would be foolish for anyone on the United Nations side to rule out the military option.

There is a link between maintaining the military option and the possible success of sanctions, and I shall explain how I see that link. If we said that the military option was not on, it would be seen by Saddam Hussein as a failure of a test of will of those under the United Nations umbrella. If that military option were seen by him to be withdrawn, not only he but other states in the international community would get a very clear message—that if it came to the crunch we would not have the will to sustain the pressure on him to withdraw from Kuwait.

Hon. Members have rightly said that sanctions have perhaps a better chance of operating than when they have previously been applied, and they have mentioned the oil crop economy of Iraq.

The Leader of the Opposition made the important point that credit facilities, from whatever source in the international community, should not be made available to Iraq. It will be difficult to tighten up this loophole. There is another downside to sanctions. They will result in a severe economic cost for all the member states which apply sanctions and the severest cost will be borne not by the United Kingdom, western Europe, Japan or the United States, which will be able to sustain it better than anyone else, but by the third world countries. They will be the weakest link in the application of sanctions. If the message is that, when the crunch comes, the military option will not be available, some of those states, for reasons that we cannot condemn, may crack. Once sanctions crack, without the back-up of a military option, Saddam Hussein will win the game in which he is engaged.

My second point is about the role, status, power and influence in the world community of the United Nations. The Leader of the Opposition and I are of the same generation and come basically from the same ideological root. As I listened to him, I began to be carried away by his idealism about the emergence of a new world order. There is unprecedented unanimity among the five permanent members of the Security Council. However, I doubt whether a new world order will emerge, or even that we are seeing something like that emerging now.

As hon. Members know, international law is made up of state practice, which is based on power, and upon treaties and conventions, but power is the key factor. Last week, on the BBC World Service, I heard Sir Anthony Parsons say "No" to the blunt question, "Is international law based on a moral code?" As he said, it boils down to power. The United Nations has tried to make moral law against genocide and aggression and for human rights, but when it comes to the crunch question whether it will agree to the enforcement of this law, the answer must be in the negative, because it is power that matters.

We have to be frank about this. The United Nations Security Council has acted in the Gulf crisis not out of some new sense of moral purpose but simply because of the fortuitous conjunction of state interests among the five permanent members and the majority of the rest of the Security Council with the United Nations charter. The United States and the west are involved because of oil. Some cynical United Nations official said that, if Kuwait manufactured tins of beans, we should not have seen the same reaction from the United Nations. The Soviet Union has developed a quasi-dependence upon the United States and the West, and particularly western Europe. China is paddling her own canoe so as to get back into the good graces of the United States and to resurrect the special relationship with it.

Sadly, the agreement goes no further than this conjunction. That may sound cynical and I hope that I am wrong and that we are seeing something new develop, but I doubt it. It is unprecedented for the Security Council to take such a decision and it is fine that it has done so. However, what will happen in two or three months' time when the Security Council permanent members do not agree and a next step is required? The United Nations and the Security Council are still on trial, and the verdict has not yet been reached.

My third point concerns the good speech made by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore). He told the Government that we must engage in a battle for the hearts and minds of the Arab people. Given Saddam Hussein's ability to split the Arab League, we have to admit that he is ahead of us on that. I shall try —I do not think that I can do it as I do not think that any hon. Member can—to put myself in the mind of the man in the Arab suit. How does he see debates such as this and western reaction? Unless we can understand that, we shall not win the propaganda battle for the hearts and minds of folk in the Arab world.

The Arab sees people in the west, including us and the United States, as double-dyed hypocrites of the first order because we apply a different standard to Arab nations than we apply to the state of Israel. He has good grounds for taking that point of view. Tonight, we are telling Iraq that it should obey Security Council resolutions and that if it does not, sanctions will be applied against it until it does so, when the United States did not take that attitude to Israel.

The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) is a wee bit like Arthur Scargill in that his language is sometimes extravagant and his style goes over the top. He got a lot of barracking from his hon. Friends today. I shall try to speak in a quieter tone. We have to accept that the Israeli authorities treat the Arab people of the west bank and Gaza appallingly. They deliberately break bones and demolish houses in retaliation and incarcerate thousands of people in desert encampments. That is unacceptable in a civilised international community, but Israel has been allowed to get away with it. I have told Arab friends that I am appalled that they are not condemning Saddam Hussein and they have replied, "My enemy's enemy is my friend." I am told not to complain about that because westerners have operated on that principle many a time.

I have to convey to the Government as best I can the feeling of my friends that, while the situation in Israel continues, the west will continue to feed people like Saddam Hussein with the ammunition that will carry them to the top. In the three or four months ahead, while sanctions are being applied, we should take the opportunity to bring to the top of the world agenda the rights of the Palestinian people to a homeland and a state of their own. Unless we are prepared to do that and are capable of doing that, we may lose the critical war for the hearts and minds of the Arab people. My Arab friends have told me that the biggest problem in the middle east is that the Israeli-Palestinian situation poisons the whole atmosphere. We have to draw the poison if we are to get stability in the region.

Mr. James Kilfedder (North Down): I find it strange and disappointing that so little has been said about the tens of thousands of refugees in Jordan. I was pleased to note that the Prime Minister announced further aid for the refugees, but more needs to be done. It is appalling that men, women and children are suffering and dying from heat, hunger and disease while the western world is spending billions on armaments and ignoring their plight. It is a shame that their plight has been so ignored. The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) spoke of the airlift that should take place. More immediate action is needed and greater help should be provided.

The leader of the Liberal Democrats used the term "flotsam and jetsam" in regard to the refugees and I believe that he used the term innocently. However, that sounded arrogant to me. Our hearts should go out to these people and some of the money that has been spent on armaments should be used to save their lives. More refugees will die in Jordan than have died so far in this crisis in the middle east. Food, medicines, clothing and tents should have gone out ages ago and must now go out immediately. If, instead of being Asian, Egyptian or from the middle or far east, those people had been English, Australian, American, German, French or Canadian, there would have been an outcry, and action would have been taken ages ago. We must not forget these people now.

Much has been said in the debate about hostages in Iraq. For me, that term applies peculiarly to those who are incarcerated in the Lebanon. I refer to a constituent of mine—Brian Keenan—who has just been released. He was held as a hostage there for more than four years, and he has been to hell and back again. We can see the agony in his eyes and in his language. I pay tribute to his two sisters who campaigned relentlessly for his release. Our hearts go out to Brian Keenan. I know that some people in Northern Ireland resented the fact that use was made of his having a passport from the Republic of Ireland. However, I believe that the sisters were perfectly entitled to use any key to release him from his purgatory.

We must think at this time about the other hostages who are still held there. We must think about Terry Waite, about John McCarthy and about the others. Greater pressure must be applied to Iran to ensure that those people, who have suffered so much for so long, are released without further delay.

I find it disturbing that Iran has become an ally in the campaign against Iraq, yet Iran was indirectly—and some would say directly—responsible for the fiendish nightmare of the hostages, and for their years of imprisonment in conditions that are an outrage to humanity. We must also remember Mr. Cooper who has been imprisoned in Iran. His imprisonment is an insult to the rule of law.

I refer also to Douglas Croskery, who was shot dead in Iraq near the border with Saudi Arabia and who was the son of a constituent of mine. The sympathy of the whole House goes out to his mother, my constituent, Marion Croskery, to his wife, to his children, to his brother and to all the other members of his family.

I spoke at some length with the ambassador of the Republic of Iraq about the necessity of an intensive search to find the remains of Douglas Croskery. He, as a Muslim, assured me that he and all the other Muslims in Iraq would be most anxious that the body should be found and returned for decent burial. The anguish of his wife, of his mother and of his family would be lessened to an extent if his remains could be brought back to the United Kingdom.

I have a number of constituents who are detained in Iraq and in Kuwait at present, including one who is a student of 19. He went out on a summer exchange during the university vacation. When I saw the ambassador, I argued that, on humanitarian grounds, all the foreigners who were then detained in Iraq and in Kuwait should be released and that, as a first step, the children and women should be released on humanitarian grounds. I was glad to see that President Saddam Hussein is in the process of releasing the women and children.

I believe that reasoned argument carries far more weight with the President and with the authorities in Iraq than do all the insults that I have heard. Words such as "cowboy", "dictator" and "outlaw", and similar expressions do not make President Saddam cower in the basement of his palace. His reaction would be to turn the screw and we should avoid that. It is all right to impress the British voter by talking tough, but it does not do anything to President Saddam.

We now need less of the language of conflict and more of the language of diplomacy. I know that if people are prepared to talk, a way forward can sometimes be found. I was impressed by what the Iraqi ambassador said to me. He said that the Iraqis were prepared to engage in diplomacy and I noted what the Foreign Minister of Iraq said about the need to seek a diplomatic solution to the crisis.

As the hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sillars) said, we must consider the Arab perception of the situation. Whether right or wrong, the Arabs see the might of the United States poised in Saudi Arabia. Many Arabs regard the presence of foreign armies as a defilement of the holy places of Islam. I use the word "invited". However, some considerable time elapsed before Saudi Arabia invited them and I believe that certain pressure was brought to bear on the Saudi Arabians to invite the Americans into their land.

It is now accepted by many people that Iraq will not invade Saudi Arabia. The Arabs also view the American presence as a means of obtaining relatively cheap oil for the western world. As has been pointed out in the debate, other countries have been invaded, but we have had no great reaction from America or from the west. If a precedent has now been established, let us ensure that we do not ruin the unanimity of the United Nations.

Let us also ensure that we seek a settlement and that we pursue the policy of sanctions. I am sure that they will work and that they will bring a settlement in this region which will last for a long time to come. If war takes place, there will be a legacy of hatred which will last for decades to come. There will be instability and acts of terrorism, and I doubt whether the oil will flow as readily as it has flowed in the past. That is why I urge all concerned to cool it and why it is necessary to defuse the present explosive situation. I hope that we shall have more diplomacy and less belligerency.

I pay tribute to the Secretary General of the United Nations for his efforts on behalf of peace. I pay tribute also to King Hussein of Jordan, who is tireless in travelling the capitals of the world in search of a decent settlement.

Billions of dollars have been spent on the armed might that is now assembled in Saudi Arabia and the Gulf. I question whether that money might have been used to search for alternative sources of oil. It might have been better invested that way. Better still, those billions of dollars could have been used in searching for alternative sources of energy.

We should think about those who are detained in Iraq and Kuwait. Let us do nothing which might endanger their situation. There appears in The Times today a letter from a woman who has come from Iraq. She fears that the words of the Government may act as kerosene in the heat of the present situation.

8.59 pm

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): The House has been united in its condemnation of the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait. The speeches of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition fully reflect the views of the overwhelming majority of the British people. Indeed, they reflect opinion throughout the world. The world has not just condemned the invasion but, through the United Nations, has committed itself to taking effective economic action, backed by force if necessary, to secure the withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait and to see the freeing of the hostages unharmed.

The main point of my contribution is to emphasise the supreme importance of the Government giving their full support to the United Nations in that role. That is the central thrust coming from hon. Members on both sides of the House, and I hope that the Government may be relied on to heed it.

I do not believe that there is a viable alternative, not at this stage. When we see on our television screens, as we have seen time and again, leading republican senators speaking in terms of taking out Hussein, of destroying the Iraqi air force and of having learnt the language of surgical strikes, we must accept that the situation is not like that.

In our heart of hearts we surely know that, if we were to go down the road of a United States-initiated attack on Iraq, perhaps supported by the British Government, it would not be an easy option. It might be possible within a reasonable time to destroy the Iraqi air force and their military and key economic installations, but it would not follow that Iraqi forces would withdraw from Kuwait.

The most likely scenario in the use of military action to secure the withdrawal of Iraqi forces would be that of a prolonged ground war involving large losses. The remarks of my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) and of the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) were pertinent in that respect.

We cannot be certain of the consequences of taking military action. Indeed, we could not, as a result of military action, be sure of the political consequences. Many hon. Members, particularly on the Opposition Benches, fear that we could find the United States leading us into a war which would be seen in due course as a war between western imperialism and Arab nationalism and fundamentalism. Before long, the fundamental issue of the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait would be lost in the minds of many Arabs. It is crucial, therefore, for us to reject at this stage any idea of unilateral action by America, supported by other western countries.

I listened with interest to the speech of the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine). I shall not get involved in the argument whether Security Council resolution 661, with its reference to article 51, gives authority for taking military action. I do not agree with him that it would be wrong militarily to approach the United Nations for such authority. The American forces are in such a state of readiness that there would be nothing to benefit the Iraqis making an initial strike against those forces.

If, at the end of the day, military force is to be used, that should happen only through the auspices of the United Nations. If, sadly, sanctions were not working, the final bit of pressure on Saddam would be the very fact of the United States, Britain and other countries going to the United Nations for that authority. He would know at that point that he had a final chance to withdraw, and that otherwise he would encounter huge forces ranged against him.

The most important point to make in this debate is to encourage the Government to do all they can to make sanctions work. As a range of other hon. Members have said, we are talking about economic sanctions. There is good reason to believe that we can make them effective and cripple the economy in Iraq, destroy the living standards of the people in Iraq and, in so doing, bring enormous pressure—as much as can be mobilised in the world—against the Iraqi leadership. That is not an easy option and it means using huge amounts of resources to help the countries in the front line.

Other hon. Members have seen an interesting piece in this week's Newsweek International magazine, in which the Crown Prince of Jordan spells out just how dependent the Jordanian economy is on Iraq and the enormous consequences of sanctions for Jordan. It will be a huge task to compensate and seek to protect Jordan and the other countries in the vicinity, which are poor, from the effects of the sanctions, but it must be done. It will need action, money and commitment from the British Government, wealthier Governments and the world generally. It also means—I am glad that the hon. Member for North Down (Mr. Kilfedder) referred to it in his speech—that we must adopt a more radical and comprehensive approach to the desperate plight of the thousands and thousands of refugees pouring out of Kuwait and Iraq all the time.

We had better be quite clear in our minds that we are talking about an economic embargo, not one aimed at starving the Iraqis. We must be clear that, when it comes to the crunch, we must allow food and medical supplies to move into Iraq.

The remarks of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sillars) were pessimistic. Unlike him, I believe that the crisis gives us a great opportunity in relation to the future of law and order in the world and the United Nations. We can look back on the incidents that have occurred and ask why no action was taken then, but our approach should be to look forward and consider the tremendous opportunity and achievement of having the whole world united in taking effective action to try to ensure—indeed, we must ensure—that this aggressor does not succeed or benefit as a consequence of his actions.

There is unanimity in the Security Council, and the Arab countries of Egypt, Syria and Morocco are lined up in the middle east in support of the decision. A tremendous opportunity has opened up for the world as a result of the new relationship between the Soviet Union—still an enormously powerful country with tremendous interests and links with various countries throughout the world—and the United States, the most powerful military country in the world. It is because of the change in the relationship between those two countries that the United Nations has been able to develop as it has and has progressed so far.

If the United Nations action can succeed, what is being achieved is more important than the short-term outcome in relation to what happens in Kuwait, although the whole thing is destroyed if the United Nations fails. If its actions succeed, what is being achieved is bigger than one incident and could lay down a new world order and a new climate in which individual nation states recognise that if they take such aggressive action there will be a united world response.

In his speech to the Trades Union Congress, the Leader of the Opposition said that Hussein had challenged the world and it was important that the world should share in his defeat. That sums up the position well. We could be moving into a great, important new period of international law and order. I trust that the Government will do all that they can to prevent the United States or anyone else damaging that opportunity.

Sir Rhodes Boyson (Brent, North): I entirely support the Government's approach as it has been outlined today. The recall of Parliament is a constitutional issue, and it was right that Parliament should be recalled to discuss the events in the Gulf. It would have been remiss of us to fail to discuss the issue. Our serious debate has demonstrated the necessity and usefulness of the recall. Parliamentary democracy means that Ministers should be cross-examined by Opposition spokesmen and Back-Bench Members. Similarly, the Government must return to the House to be tested from time to time. That is an essential component of our constitution.

There has been a debate throughout the country on the Government's policy. If the House does not meet, debate will be led by the media as if the House is redundant or even non-existent. In fact, the House sits for about nine months of each year to discuss many different issues, some of which are irrelevant to many people outside. When a major issue arises which is a challenge to the western world and its preservation, it would be thought by those whom we represent that if we did not meet our values would be shown to be different from theirs.

There are precedents for this recall. Military issues such as Suez, the Falklands and the Russian invasion of Czechoslovakia—the third incident did not threaten British troops at the time—have led to Parliament being recalled. Parliament has been recalled because of sterling crises. We have assembled on recall during the summer recess because of Northern Ireland problems. We did so when faced with the three-day week. It would have been remiss of us not to have assembled on recall for today's debate.

As others have said, there are those who look back to what was happening during the late 1930s. At that time I was a young schoolboy. In the later years of the war I served in the Royal Navy, and I continued to do so when the war had ended. Those in my generation will never forget the sanctions that did not work at the time of the invasion of Abyssinia. Sanctions were not introduced when the march into the Rhineland took place. The lessons of history must be learned. If we fail to learn them we shall be presented with the same lessons. Henry Ford may have described history as bunk, but history is a thread that runs through generations. We must remember that certain forms of behaviour bring certain responses.

The issue before us is not confined to ensuring that Iraq gets out of Kuwait. We are concerned also with the fall of Saddam Hussein. We must deal also with the chemical warfare capacity of Iraq and its threat to develop nuclear weapons. If these issues are not dealt with, we shall have to pay the penalty in future. That will be the price of failing to learn the consequences of appeasement in the 1930s.

Until recently, there was talk of a peace dividend following the end of the cold war. Suddenly, we are faced with the threat of a hot war. I do not believe that human nature has changed since the events that took place in the Garden of Eden. Irrespective of whether one is an evolutionist or a creationist, human nature is the one thing that is static. We are faced with a fallen world. Communists and religious fanatics have tried to transform this world in one generation after another but have failed to do so. The lessons of history must be learned, because if we fail to work with the grain of human nature it will react against us. If a cat is stroked in one way it will purr, but if it is stroked in another it will growl. We must examine human nature and decide how to make it work. We must try to ensure that it does not growl, as it were, at what is being done to it.

The first task of Government is to ensure the preservation of the nation state against external attack. That task cannot be undertaken by an individual. The second task of government is to ensure the maintenance of the Queen's peace so that we can walk the streets of our country in security. Any country that cannot defend itself and cannot impose the Queen's peace upon its streets is not fulfilling its obligation to provide the basics for the nation.

We have been taught a lesson—that not only do we need to maintain a strong defence force to protect this country, but that we need to do so to help our friends. It is no good passing resolutions and emitting nothing but hot air—we need weapons, ships for a blockade, air cover and so on. I hope that the lesson has been deeply learnt not only in this House but in the country. We must not disarm; we must maintain strong defences, both for our preservation and to play our part with our allies and with the United Nations to make life tolerable throughout the world. Dictators always say that they want to make life good, but it always becomes intolerable. Democracies try to make life tolerable, and the necessary components of that are the Queen's peace on the streets and the Queen's peace in external defence.

It was right to recall Parliament, because parliamentary democracy means that Ministers must be responsible to Parliament. The country would not understand if we did not debate the crisis here when it is being debated outside. We would be redundant, although I do not know whether we would be entitled to redundancy pay. We do not want the appeasement of the 1930s that my generation witnessed. Unless we learn the lessons of history, we will suffer.

It is evident from today's speeches and the way that the Government have worked with the United Nations, America and our allies, together with our own strength, that the lessons of the 1930s have been learnt, especially by Opposition Members. People listening to the debate today will say, "Thank goodness the House of Commons was recalled; thank goodness it was so responsible in its support of the Government."

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Could you tell us your intentions about 10-minute speeches tomorrow? Will sympathetic consideration be given to those hon. Members who, understandably, could not be called today but who have sat through the debate?

Mr. Speaker: Sympathetic consideration will certainly be given to those hon. Members who have sat through today's debate, but I regret that even then it is unlikely that I will be able to call all of them tomorrow. My sympathy is with them and I shall do my best.

Mr. Dalyell: What about 10-minute speeches?

Mr. Speaker: I look at each day as it comes. It is a fair to good bet.

9.17 pm

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): There were some, both inside and outside the House, who suggested that the recall of Parliament might be unnecessary, that it might be unproductive, that it could be nit-picking and that it might even be divisive. On the contrary, those who have listened to and watched the debate—and the World Service is carrying the debate live and in full to those listening in Iran, Kuwait and the rest of middle east—will have found it sober, serious, valuable and worth while. It has been part of the way a true democracy deals with such serious events.

At the heart of the saga has been the remarkable and refreshing unity and solidarity of the world community in the face of such a breach of international law and of acceptable behaviour. The strength and purpose of the whole world, east and west, has been unprecedented, and notably it has included many in the Arab world who have rightly recognised the threat of brutal Iraqi adventurism. The United Nations has played—as it was always intended to do, but rarely has had the chance to do—the central part in dealing with this act of aggression. The fact that it has acted decisively and unanimously has produced order where there could so easily have been chaos. It has acted with speed and with measure to tighten effective sanctions against Iraq. In turn, that has strengthened its credibility and the credibility of international institutions.

I add my tribute to that of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition to our United Nations ambassador Sir Crispin Tickell and his staff who did so much to make the United Nations' work so effective. It is also right that we pay tribute to the arduous work that has been put in by our ambassador in Kuwait and his staff in such appalling circumstances and to the ambassador in Baghdad and his staff.

It is important, and it does no harm at all, to reiterate just what was involved in the events that we are considering. I realise that, as a trickle of freed hostages deliberately manipulated by Baghdad dominates our headlines, there is a danger that they, rather than the act of aggression which engulfed them, will become the issue. We cannot allow the natural joy and relief at the reuniting of families to overshadow the illegality and indecency of their being held in the first place, and the continuing outrage that the men and the remaining women and children are still being held.

The naive and crude manipulation of the television screens of the world will, if we allow it to, divert attention from the way in which Iraq invaded the sovereign state of Kuwait on 1 August. Iraq invaded a friendly Arab nation state. Its troops pillaged it and now the Iraqi regime has annexed it. Iraq has forcibly held against their will thousands of foreign civilians, the uninvolved citizens of a dozen countries, and has compounded its flouting of international law which that represents by moving some of them to strategic locations in violation of even the Geneva convention's rules of war. It is instructive that that tactic brought condemnation even from among that small group of Arab friends that Saddam Hussein's regime has. Attracting condemnation is something that Saddam Hussein is used to, but to be attacked by Colonel Gaddafi for going too far is really some achievement.

There is no doubt that Kuwait was only the beginning of Saddam Hussein's ambition: an ambition which threatened most of his neighbouring states—more, certainly, than just Saudi Arabia—and, in the process, threatened the whole world. To be the new super-power of the middle east, to be the military power and arbiter of events in that area. to have a stranglehold on the world's oil supply, was his obvious ambition, and that had to be stopped.

Saddam Hussein and his regime started, conducted and lost an eight-year-long war with Iran at the expense of 1·5 million casualties and unimaginable horror. They have not only manufactured and deployed chemical weapons but have used them first in the battlefield against Iran and then, when that war was lost, against their own Kurdish population. This is a man and a regime who eliminate internal opposition by a process called grass cutting, by which any potential opponents are mowed down. It has been reported that more than 120 senior army officers were executed simply for raising their voices against the invasion. This is a man and a regime whose contempt for civil and human rights has produced a society of such cruelty and barbarity that torture, terror and bribery are the only intruments for retaining power. This is a man and a regime who can make, and literally have made, the flesh creep.

The world watched, and at Halabja it even made the television screens, when the lethal gases were massacring the Kurds. But then trade mattered more than condemnation and punishment. The world watched as Farzad Bazoft, the journalist from the Observer, was murdered after a farce of a trial, but not one Iraqi diplomat was sent home. The world saw the nuclear triggers discovered at Heathrow and bits of the supergun emerge all over Europe, and heard the threats chemically to extinguish Israel, but the world went on trading and dealing with Saddam's Iraq.

There is a great and shared culpability in the world that a man and a regime of such an accepted capacity for evil were provided with the means to perpetrate their aggression. We must collectively share that awful responsibility for creating the monster which brought about this crisis. The weaponry which faces the multinational force in the Gulf and confronts British troops as well is not home grown. The tanks, rockets, warheads, chemical weapons, chemical plants and nuclear technology on which the Iraqis are still working have been imported. They all came from nations that knew where all that was going and the sort of regime to which it was going.

Over the years, Saddam Hussein has built up a network of companies and contacts with the active connivance of many Governments, in feeding weapons, technology and know-how to the military machine that has caused so much trouble. On "Panorama" the other night, we saw how a company based in this capital, the Technology and Development Group, operates openly and without restriction as an arm of the official Iraqi military procurement operation. Its tentacles spread to many other countries. Such operations should be stopped in Britain immediately and banned for good—in the same decisive way that the Iranian arms procurement office in London was closed two years ago.

This whole episode must teach us—it is an expensive lesson—that we must all take far greater care in future with the technology of death. The end of the cold war and the unique new collaboration between the Americans and Russians evident in the United Nations over the past few weeks should see the end of the cold war and the replacement of the apparatus of controlling strategic exports. We should complement the nuclear non-proliferation treaty with one covering chemicals and the deadly new high-technology weapons as well.

The debate has rightly reflected the wide range of views that exist in this country. It is proper that we should rejoice in one thing alone in this country. I refer to our right as free representatives of our people to give voice to our diverse views. Would that it were the same in Baghdad. Some right hon. and hon. Members and others outside say that we should enter Kuwait right away and use force to liberate it, and argue that only by military force will Saddam Hussein leave that country. They do so despite the declared view expressed last week by General Norman Schwarzkopf, the American commander in Saudi Arabia, that there will be no war unless the Iraqis attack, and that of the Saudi Defence Minister, who also commented last week that no offensive action will begin in Saudi Arabia.

If Iraq attacks, a response will have to be made. Any military threat must be met, resisted and repelled by the same world solidarity that we have already seen. However, let us be clear that a war in the Gulf would be a war such as the world has never seen before. Where there are chemical weapons and those mad enough, irrational enough or desperate enough to use them, there is no such thing as a "surgical strike". Where there are mustard gases and toxins such as sarin, tabun, and anthrax, the missiles to deliver them and the willingness to use them, there can be no such thing as a short, sharp conflict. Any war involving chemical weapons will bring suffering, casualties and death on a scale that we have not seen in a century, and which we had good reason to believe was outlawed for ever.

A war in the Gulf, or any conflict that is not started by Saddam Hussein or conducted clearly within the authority of the United Nations, could have incalculable and irreversible political consequences in a part of the world where future oil supplies might be the least of the resulting problems. Many right hon. and hon. Members drew attention to those political dimensions.

There are those who say that the troops should be pulled out, while simultaneously condemning the Iraqi aggression and recommending that everything should take place under UN control. However, it is an irrefutable fact that only the United States could have taken action on a scale sufficient to protect Saudi Arabia from the grave and imminent threat that it faced after the invasion of Kuwait, when it could have been immediately overwhelmed.

The United States and Britain, as well as the other 10 countries, have forces in the area because article 51 allowed, indeed dictated, that Saudi Arabia asked for and received international help.

In the five weeks since the invasion no military action has been taken by any of the defending forces without the explicit backing of a resolution of the United Nations Security Council.

There are those who say; do a deal—negotiate with Saddam Hussein. United Nations resolution 660 states that there should be negotiations between Iraq and Kuwait, but only when Iraq has withdrawn unconditionally from Kuwait. A few yards of territory, an island here or there, a part of an oilfield or some financial gesture would not force the aggressor to retreat and to learn that armed invasion and annexation do not pay, and should never pay.

There are those who have preached ultra-caution, but the reality is that only relentless continuing pressure and an unremitting tightening of the sanctions until the Iraqis know that there is no way out, will produce a just outcome. The sanctions are working; the noose is tightening; the friends are deserting and we have to stick with that tactic until it works.

The majority of hon. Members here today reflect the vast majority in the country who believe that it is these unprecedented mandatory sanctions with the international solidarity that they represent and the pressure that they are putting and will continue to put on Saddam, that will bring about his defeat.

Quite rightly the debate today has also looked ahead. We must be constructive about what we can do now. In so doing we are right to remind ourselves that Saddam Hussein is not Iraq and Iraq is not Saddam Hussein. We cannot and should not write off 17 million subjugated Iraqi people for the crimes and perversions of their dictator and his cohorts.

Iraq is a terrorised, frightened, war-weary nation, but it is one where the germ of freedom and decency is still alive. There are people in Iraq—they must be remarkably brave and courageous peole—who represent an alternative to Saddam's regime. They must be encouraged and sent a signal from the world outside that their courage and sacrifice is worth while and that it is supported. The best way to send that signal is for the opposition leadership in exile to be given the same attention, recognition and moral support that we so willingly, rightly and successfully gave to the Walesas, the Havels and Sakharovs, when they fought for their freedom in eastern Europe. Our support would stiffen the resolve of those for whom opposition means risking liberty, sanity and all too often their lives and those of their families.

The world must also ensure, as so many hon. Members have properly said during the debate, that help is given to those countries paying the heaviest price for the United Nations campaign against Iraq. It is not merely the front-line states, like Jordan, with its appalling and urgent refugee problem, that we should be helping immediately and generously, but also Egypt, Syria and Turkey which are also paying the price. On top of those, and equally important, are the poorest countries on earth: Bangladesh, India, Pakistan and so many of the African countries where the oil price rise is yet another savage blow to an already dire condition. Above all, we must make it clear that our overriding objective in this whole exercise, after the liberation of Kuwait and the full release of all the hostages, is real stability in the middle east.

This rare display of unanimous United Nations support for international law must not be lost for ever, especially in a region which has for too long been a shop window for broken international laws.

After 1990—like Europe after 1989—the middle east will never be the same again. One feature brought out in many of the speeches today is the new, valuable and constructive role that has been played by the Soviet Union in the United Nations, alongside the United States of America. The future role of the Soviet Union in both Europe and the middle east will be a major factor in the outcome for both regions. It is a significant and historic step forward, which we should recognise and welcome.

Many hon. Members on both sides of the House have drawn attention to the way in which the world has now concentrated its concern on the part of the world affected by the invasion. That concern will not end; it will not go away, however the matter is resolved—even after the defeat of Saddam Hussein. The message of our debate today has been clear enough: we stay tough, we stay cool, we stay united—because, for as long as Saddam Hussein threatens his neighbours, he threatens us all.

9.35 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. William Waldegrave): Today the House has spoken for our nation as only the House can speak. The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) spoke well in winding up the debate for the Opposition, and we have heard some other outstanding speeches, led by the magnificent speech of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. Let me also pay tribute to the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition, and to the fine speeches of the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) and, of course, to the splendid speech of the Father of the House, my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine).

The whole House is united on certain objectives. Aggression cannot be allowed to pay. A pirate state with a strong army cannot be allowed simply to loot resources that it may need because it has got itself into debt. Above all, once engaged as they are now engaged, the international forces of law represented by the United Nations cannot be allowed to be defeated. If that were to happen, anarchy would be loosed on the world.

Some have said, "Why the excitement? There have been other invasions and other territorial disputes." They should remember this: never before, since the foundation of the United Nations, has one member state attempted to obliterate another. That is the difference between this and many other crimes and problems of the past.

The strategy formed by the United Nations and the allies of the legitimate Government of Kuwait is also clear and, I believe, has received the almost unanimous backing of the House. The first weapon to be tried was the economic embargo; second came the rapid movement of forces from an amazing variety of nations to defend the other vulnerable states. I was pleased that the hon. Member for Hamilton's speech did not contain that strain of anti-Americanism which, I thought, spoiled one or two speeches made by his hon. Friends. He paid tribute to the extraordinary effort which the United States has made, and which only the United States could have made. We have contributed; but 20 other nations, from literally every other continent of the globe—from Australasia, from Asia and, of course, from the middle east, including the majority of the Arab League—are there as well.

Then comes the next stage. Who knows? We cannot rule out anything, as long as it is firmly based in international law. In the absolute unity that the nations have shown and that the House has shown today, we are all agreed that we should give no comfort whatever to Saddam Hussein.

There have been some dissentient voices. After listening to the speech of my former neighbour, now the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), I asked myself whether I would feel more secure in my arguments if he was agreeing with me, and came to the conclusion that I would not.

Mr. Kinnock: Join the club.

Mr. Waldegrave: I cannot refrain from repeating the Leader of the Opposition's sotto voce remark—"Welcome to the club".

Let us pause for a moment—as did the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) in a useful intervention—to consider Saddam Hussein's strategy. It is pretty clear. He will try to divert us from his central act of aggression: he has been doing so with the inhumane and intolerable treatment of the hostages. He will find other strategies of this kind. He will encourage other people, some of them well meaning, to look for half-baked solutions, conferences, intermediary stages and means to divide those United Nations resolutions by two. We must be alert to that strategy. The hon. Member for Walsall, North did not fall for that strategy—nor, in a fine speech, as I have already said, did the right hon. Member for Devonport and my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker). The hon. Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds) did fall for it in his speech—understated, as is his wont.

Mr. Faulds: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Waldegrave: No. The hon. Gentleman would try to divert us, but he would not succeed. I cannot give way to interventions; I have little time.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce) said, rightly, that Saddam Hussein likes to liken himself to Nebuchadnezzar and spoke of the hanging gardens. May I direct the attention of Saddam Hussein, who may not be familiar with this verse, to the book of Daniel, chapter five, verse 21, after the deposition, which is referred to in verse 20;

"And he was driven from the sons of men; and his heart was made like the beasts, and his dwelling was with the wild asses; they fed him with grass like oxen."

I must concentrate a little on one section of the Leader of the Opposition's speech, not necessarily because I disagree with it but because I am not sure that I understood it. Several hon. Members have said that clarity of speech is important here. There is no disagreement with the legal position as set out by the Leader of the Opposition. We totally share it. However, there are three international grounds for military action: first, article 51, after a request from Kuwait; secondly, a response to an attack—what after today we may call the Yeovil rules; thirdly, an explicit United Nations mandate. Any of those three would do. The Leader of the Opposition's legal analysis was entirely justified. Where we departed from him—perhaps we did, perhaps we did not—was when he and the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) seemed to predict a scenario ahead of time that cannot be predicted. We do not know which of those grounds would be the best to use to bring about the objective that all of us share: to avoid the defeat of international order.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East sketched one scenario where there was total unity for military action. That might be one scenario, but let us not predict in advance. We cannot rule out any action, so long as it is based—as it would be based, as the Leader of the Opposition made clear—on article 51 after a request from Kuwait.

The right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) in his interesting speech—the former beachmaster at Salerno, and at Anzio, which was even more dangerous—speaking with the authority of having been under fire, made the same point. Just for a moment, I thought that he was going to say that we must go back for another resolution under any circumstances, but he did not. He said that we must get as much support as we can. That must be the objective of British, American and Arab League majority diplomacy. However, what we must not do is to take the further fatal step of predicting now that in every circumstance we must go back for a new resolution. That would be most unwise.

Ms. Short: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Member for Hamilton did not give way. [Interruption.] He was not asked to give way, but I shall give way to the hon. Lady.

Ms. Short: The Minister said earlier that it would be a mistake to allow Saddam Hussein to stand on the moral high ground. He must know that the real danger is that many people in the Arab world believe that the west is deeply hypocritical because of its different evaluation of the situation of the Palestinians in the occupied territories and the situation in Kuwait. Does he not agree that the west could be accused of bias, that it needs to stand firm on international law and that it would be a disaster, unless there were further aggression, if there were to be any offensive military action without a United Nations resolution and without the agreement of the whole of the Arab world?

Mr. Waldegrave: I have just explained why the opposite would be a disaster—a far more profound disaster that might endanger the whole operation and put the basis of international order at risk: that is, if we were to try now to play the game of prediction as to what exactly the circumstances would be in which sanctions were presumably being judged by the wider community not to be working and we went for further action. We cannot judge that now. I shall return to the other issues in the middle east. That is vital. The hon. Lady has made a point with which I have more sympathy and to which I shall return in a moment.

Let us not forget that the refugees are Saddam Hussein's refugees. It is a most attractive capacity of the western democracies to take all burdens upon themselves and usually to blame themselves for everything. We are already talking as if in some way we are responsible for those refugees. We are not: Saddam Hussein caused those children to die in the desert by driving out Palestinians, Egyptians, Indians and Philippinos who were working and supporting their families back home with remittances.

We must act, and we must, above all, help the nations from which those people come to get them home. We do not want to institutionalise this crisis. We do not want another lot of Gaza camps with permanent refugees in the area. We want to help them to get home. That is why the money that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced today is going not to the non-governmental organisations in the ordinary way of a famine crisis but to a specific organisation designed to deal with this situation —the International Organisation for Migration, which was set up in 1951 to deal with displaced people. We have given it that money to help those migrants to get home.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) said, an airlift may be needed. We may have to help the poor countries from which many of the refugees come to finance that airlift, and we will do so. Several hon. Members said that we must help, and we will do so.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): I do not dissent from the proposition that the refugees are Saddam's refugees. While there must be a massive airlift to get them home, they must remain alive to be taken home. We have a desperate responsibility to do that for the refugees now and to sustain them.

Mr. Waldegrave: We already are. The Overseas Development Administration has joined many others in the world in providing immediate aid, which is arriving. The refugees are trying to get home. That is what they want and it is the best way of preventing the tragedy from continuing indefinitely. We have given that money to the International Organisation for Migration as well as to the immediate humanitarian organisations—the Red Crescent, Red Cross, Oxfam and so on—to support them in the meantime.

That brings me, naturally, to a subject of some interest to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and to every taxpayer in this country—burden sharing; who is going to pay. After the titanic contribution of the United States, we have made perhaps the second largest contribution in terms of military aid. The French have also provided major military support, but it is legitimate to look to countries that have not provided very much on the military side, and that point was made by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney. It is legitimate to say to them, "The world is under pressure: what will you do to help?" I shall go at some intolerable hour tomorrow morning to Rome, fortified by the support of the Leader of the Opposition, to address in tactful style, I hope, with some of our colleagues the idea that, although no frigates are available, some money could be supplied.

I must pay tribute to the Japanese, who have already talked in large sums. This is perhaps the first international crisis in which the Japanese, who are talking in terms of $1 billion, have started to put big money on the line. The fact that the Japanese, for the first time, are saying, "We share the responsibility with the rest of the world for seeing this matter through," seems a very important step forward. Others, we hope, will follow. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made that point very clearly in her speech.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) and other hon. Members referred to the underlying tensions in the middle east, which it is not unfair to say have contributed to regimes such as that of Saddam Hussein. It is easy to try to shift the blame from individuals and say that they are created by the conditions, and we must not fall for that, but it is noticeable that regimes in the middle east, with the great exception of Egypt, have become more radical since the Arab-Israeli wars and the further defeats and humiliations, as they were seen in so many parts of the Arab world, of Arab people. I am not saying that those wars were caused by the Israelis, but the conflict and injustices to the Palestinians that have emerged out of it have contributed to the situation.

Three or four months ago, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary came back from the middle east and rightly described the whole region as a tinder box. My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup, the Leader of the Opposition, and the right hon. Member for Leeds, East, in a powerful speech, all made that point. The hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) rightly pointed out that two wrongs cannot make a right, so although that situation has not been corrected, it does not undermine the rightness of the action that we are taking in regard to Saddam Hussein.

The hon. Member for Warley, East made his point in his inimitable style but many others made it slightly more moderately and carried the House with them more. One factor that has emerged today is an extraordinary unity across the parties on the issue of the injustices done to the Palestinian people.

Mr. Faulds: The right hon. Member has referred to me twice, and I am grateful to him for giving way. If he disagrees so much with the burden of my speech, would he care to make his own comments on the implications for the situation in the Gulf of the strategic alliance between Israel and the United States?

Mr. Waldegrave: The interesting point about it is that it has no implications. What strikes me is what a small part Israel is playing in any of these events. That may lead certain people in the United States Congress to learn a lesson. Some people think of their relationship with Israel in terms of a strategic alliance, but they should realise that it is not particularly useful if it cannot be used in a crisis like this. In such a situation, the United States is bound to want invitations from the Arab nations, and to seek allies in the wider Arab world. The dog that has not barked in the night is interesting. Israel has kept out of this because, as has been said, were it to be involved, the result would be consequences and instabilities that would be difficult to handle.

With the support of the House, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary asked me to establish contacts with the PLO leadership after it had made the Geneva declaration and its London declaration about its new strategy in relation to a peace process. Therefore, along with many others, I was saddened by the way in which the PLO missed a wonderful opportunity, which it should have judged right.

Palestine is a small country, resting on international law and suppressed by a stronger neighbour, and if the Palestinians had stood by that international law, they could have pointed out to the international community that they had supported this principle when it cost them a great deal and now they should be helped. Their already just case would then have been unanswerable in all the forums and Parliaments of the world. Many in the Palestinian movement are beginning to understand that, and are shifting their position. We understand the pressures on that disparate movement, but many hon. Members have, like myself and many of my Palestinian friends, have been disappointed by the position taken initially by the leadership of the PLO. We hope to see that position revised. I was glad to see that the Opposition did not pursue that line.

The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) made an interesting speech the other day. He did not, in a Saddam Hussein way, want to link the issues together, but he called for a conference to look at all the wider issues at the same time. Mr. Shevardnadze made a slightly similar speech.

Mr. Kinnock: My right hon. Friend said it first.

Mr. Waldegrave: I think that the right hon. Member for Gorton came first.

Who knows what the correct conference structures will be? I beg the right hon. Gentleman—and I think that he shares this view—to agree that we should not be trying to introduce grand conferences and complicated issues before we have settled the issue of the sovereignty of Kuwait.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) indicated assent.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am gratified to see the right hon. Gentleman nodding. Resolution 660, in relation to Kuwait and to Iraq, refers to negotiations when people have returned to their own countries. That is fine. We could then negotiate about any underlying problems that may have contributed to the conflict in the first place. The same is true in relation to the far more complex and deeper issues of the Palestinians in relation to Israel. That must come afterwards and those who seek to drag across the trail the idea of grand conferences at this stage are contributing to what I call the Saddam Hussein strategy of trying to take our eye off the central issue of his aggression, off the central issue of obedience to international law and off the central issue of absolute concurrence with the Security Council resolutions. None of those points can be divided by two, and none is up for negotiation now. It is only when those resolutions are obeyed that other issues can be addressed.

We hope—and I believe that this will be so—that the middle east will never be quite the same again and that the whole world, even those countries that were not concerned and that have not been interested in the problems, will now focus on the underlying causes of conflict, of dissent and of danger in the middle east. If we can bring back, as I am sure that we shall, the Palestinian leadership into a position of diplomacy and of commitment to diplomacy, there will be progress. I hope and pray that that will be so.

Mr. Nellist: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the central issue is not what he has just described? It is not about democracy. There was precious little of that in Kuwait even before the invasion. The central issue is cheap oil. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree with a former United States Assistant Defence Secretary? He said that it boils down to the great powers defending their interests and that if Kuwait grew carrots, we would not give a damn.

Mr. Waldegrave: The central issue is of obedience to international law. The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) will find flip remarks from former politicians round the world. If Saddam Hussein and the current leadership of Iraq are allowed to win against the painfully assembled forces of international legality, the world faces anarchy. All that Saddam Hussein has to do is to withdraw. That is a clear issue.

These events will define the nature of the world that will succeed the world in which I was brought up and in which I now live—the world of the cold war. This is a defining event. We cannot allow the forces of international law to be faced down and we cannot allow the United Nations, in its first rebirth, to be defeated. Ernie Bevin must be proud of what is happening now at the United Nations. This is what the founding fathers meant it to do. If, the first time that we have this unity, with the Security Council working as it is supposed to work and with the military staff committee for the first time in its history meeting with a substantive agenda, we allow them to be defeated, the world will face unparalleled anarchy. That cannot happen.

Aggression must not be allowed to pay. We must not let the message get out that the old stalemate of the cold war was the only way to keep peace. We hear backward-looking people—funny old Russian generals with rows of medals—say, "Those were the days."

Mr. Canavan: And others.

Mr. Waldegrave: Doubtless there are equivalents elsewhere. They say, "Let us go back to the safe old days of the cold war." If that is the message, what a depressing message it will be. Without the cold war, there is far more room for flexibility, for danger, for shifts, for movements and for changing alliances, so we need the structure of international co-operation and of international law.

There is no question about on which side of the argument the House and the Government come down. Our hearts are out there with our hostages, but their safety and the safety of innumerable innocent people round the world depend on the strength of the House and its equivalents in the other nations of the alliance which is supporting international law. If anarchy is loosed upon the world, not only their lives will be at risk but innumerable unpredictable other people's lives will be at risk for ever.

Some people doubt the staying power of democracy. I do not. Democracies are slow to anger but, once angered, they go on right to the end of the road. The message has gone from the House today that this British democracy is ready to play its part in that process. I do not doubt that the House and the British people will see it through.

It being Ten o'clock, MR. SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Resolution this day.

Adjourned accordingly till tomorrow.

House of Commons

Friday 7 September 1990

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITION

Hostages

9.35 am

Mr. John Hughes (Coventry, North-East): I am grateful for this opportunity to present a petition calling for the release of Terry Waite and other hostages. As more and more hostages are released by Saddam Hussein, the question, "What is being done on behalf of my loved one?" must be at the forefront of the thoughts of every relative of every hostage.

The petition, signed by the members of Coventry's Methodist churches, conveys the heartfelt concern of every father, every mother, every brother, every sister, every other relative and every loved one of every hostage. Serious though the Gulf crisis is, it should not overshadow the plight of hostages who have been detained for years. I call on the Prime Minister to do more on their behalf.

To lie upon the Table.

The Gulf

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Goodlad.]

Mr. Speaker: Before I call the Secretary of State for Defence, I must announce to the House that I propose to put a limit of 10 minutes on speeches between 11.30 and 1 o'clock. I ask right hon. and hon. Members who are called to speak before that time and afterwards please to bear that limit broadly in mind in consideration of their colleagues.

9.37 am

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Tom King): I welcome this opportunity to contribute to the debate.

It is clear that hon. Members in all parts of the House are conscious of the problems and dangers involved, and it was encouraging to see the sense of responsibility and the sombre way in which the House approached the debate yesterday. I felt as I listened to many of the speeches that hon. Members had a real understanding of the dangers involved in the situation, that there was a real recognition of the challenge that the world faces at this time, with an appreciation of our responsibility, and that there was real anger at the total affront to law and the shameful treatment of our citizens and those of other countries. Hon. Members also displayed a sense of hope that there is a new determination in the world to stand together in support of international law. I sense complete agreement in the House in that hon. Members recognise totally that this aggression is quite unacceptable and that it cannot lie uncorrected. I am grateful for the wide support that the Government have received from hon. Members in all parts of the House for the action that we have taken so far.

Our immediate concern has been to join in the efforts to avoid further aggression and then to end the present aggression by peaceful means by making the United Nations embargo work. If it does not, then of course we have had to make it clear that we cannot rule out anything. That has been honestly recognised by the leaders of all the parties, first by the Leader of the Opposition, in support of the Prime Minister, recognising that it may be necessary to use force. I note that that was echoed by his predecessor, the former Prime Minister Lord Callaghan of Cardiff, in the other place yesterday.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister yesterday set out the overall position and she made clear our commitment to the ending of this aggression. I propose to report to the House on the military events, including my own recent visit to Saudi Arabia and to the other Gulf states, when I had the chance to visit all our main units there.

I was struck by the fact that the invasion of Kuwait took place just over a week after I made a statement in the House on our "Options for change" examination of our defence provision. I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Amery). I noted his question:

"Does my right hon. Friend agree that developments in the Gulf over the past few days have made it clear that we may well have to share responsibility for out-of-area operations?" —[Official Report, 25 July 1990; Vol. 177, c. 478.]

He said that at about the time that President Saddam Hussein was giving a solemn assurance to the President of Egypt and to the King of Saudi Arabia that he would not invade Kuwait. As we know, it was on the night of 2 August that Kuwait was invaded and that that promise was totally negated.

I want to report first to the House on the events and the military situation in Kuwait. The invasion took place at 2 am on 2 August when three armoured divisions of the Republican Guard force of the Iraqi army crossed the frontier, closely followed later that morning by four divisions of the Republican Guard infantry. Combat aircraft of the Iraqi air force, which total about 800 aircraft, bombed and rocketed Kuwaiti airfields. At the same time, helicopter gun ships attacked Kuwait City and landed at least a brigade of Republican Guard special forces—with light armour—who led the assault on the palace and on the main Government buildings. In all, that force amounted to about 100,000 soldiers, armed with about 1,250 tanks, with many infantry combat vehicles and with artillery.

The Kuwaiti army, which is barely one tenth of that figure, was in a state of alert, but was not deployed in defensive positions because the Kuwaitis did not believe that one Arab country could invade another. The troops who led the invasion were followed by further reinforcements, including some who, according to the reports received, appear to belong to some form of militia and who are extremely ill disciplined.

On 20 August, the Republican Guard force divisions started to withdraw from their forward deployments and were replaced by regular army troops. Only two Republican Guard force brigades are now believed to be left in Kuwait. The forces whom we believe are now in Kuwait are about 10 regular divisions—approximately 150,000 men, 1,500 tanks and 700 artillery pieces. Republican Guard units have been withdrawn to Iraq. It has been the Iraqi practice to withdraw Republican Guard units after an attack. They may now either have been withdrawn to establish a more defensive position or—and the possibility must always be borne in mind—they may have been withdrawn to reform for further aggression.

In Kuwait itself, the Iraqis have strengthened their coastal defences with Silkworm missiles, with a string of infantry divisions and with field artillery units. They have moved their Frog battlefield missiles and a full range of surface-to-air missiles to Kuwait.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The Secretary of State talks about all the equipment. What have the Government done about the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) last night about the office of the Technology and Development Group of Iraq in London? Given all the information, have the Government closed it?

Mr. King: The answer to the first point is no. The hon. Gentleman will know, as comments have been made about arms sales, that for the past 10 years, the Government have refused to offer and sell any lethal equipment to the Government of Iraq. The sale of armaments is obviously the concern of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). We have made clear, as the actions taken recently in a well-known case show, the length to which we have sought to go when clever attempts have been made to evade that embargo.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Clackmannan) rose——

Mr. King: I have sought to set before the House the position that we face and the situation in Kuwait. I know that the House wants to have that information.

I turn now to the response to the aggression. The House knows that there was immediate activity in the United Nations. On the day of the invasion, resolution 660 was passed without dissent, condemning the invasion. Furthermore, on 6 August, resolution 661, introducing the embargo, was passed—again, without dissent. On 8 August, Iraq annexed Kuwait, and on the same day His Majesty King Fahd invited my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to contribute towards the defence of Saudi Arabia. On the same day, the Government confirmed their readiness to play their full part in such a contribution. I want now to report to the House on our various steps to implement and to respond to that invitation from the Government of Saudi Arabia and from other threatened Gulf states.

On the following day I announced that we would be sending a squadron of Tornado air defence fighters and a squadron of Jaguar ground attack aircraft with an anti-tank capability, and that we would be reinforcing the Armilla patrol in support of the United Nations embargo. I announced that on 9 August. On 10 August, the first detachment of tactical communications left. The following day, a squadron of Tornados left and arrived in Dhahran. It was operational within two hours of arrival. About 200 operational sorties have already been flown in support of the air defence shield of Saudi Arabia.

The Jaguar ground support aircraft, deployed from RAF Coltishall on the same day, were, likewise, extremely quick in coming into operation. They have also flown about 200 operational sorties. They are accompanied by VC10 tankers in support of their operations.

The following day, Nimrod maritime reconnaissance aircraft left RAF Kinloss and arrived in Oman on 13 August. They were operational almost immediately after arrival and have been flying sorties since 15 August. An RAF Rapier detachment, deployed at a later stage to Bahrain in support of a further squadron of Tornado GR1 aircraft, which we sent to provide a day and night anti-armour capability, left RAF Bruggen on 27 August. I had announced the previous Thursday that they would be departing. The House will understand something of the pride that one can feel in the professionalism of our armed services. I was in Bahrain the night that they arrived. On the minute that we said that they would come, the whole squadron arrived, having completed seven air-to-air refuellings coming from Germany via Cyprus. A great impression was made in the area not only because of the quality of the aircraft, which were recognised to make an outstanding contribution and to be something that was not available in the American resources for the defensive shield for Saudi Arabia, but because of the professionalism of the way in which they were deployed. We have also deployed to the area RAF Regiment personnel, both in support of the Rapier and in the ground defence task.

In addition, in the Royal Navy, we have had the Armilla patrol in the Gulf since 1980. At the time of the Iraqi invasion, HMS York was already on station, with the Royal Fleet Auxiliary Orangeleaf. We gave immediate instructions and HMS Battleaxe and HMS Jupiter steamed to join HMS York. They arrived in the Gulf on 12 August. Since then we have also deployed a minehunter ship, HMS Herald, and further repair ships and support ships.

In addition, there has been a logistical build-up to establish effective communications, air and ground defences, and medical facilities, including a field hospital. Britain has made a particular contribution by establishing chemical defence and decontamination units, which will not only support our forces but give training to the Saudi forces. This has been backed up by a massive logistical operation. More than 2 million miles have been flown since the operation was launched, with some 515 sorties of transport aircraft, with an average length of 4,500 miles for each journey. This has been an impressive logistical operation. There are now 5,000 men committed to the undertaking, and I am pleased to say that when I visited the Gulf it was made clear to me in every state to which I went how much our contribution is welcomed, both for its speedy arrival and for its quality and quantity.

All this is costing significant sums. The operating costs of our forces are about £1 million a day, and on top of this deployment and additional costs already amount to some £75 million. We do not yet have accurate details as to how much of these costs are genuinely additional. The funding of such additional costs on defence votes will be considered as soon as possible. We shall contain them within the existing budget if possible, but if supplementary provision is needed the Government will advise the House in the usual way. In the light of certain news today, let me say that we welcome all the support on the ground that our host nations can give us, and some has already been provided, such as free fuel. We shall be discussing cost sharing further with our friends in the Gulf.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): I want to press the Secretary of State on the latter point. It was announced on the news this morning that Saudi Arabia is to pay the costs of the American forces, but we heard no more details. Can the Secretary of State give us more detail? Has there been any proposal about the costs of British forces?

Mr. King: I think that the hon. Lady decided what to ask me before I spoke on this point. If she reads what I have said, she will see that I have covered the point as far as I can.

I know that I will take the House with me when I say that it is a privilege to visit our armed forces in the Gulf and to appreciate the speed with which they moved. Many were brought back overnight from leave. The ships Jupiter and Battleaxe were in Penang and Mombasa, and their personnel were on leave with their families. Their leave had to be interrupted on the spot, but the spirit and resilience of those people, often working in difficult conditions, is something to which the House will wish to pay tribute. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] In spite of the difficult conditions under which they are working, the morale of every service man I met out there was as high as every hon. Member has learned to expect that it would be. Our forces are ready to play their part.

We are already making a valuable contribution to the defence of Saudi Arabia and the Gulf, and that was confirmed to me by all those whom I met in the Gulf. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said yesterday, some additional forces will be needed and their composition is under consideration. I cannot go further than that. Against the background of some of the figures that I have already given to the House, against the threat that still exists and the overall imperative of ensuring that there is no further agression, that the defensive shield of Saudi Arabia and the neighbouring Gulf states is in place, and that the effective action that we are taking through the United Nations is successful, we believe that that will be necessary.

Sir John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): My right hon. Friend knows how highly he is regarded because of the wonderful job that he has done. It may be that we shall soon be committing British troops to fight and possibly die and we are naturally concerned that everything possible should be done for their security. Is there any proposal to have a force commander-in-chief, some sort of force structure and some sort of liaison between the different nations involved in the forces?

Mr. King: My hon. Friend has referred to an important point to which I was about to come. The need for such a structure will be illustrated clearly by what I shall now say about the scope of commitment by other nations.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. King: I should like to continue with my speech because this part is relevant to the intervention made by my hon. Friend the Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Sir J. Stokes).

Nobody can go to the Gulf without being greatly impressed by the skill and determination of the United States in a time of great need and danger and by the scale and capacity of its forces. The forces include combat and support aircraft of all types, armed air mobile and mechanised formations, a marine corps with elements of three marine expeditionary brigades and a substantial naval force with carriers, battleships, cruisers, destroyers and frigates. As Secretary Cheney confirmed this morning, the United States has already deployed more than 100,000 troops to the area. This impressive contribution is a key element in ensuring that the shield of defence for Saudi Arabia and other Gulf states is so strong.

Mr. Marlow: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. King: I shall not do so, if my hon. Friend will forgive me.

While the United States is making the major contribution, I want to draw the attention of the House to the fact that, in addition, two frigates are coming from Australia, troops from Bangladesh, minehunters from Belgium, a destroyer and frigate from Canada, a corvette from Denmark, troops from Egypt, an aircraft carrier, a cruiser and two destroyers from France, frigates from Italy, troops from Morocco, frigates from the Netherlands, a support ship from Norway, troops from Pakistan, a support ship from Portugal, a frigate and two corvettes from Spain and troops from Syria. That represents the largest multinational force since the emergency in Korea, and a major international collaboration.

Dr. Norman Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. King: No, I must continue. Many hon. Members wish to speak and I have already given way on a number of occasions.

The forces sent by us and by the United States are there at the invitation of the King of Saudi Arabia and of other

[Mr. King]

Gulf leaders and Governments. We have gone there, as I have made clear, because of the emergency and the immediate need, and to meet the real and imminent threat that, after the almost painless acquisition of Kuwait—so easily done by deceit and the use of overwhelming force—the eastern province of Saudi Arabia and other Gulf states might be attacked next. The Leader of the Opposition and others have recognised that point. Our first aim is to ensure that aggression proceeds no further. We hope that, with the further steps that we are taking to ensure that the shield is strong, relevant and effective, it will hold.

Dr. Godman: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. King: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will have a chance to make his own contribution to the debate. It would not be fair to many hon. Members who want to speak if I were to give way.

Our second objective is to end the aggression against Kuwait, to see the removal of the Iraqi forces and the restoration of the legitimate Government by peaceful means through the effective and rigorous application of the United Nations embargo. We are engaged in a major effort, not just through our ships in the Gulf, effective though they will be, but through a major exercise involving all Departments of this Government and departments of other Governments equally committed to the rule of law so that we do not leave it to officers and men on our ships to try to operate the naval blockade but enlist the support of every Government in the world who believe in this to ensure that the embargo is effective in every possible way.

The Leader of the Opposition referred to the need to tackle the issue of credit. That was a fair point to make. Credit is illegal under the sanctions legislation. Clearly many matters must be addressed because it is vital that that is achieved.

My hon. Friend the Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge raised the issue of co-ordination in the Gulf area. United Kingdom forces deployed to the Gulf are under our national command and control. However, given the scale of forces that are there, we need the most effective co-ordination, and that is being achieved in the naval field. When I was in Bahrain, our admiral commanding flotilla 2 was in consultation on the La Salle with the American admiral commanding the American naval forces in the Gulf. We have direct and immediate collaboration with the French, who are there, with the Australians, who are coming now, and with other countries which will make their contributions.

We have had helpful discussions with Western European Union to see how the European contribution can be effectively made. We have a good precedent in minehunting from previous experience in the Gulf, and it is possible that that practice will be pursued further.

The issues are being addressed as a matter of some urgency. I cannot report further to the House on that except to make it clear that it is an issue to which we attach the greatest importance. We are in the closest contact with our allies and the kingdom of Saudi Arabia about these matters.

Mr. Denis Healey (Leeds, East): I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will agree that there is one matter that urgently needs clearing up. Prince Sultan, the Defence Minister of Saudi Arabia, has said that no forces should be used from Saudian Arabian territory for military action against Iraq without the agreement of the Saudi Government. The American commander on the spot says that he does not know whether that is true, and that is quite an important element of ignorance of the situation. Has that question now been cleared up; and, in particular, in return for the generous financial assistance offered yesterday to Mr. Baker by the Saudi Government, has Mr. Baker agreed that Prince Sultan's views are correct?

Mr. King: I listened to the right hon. Gentleman with interest yesterday and noticed that he ceased to quote entirely correctly from the reported conversations, but I can confirm—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] What I am saying in respect of His Royal Highness Prince Sultan, the Defence Minister of Saudi Arabia, is the position. We are not there to attack Kuwait or Iraq. We are there to defend Saudi Arabia and to ensure that the United Nations embargo is effectively implemented. That is the present position, and it is absolutely clear. There is no question about that statement, nor do I experience the difficulty that the right hon. Gentleman may have over that matter.

Mr. Healey rose——

Mr. King: I cannot add to that. The question has been raised about the statement of Prince Sultan. I have given the position, and it quite correct.

Mr. Healey rose——

Mr. King: Would the right hon. Gentleman excuse me? [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the Secretary of State giving way?

Mr. Healey: The right hon. Gentleman has missed the point. The American commander on the spot in Saudi Arabia has said that he does not know what the situation is and that it must be decided between the Saudi and American Governments. Is it the right hon. Gentleman's view that Prince Sultan is correct in saying that an attack on Iraq cannot be carried out from Saudi soil without the agreement of the Saudi Government?

Mr. King: General Schwarzkopf is the American joint commander with His Royal Highness Prince Khalid. The position is as I have made quite clear and I do not propose to go further. Prince Sultan has made it clear that there is no Saudi agreement to attack from the territory of Saudi Arabia. The purpose is to defend Saudi Arabia and to make the United Nations embargo work. I shall not go any further than that. As one of my predecessors, the right hon. Gentleman knows the position perfectly well and he knows perfectly well why I cannot go any further.

The House may be aware that, while my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office have been dealing principally with the vexed and difficult issue of our hostages, I think that the House knows—[Interruption.]—it is not a matter for levity—including the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), that a considerable number of those hostages are non-combatant British service men who were part of the British liaison training team serving in Kuwait. They were not involved in the hostilities. They are properly defined under international law as non-combatants.

May I say how pleased I am that this morning a further number of their wives and families have returned to this country. We shall never forget their husbands, some of whom remain in effective captivity and some in hiding. We must take decisions that are necessary for the effective protection of Saudi Arabia and the other Gulf states and for the ending of the illegal annexation and aggression against Kuwait, but let nobody think that we shall ever forget the very difficult and dangerous situation which they and other nationals of many countries face. The whole House is aware that under the new media facilities our words go out from this House to many strange places, and perhaps to them. I want to say directly—certainly on behalf of the Government and I believe the whole House—that we shall not forget them. We do remember them; we are determined to end the aggression but we are conscious of their plight and their difficulty.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The Government will sacrifice them.

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman can talk flippantly, but he has not met the wives and families who are coming home worried. I am sure that other hon. Members will not wish to join in the hon. Gentleman's comments.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recall that we got on very well yesterday without sedentary interruptions from the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who was not here. Can you persuade him to keep quiet today?

Mr. Speaker: It is perfectly true that we had a very good debate yesterday and I hope that it will continue today.

Mr. King rose——

Dr. Godman: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member knows that if the Secretary of State does not give way he must resume his seat.

Mr. King: I pay tribute to the sombre and serious debate in the House yesterday. It is what the subject deserves. I mean no discourtesy to the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), but he knows, because Mr. Speaker has made it quite clear, that a large number of hon. Members wish, understandably, to speak. I am sorry that I am not able to give way to him, but I wish to bring my remarks to a close.

I have referred to the challenge that we face and to the inhuman treatment of the hostages. It is because of them, and the thousands more who could suffer the same fate if this aggression is not corrected, that that aggression must not be allowed to succeed. All our efforts have to be directed towards making the embargo effective—and quickly. It is the only hope to avoid what otherwise could be an awful and major conflict.

Some try to water down embargo sanctions. There is some quibbling about the implications of sanctions. Those who are trying to exempt certain categories of items, beyond medical requirements, think that, somehow, that will reduce the tension—that, somehow, it will appease and make the situation more easy to resolve. I deeply believe they are misguided. If we undermine the effective operation of sanctions, we shall make more likely the risk of a greater conflict thereafter.

I visited Saudi Arabia and the Gulf a week ago. I have also talked this week at the Farnborough aircraft exhibition to visitors from many countries, including many from the smaller countries of the world. They understand the vital principle that is at stake here and the challenge that we face. They have all got neighbours—some much more powerful, some with unfulfilled ambitions. They know that if the rule of law is not maintained in this case, for many of them as well the future could be very difficult indeed. The world must stand together at this time.

We have enough intelligence about what is happening in the world at the moment to know something about the activities of the Iraqi Government and something about their technique of bribes, deceits, promises, credit and threats. All the paraphernalia that they have used will be used again to seek to undermine international unity and strength. Some countries will make very real sacrifices by standing firm on the strength and importance of that principle.

After all the military analyses of this aggression and of whatever plans were made for it have been completed, I believe that Saddam Hussein will be proved to have made one major miscalculation: that he thought that the world would never pull itself together and could never show the strength to stand together in support of international law. I believe that that will prove to have been his great miscalculation. The action that we in this country, together with our friends and allies round the world, have taken in support of our friends in the Gulf has the promise of showing for the first time that the world can work together to defeat this evil. It is to that end that the Government are totally committed.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Clackmannan): The debate so far has been concerned with the need to establish the legitimacy of future action. The role of Parliament is also to ensure that the Executive is accountable to the legislature and its elected members. Today we have the opportunity not only to do that but to express our support to our forces and to those people who will be listening to the debate far beyond these shores and far beyond the capabilities of the television system. We have to recognise that we are being listened to by people who need our encouragement and backing. From the Opposition side of the House I reiterate what the Secretary of State for Defence has just said.

So far we have seen the largest build-up of British troops since the Falklands in what is potentially the most dangerous crisis since the second world war. Labour called for a military presence in Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states to deter further Iraqi aggression. Labour also called for a naval embargo. The reasons for that were self-evident. We had many of our citizens working in the area; we had long-standing obligations of a commercial and diplomatic nature. What is more, through our presence in Oman, our participation in the Armilla patrol and our base in Cyprus, we had a military involvement and capability of such a long-standing nature that it was inevitable that we would be involved and that our role would increase.

One of the advantages of having a professional volunteer armed service is the greater capability rapidly to deploy those forces in times of crisis. When criticism is made of the inadequacy of the response of other nations, it is often forgotten that we do not have to depend on conscript forces at varying stages of readiness. While some of our troops have experience of this region, it is abundantly clear that the climatic and general living conditions will take some time to become familiar with. That in itself must surely give cause for thought to those who expect an early strike.

One of the major problems at the moment is the number of armchair, studio-bound experts who pontificate on the likely scenarios. It is one thing for the studio sandpit warriors to play their war games. It is quite another for the troops out there and for their families at home.

Much has been made of the offensive and defensive role and capabilities of our forces and kit. Into every increase or change in our commitment are read new twists and turns of military strategy. When additional frigates and mine countermeasure vessels are sent to the Gulf, it is assumed that the build-up is being intensified. It is often forgotten that our ships need replenishment and that our crews need leave. Equally important is the fact that the presence of our ships, and those of our allies, in a potential war zone, where ruthless mining tactics could be deployed, requires the protection of our minehunters and minesweepers. We should not forget that British capability in that role is second to none.

This is not breast-beating nationalism but recognition of the fact that we have the longest coastline and the largest number of ships vulnerable to such attacks in the North sea. The experience and expertise that we have acquired have been put at the disposal of the navies of other countries in the past. We did it with the Armilla patrol; we did it in clearing the Suez canal. It is correct that we are now so involved.

If the naval build-up requires the presence of a British carrier to co-ordinate activities, it should be seen as a straightforward and logical extension of our commitment. The apparent effectiveness of the naval blockade, as evidenced by the Iraqi acquiescence to be stopped and searched, suggests that the naval commitment will be adequate. Indeed, it could be said that there is a case for the phasing of some of the deployments of our allies. Certainly that would assist in avoiding the congestion and traffic jams that could well arise in that part of the world.

The role of our Air Force has been subject to even greater personal computer Clausewitz speculation. Aircraft have been deemed to be defensive or offensive in their capability and it is said that that should be interpreted as an indication of our desire to break this or that United Nations resolution. I do not think that such guesswork can be avoided, but the confusion in people's minds can best be illustrated by the role of the Tornado GR1s, which are normally ground attack aircraft.

To take a scenario to illustrate the need for the preparedness that we have at present, in the event of an Iraqi advance by tanks and infantry there would be a need not only to respond to the ground offensive but to ensure that the necessary Iraqi air cover is eliminated, both by interception and by attacks on their bases, thus denying their future back-up. We must recognise that we have an all-embracing capability, and that we cannot pick and choose.

There has also been considerable speculation about the dreaded use of chemical weapons. We do not know what will happen, but the basing of RAF Tornados at Bahrain will enable us to take out many of the key Iraqi targets. Their aircraft have a radius of 800 miles, and are based 650 miles from Baghdad. They would be capable of attacking the weapon production facilities and deployment sites within their range. That is known to the Iraqis, as it is to anyone else who takes the time to think about it. It is essential to retain a sense of proportion. Certainly the distinction between offence and defence in this context is becoming very blurred, and the Labour party will not seek to deny our forces the capability to defend themselves or to realise commonly agreed goals.

The opinions of the military pundits about the intentions of the United States are equally confused. I feel that we should admire the massive deployment of materials and personnel to which the Secretary of State has referred, and recognise it for what it is. There has been speculation that the build-up has been expressly organised for attack; the best evidence that I have been able to obtain, however, suggests that the United States is a considerable way from such a position. Certainly, the views expressed by Secretary of State Baker about the possibility of a new world order arising from the crisis give the lie to the anti-American propaganda advanced by Iraq, and by the minority in the middle east who seek to split the unity of the international community.

No country—whether it be the United Kingdom or the United States, which has worked so hard to secure international consensus at the United Nations and elsewhere—will sacrifice that consensus as sanctions start to bite by taking precipitate military action. The willingness shown by Morocco, with 1,200 troops, by Syria, with 1,100, by Egypt, with 5,000, and by the Saudis, with nearly 70,000, cannot be prejudiced by the folly of taking action without broad international backing. The meeting between Presidents Bush and Gorbachev in Helsinki this weekend will surely explore the role of the UN military staff committee rather than some half-baked, gung-ho-inspired strike.

As Professor Howard pointed out in The Times yesterday, the destruction of Saddam may well be achieved, but it would be achieved at considerable cost. His thoughtful article concludes:

> "On balance the dangers of initiating war—initiating rather than accepting it if forced upon us—are thus much greater than those of remaining at peace."

Our troops will have literally to sweat it out. It will be a game of nerves: we shall have to wait until Saddam cracks, and either attacks or is replaced. It will be a waiting game, and we shall need to ensure that our forces are equipped and supported according to requirements.

Dr. Godman: God forbid that armed conflict should break out in that part of the world, but is my hon. Friend satisfied with what the Secretary of State said about the field hospital? Does he believe that, in the event of conflict, those medical facilities will be adequate to deal with the victims of gas attacks and other severely injured personnel?

Mr. O'Neill: Frankly, I do not know; I am not in a position to have access to such information. However, the respect that I feel for the British forces and those who lead them tells me that they would not put people into the field without the necessary support. If there is any doubt, the fact that my hon. Friend has raised the matter will give the civil servants in the Box, and others, ample reason to reconsider.

We are in favour of giving our troops the support that they need, and we know that there is widespread acceptance of that requirement. Hon. Members who run advice bureaux and visit the clubs in their constituencies this weekend will not be assailed by constituents who want the forces to be withdrawn; they will be approached by the anxious relatives of those whose loved ones are experiencing fear—terror—in the apartments and hotels that are now serving as Iraqi-controlled prisons, or are in uniform, preparing for the worst in some of the most inhospitable conditions on our planet. In the main, they will want and expect us to give our support to ensure that their families are not sold short.

The depth of the anti-Iraqi strength is increasing daily, as is its width. The range of countries, from Europe and around the world, that have sent their forces bears impressive testimony to the almost universal revulsion at the actions of Saddam Hussein. Questions are now being asked about the control of those forces, and the split of responsibilities between the Saudis and the United States is a matter on which we can only speculate. This is not the time, however, to discuss whether the forces should be given blue berets and the kind of United Nations role that we have seen in the past. There is no precedent for that, and I consider it misleading to vest unnecessary and unrealistic expectations in an institution from which we can hope for so much in other respects.

Some feel that there should be a special and specific co-ordinated NATO role. I think that that would be wrong at this time, not least because of the likelihood that Germany and France will not participate. We should not allow ourselves to be taken advantage of through such a diversion.

Inevitably, the United States, by making the largest contribution, will wield the greatest influence. The unity of the opposition to Iraq, however, will require continual nurturing and encouragement from the United Nations. It is to be hoped that its military committee will ultimately provide the international framework within which such exercises could be organised.

We cannot afford to ignore the question raised yesterday by my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) about the operation of "sod's law" in military action. It would be dangerous to anticipate in too precise, neat and tidy a way the next stage in the scenario, but, for us in the House it is a matter of getting Ministers to answer questions. I do not wish to strike a note of discord, but there is deep anxiety about this: at some stage today, the Government must give us some idea of the role played by the United Kingdom in respect of the economic embargo—for instance, the involvement of the Technology and Development Group. While I freely concede that that group is not engaged in the procurement of arms as such, we have observed that the Iraqis have been able to purchase the building blocks—to acquire the capability and the technology—to undertake weapon production on a scale that cannot be tolerated.

Let us have a clearer answer from the Foreign Secretary than we had from the Secretary of State for Defence: there is far too much speculation, and far too much evidence that we have not policed the area harshly enough. I am not trying to divide the House; I am simply asking for greater clarity. Accountability lies at the heart of that exercise.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): May I raise what many Opposition Members consider to be a fundamental problem? It may have been dealt with already; I was briefly absent from the Chamber a few moments ago.

The problem arises when, over a period, a stalemate develops, and our forces are all in place under the auspices of the United Nations and its Security Council. May we have an assurance that our forces will not engage in offensive action when they have not themselves been attacked, and that any action will be authorised by explicit United Nations resolution?

Mr. O'Neill: My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) will be going into that in greater detail later. My hon. Friend has caught me in the last stage of my remarks, but our troops are there, at the express request of the Saudis, to defend them. We are operating there under the auspices of a series of United Nations resolutions. We are not there for offensive purposes as determined at present. My right hon. Friend will refer to this subject in his winding-up speech and will give a better structured answer.

As I said at the beginning of my speech, on the Opposition side of the House we called for a naval blockade. We called for economic sanctions through the United Nations. We support the Government's deployment of forces in the Gulf. We recognise that additional resources may be necessary, but we do not give the Government a blank cheque. As well as information on expenditure, we should like some information on revenue and on what efforts are being made by the Foreign Office to get the sort of assistance from other countries that the United States appears to be receiving, according to this morning's announcement.

Certainly, we have confidence in the Government's military advisers. They have demonstrated their professionalism and expertise. However, it is for politicians and for the House to decide future course of action. War, as Clausewitz said, is "the pursuit of politics by other means".

If other means become nessary the House must have its say. Those who seem to assume that the British people do not want firm and resolute action to be taken to liberate and return our people and other hostages, and to ensure that Saddam is not allowed to get away with this aggression, are not listening to what our constituents are saying.

Article 42 affords the legitimacy for the embargo and for military deployment. We all hope that the sanctions will have the desired effect and that the Iraqis will be forced to withdraw—they certainly have no record of tolerating failures on their side—but that may not be achieved in weeks; it may take longer. We know that our forces can do their job. Let us hope that the House can fulfil its responsibilities to them and to the country by showing the patience and resolution that the task requires. We can show that by supporting the Adjournment of the House this afternoon.

10.32 am

Sir Ian Gilmour (Chesham and Amersham): The hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) struck a chord in the whole House when he talked about amateur strategists and studio war games. I think that the House will agree that the attempted distinction between offensive and defensive weapons is nearly always totally unrealistic.

[Sir Ian Gilmour]

The two impressive speeches from the Front Benches today, by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and the hon. Member for Clackmannan, have reaffirmed the virtual unanimity in the House and throughout the world that Saddam Hussein's aggression was an intolerable act and that he must not be allowed to profit from it.

As is customary, the country which was attacked was much better governed and a far better place than its attacker. Whereas Saddam Hussein's Iraq has strong claims to being the most brutal and savage police state or dictatorship in the world, Kuwait, in which I have—or had—an interest is probably the best governed state in the region. An impressive and unimpeachable testimony to that fact is what happened when Iraq invaded. Saddam Hussein wanted to set up a puppet Government and was totally unable to do so. Not one genuine Kuwaiti came forward. There was not one Kuwaiti Quisling. In the last war I think that there was only one European country of which that was true—Poland—so it is a proud record.

Now Saddam Hussein is systematically wrecking Kuwait. He is behaving like the Mongols did in Baghdad 750 years ago. He is taking the whole place apart, destroying lamp standards and removing traffic lights, quite apart from his appalling behaviour to the people of Kuwait and to the foreign workers and residents there. Clearly he must not be allowed to get away with it.

Obviously he thought he was going to get away with it and, on past form, he had good grounds for thinking so. Only the prompt and decisive action of above all President Bush and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister turned his aggression into a disastrous miscalculation. Probably Saddam Hussein's greatest miscalculation was to forget, or not to notice, that the cold war had ended. At almost any other time in the post-war era he could have played off one superpower against another and he might have got away with it. He cannot do that any more.

The prime task of American and allied diplomacy and strategy must be to ensure that the United States and the Soviet Union remain firmly aligned on this issue. That is a key matter and, so far, the omens are good.

I hope that sanctions will do the trick, although it will take a long time, but plainly we cannot rule out the use of force—after all, the other side has already used it. No one can foresee what will, or should, happen but it is clearly overwhelmingly desirable that the next major act of violence should come from Iraq. An American attack, supported by Britain but not by the United Nations, might become inevitable and we have to face that, but it should be avoided if at all possible. The trouble with surgical strikes is that they are not surgical, or they have not been so far. The American bombing of Tripoli clearly demonstrated that.

The political fallout of such an attack is incalculable. Many of the pro-western Governments in the area might be endangered. We should remember that the pro-western Government in Iraq in 1958 was basically brought down by the attack on Suez two years earlier.

The reasons for caution lie in the middle east's recent history. Many countries and individuals have been equivocal about previous acts of aggression or have condoned them. I certainly plead guilty to that over Iraq's attack on Iran 10 years ago.

The west's previous equivocations and tolerance of blatantly unjustifiable behaviour, which if it had occurred anywhere else in the world would never have been condemned, explains why so many Arabs support Saddam Hussein, even though they loathe him. Having seen what has happened in Palestine since the war—and indeed before it—most Arabs are inevitably suspicious of the west. Western double standards have been too blatant and too sustained for Arabs to be anything else.

If it is wrong for Iraq to annexe Kuwait—which it certainly is—then it was equally wrong for Israel to annexe the Golan Heights, Arab Jerusalem and its surrounding area, to which it has no conceivable right. Yet what did the west do? Nothing. Or rather the Americans did something—they effectively subsidised that annexation for more than 20 years. Similarly they have effectively subsidised the brutal and illegal occupation of the west bank and Gaza for all that time. Women and children have been shot, houses blown up, men deported, land stolen, water stolen, and thousands imprisoned without trial. A far higher proportion of the Palestinian population have been imprisoned by the Israelis than the black population by the South African Government, and the two situations have much in common.

Mr. Stephen Day (Cheadle): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way. Does he not accept that there is a distinct difference between the situation on the west bank and the Gaza strip—however distressing that may be and however understandable the plight of the Palestinians? That occupation came about as the result of an unwarranted attack by Arab nations upon the state of Israel.

Sir Ian Gilmour: That is quite untrue. The 1967 war was begun by an attack on Egypt by Israel. I can only refer my hon. Friend to General Rabin, who was the commander of the forces at the time and therefore might be considered to be fairly authoritative on the subject. He said that he thought that President Nasser had no intention of attacking.

The situations are not exactly the same, but clearly what has been going on—the illegal occupation of Gaza and the west bank—is intolerable, and yet the United States responded to South Africa's actions by bringing sanctions and responded to Israeli actions by giving them dollars—$4 billion per year. It is no wonder that the PLO and so many Palestinians have supported Iraq. I regret their decision deeply and I believe that they were disastrously mistaken, but I also understand it. It may even have been unavoidable. America's behaviour has driven the Palestinians into the arms of a brutal dictator.

It was greatly encouraging to hear James Baker tell Congress last week that America now accepts that regional stability in the middle east must include a settlement of the Palestinian issue. He said that a resolution of the current threat should become the springboard for renewed efforts to resolve all middle east conflicts,

"including the festering conflict between Israel and its Palestinian and Arab neighbours."

That must be right, and I only wish that sentiment had been a greater part of the allied case since the beginning. I dare say that Mr. Peres and much of the Israeli Labour party would agree, but obviously Mr. Shamir and the current right wing Israeli Government will do everything that they can to prevent such an outcome.

The last month has been frustrating for the Israeli Government because it has demonstrated something that many of us have always known—that the idea that Israel is an important American ally is wholly untrue. Israel is an ally that America cannot use. If Israel becomes involved, the whole allied operation will be wrecked, so it is important that Israel be kept out of it. One hopes that the rumours that the Israelis would like to destabilise King Hussein are untrue and that the Americans will prevent anything of that kind happening.

With the tyrannies of eastern Europe and elsewhere coming to an end, and with President de Klerk making courageous and successful efforts to bring a civilised system to South Africa, Israel cannot be allowed to be the odd man out. After Kuwait has been liberated and decency has been restored there, justice must at last be given to the Palestinians.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): The right hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour) is absolutely right in his remarks concerning Israel's position. I was one of the first members of Parliament to enter Israel after the six-day war. Whether or not one likes it, the fact remains that territory not under Israel's control prior to that war is now under its control, and has been since that time. We cannot get away from that. When some of us put it to the Israeli authorities at that time that they were creating a dangerous situation for the future, they said that it was merely a question of using the territory in negotiations to achieve peace and secure boundaries. Some of us warned them then that might not happen, because the longer that Israel remained in those territories, the greater would be the demand from the right wing in Israel for them to be incorporated into the state of Israel. Who can say that we were wrong?

No one is suggesting—certainly not my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn)—that Saddam Hussein's action in entering and taking over Kuwait can be justified. It is only unfortunate that many in the west have only just discovered that Saddam Hussein is a brutal dictator. Some of us have argued that for a long time, and have warned that his actions were such that he should have been condemned by the world, as other dictators should have been condemned by the world.

Yesterday, I raised the question of the destruction of the Kurds by chemical weapons. That did not occur on just one occasion. When it first happened, no one took the slightest notice. The only reason why notice was taken in 1988 was that the Kurds showed television crews what had happened. Saddam Hussein has been operating a policy of destroying the Kurdish population for a long time. Thousands of Kurds have been killed, yet very little was done about that. The United States of America did its utmost to see that the matter was not discussed at the United Nations. That was a disgraceful action and we should not forget it.

Because I made a statement three or four weeks ago that Parliament should be recalled, I received letters saying, "Obviously you are on Saddam Hussein's side." Similarly, I received letters when I commented on the action that the Government allowed to be taken in Gibraltar, saying that I was on the side of the IRA. I have never been on the side of Saddam Hussein, the IRA, or of any force of that kind—and I never will be.

Some of us spent a long time in the forces in the last war. Some of us had very distinguished records, while others of us had not so distinguished records. That does not matter, because we all bear in mind that we lost many of our friends. I shall never forget them. It is emotional for me because I remember them now. They included youngsters with whom I went to school. I have lived on borrowed time, like all of us who were in the forces. I think also of the civilians who were killed. Look what happened to our cities—London, Liverpool, Coventry and Belfast. We should remember the destruction that occurred and the killing of thousands and thousands of innocent civilians.

We had to fight that war, but Hitler was not Saddam Hussein, and Saddam Hussein is not Nasser. At least Nasser genuinely believed in a united Arab nation. Saddam Hussein is not in that category, but that still does not mean that we should want to see war come about in the belief that that is the only answer. I passionately do not believe that it is the only answer. I believe that the answer is to begin to talk and to negotiate.

I am an old shop steward, and whenever I went into a battle, I made certain that I left a door ready to be opened. If you close the door behind you, sometimes you cannot get out of the situation. I believe that we must have a door ready to be opened in the present situation—a door that will give Saddam Hussein some chance of saving some face, so that the problem can be solved by negotiation and not by war. If there is war, who knows where we shall end up? I do not know, and no one else knows. Perhaps the war would be over quickly, like the Galtieri situation.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Heffer: No, I am not giving way. This may well be my last speech in this House. I do not know.

We must talk in order to find a solution without going to war. I agree entirely with my hon. Friend the Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) and with my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield that there should be no question of going to war unless that is agreed by the whole of the United Nations. We should all agree on that if we cannot agree on everything else.

The last point that I want to make concerns the damn hypocrisy of some of those involved. The Secretary of State for Defence says that we stand by the law. I am old enough to remember Suez, when there were campaigns throughout the country using the slogan, "Law, not war". Then, we were, quite rightly, standing by the law, but what has happened in the past in relation to the United States? What law did America call up when it invaded Grenada or Panama? What law did it call up when it undermined the elected president of Chile and helped to get him murdered? What law did it call up when it assisted the Contras in violent means against the Nicaraguan Government? What sort of law is that? That is not law; that is interests. That is imperial interests. What worries me is whether we are going to Saudi Arabia to fight for the rights of the Kuwaitis and the people of Iraq who have been oppressed for so long——

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Still are oppressed.

Mr. Heffer: Yes, they still are oppressed. Where were Conservative Members when the likes of me were working hard to assist those people? Selling weapons.

An American senator has said that if Iraq was only growing carrots, America would not be interested. Of course it would not be. It is a question of oil and oil interests. It is capitalist oil interests. It is imperialist oil interests. That is what worries me. I want peace. I want the people to be free and genuinely free. I do not want us to be rushed into a war because of the oil companies.

Mr. Michael Mates (Hampshire, East): No one could fail to have been moved by the sincerity of the remarks of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer), particularly in the earlier parts of his speech. We may often have disagreed with his sentiments, but never ever have we doubted that he speaks with total sincerity. He holds his views as passionately and as genuinely as we hold ours.

Two wholly admirable things have happened since 2 August. The first has been the Government's response—measured, calm, wise and underlyingly tough—to the invasion of Kuwait. I congratulate my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Defence and the Foreign Secretary, neither of whom have put a foot wrong during this difficult time. They deserve our thanks for the way in which they have handled the crisis. That has been the major factor in explaining to a confused British public what we are doing. That is the message that will go out from a nearly united House during the past two days of debate. It will need to be explained again and again during the coming difficult months.

The second thing that has happened has been the genuineness and totality of the international response. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State listed those countries that had responded in kind to the international call for help for Kuwait. He did not mention the contribution of Greece, and I am sure that that was inadvertent. I was in Greece earlier this week when the frigate Limnos sailed. It was touching to see the pride of ordinary Greek people that they, for the first time since world war two, were taking part in an international call. Turkey's response has also been bold and brave. I hope that it is not too much to ask that, now that we find those two fellow NATO members on the same side with common interests in the dispute, they may be helped to solve some of their own problems.

We must also give credit to the Government for their handling of our relationships in the Gulf during the past decade, in particular our defence relationships with those states with whom we have been close for many years. The Select Committee on Defence was fortunate enough in 1986 to go to Oman to look at exercise Saif Sareea—a reinforcement exercise of massive proportions by the British in response to a call from the sultan for help in accordance with the defence agreement that we have with that country. It was the first time that the Tornados had been flown non-stop from Britain to the middle east, and that was considered a fine achievement then. I have no doubt that it has helped to make the arrangements easier and the path smoother for those who have had to carry out the reinforcements in the past weeks.

But in a way that has been the easy part. It is difficult technically to respond to a crisis, but no one is in any doubt that the job must be done. The service men, civilians, Ministers and Government will get on and to it. From now on I believe that it will get much harder, because we must be prepared for a long haul. Our service men are out there in conditions of acute discomfort. So are the service men of the United States and the others who have responded. How we are to sustain them over the coming months is a difficult logistical matter. Moreover, in the long term, it will also be expensive. Those who were arguing only a month ago for the peace dividend to be doubled or trebled by Christmas must now be eating their foolish words uttered in this place.

Not only will it be difficult to provide a tolerable standard of living for our troops, but we shall have to consider rotating them. Some who will have been there for about five months by Christmas will have to be brought home and others sent in. It will be a complex matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and all in the Ministry of Defence to maintain our commitment at the level that is thought right and, at the same time, to maintain the living conditions, the spares that will be required, training requirements, ammunition, fuel and all the other things that are necessary during what will be a difficult and dangerous period.

I shall not fall into the trap that many others have avoided of being an armchair strategist. I simply point out that there will be a tough time ahead for the Ministry of Defence, the Government and the Chancellor, who, certainly in the short term, will have to find rather more help for the defence budget than he thought when he did his sums at the beginning of the year. I am sure that he will do that with all the relish of his predecessors when they were faced with similar crises.

Naturally we are focused on the one event and the one job that our services have to do at the moment. But this is not a bad moment for some of us to stand up and remind the House of our long-term defence requirements. Just two months ago we had a two-day defence debate. From the Opposition we heard cries of, "Not enough cuts. Why aren't you sending the whole lot home? Why have we still got troops in Germany? Why haven't you wrapped the whole thing up? Everything is over. We do not need them any more." Once again, those are words for eating.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): Why do we need them in Germany?

Mr. Mates: Our troops are performing an important role in Germany and I would put a lot of money on a large slice of them being deployed in the Gulf between now and Christmas. That is why we need them there. There is certainly no room for them in this country. The hon. Gentleman's remark is born of complete and utter ignorance.

The problem remains. My right hon. Friend has had a shot at casting the future shape and size of forces during the next couple of years. He was reluctant to go further than he thought was prudent, and, my goodness me, how right he was. Now we must look at the sort of contingencies out of area and our defensive capability for the rest of the decade.

The one thing that we should say now is that it is even more urgent than it was two months ago that NATO should decide the way in which it believes that Europe needs to be defended over the coming years. Until we have had the options for change from NATO headquarters and from the other European Governments, and until we have discussed those and agreed upon the shape of the residual forces to remain on the continent of Europe, which will be much fewer than they are now—it is the size and shape that matter—we cannot do a sensible job in planning the adequate size, shape and reserve forces so that we can come to the aid of our friends should contingencies arise elsewhere in the future, as they will.

Over the past 30 to 40 years, we have coped with all of those on the back of the major commitment to NATO —we have drawn from that. If, as I believe, the future contribution to NATO is to be much smaller, that will mean that the flexibility to respond quickly and adequately to calls for help inevitably will be much harder to manage, and that is the balance that we must get right in the future shape of our forces.

To that end, I hope that the Government will press our NATO allies to produce a sensible plan for the future defence of Europe, very much sooner than later, so that we can ensure that with our residual forces we will always have the capability to go to the help of friends, as we are doing now so admirably and so well.

Dr. John Gilbert (Dudley, East): As I wish to be punctilious, I should declare the remotest of interests in that I am an unpaid member of the advisory board of Royal Jordanian Airlines. I do not have any shares in that company.

I wholeheartedly support yesterday's speeches by the Prime Minister and my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock)—and as it is some time since I could last say that, I am rather pleased about it. I welcome the fact that the Government are considering sending a contingent of ground troops, which I always thought should be an ingredient of our contribution. I echo what the Secretary of State for Defence said about our troops. I congratulate the Americans on the speed and skill with which they have built up their forces.

Before coming to the main part of my speech, I wish to touch upon a couple of points that have already been raised in the debate. My right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) asked the Secretary of State for Defence about the possible differences in interpretation of Prince Sultan's remarks. Does the Secretary of State think that Prince Sultan's remarks would apply to American seaborne forces, which are not on the territory of Saudi Arabia and therefore could mount a massive air attack and seaborne invasion? Would Prince Sultan's remarks apply to such an operation? I should be grateful if the Foreign Secretary could deal with that point during his reply.

The second point arising out of the speech of the Secretary of State for Defence was his statement that there was no question of an embargo on medical supplies for Iraq, which I fully support. However, I was alarmed that he said nothing about food. In the long run, I do not think that public opinion in Britain, in the remainder of Europe or in north America will endorse the west attempting to starve the Iraqi people into submission. I have no doubt that there will be premature and hyperbolic diatribes from Saddam Hussein claiming that babies are short of milk and that people are starving long before that is the case. However, a deliberate policy to starve the Iraqi people into submission will not work. We must remember what happened immediately after 1945 when the war came to an end: the troops in Germany refused orders not to supply food to the defeated population. Such a policy is not sustainable and I hope that the Foreign Secretary will assure us that food, as well as medical supplies, is exempt from the blockade.

Thirdly, I wish to touch on a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer), who has left the Chamber. He referred to oil supplies, which is one of the crucial elements in the current position. It would be a mistake to say that we are defending oil supplies in the interests of the oil companies. If the oil supplies in the Gulf are destroyed and the western world loses 40 per cent. of its supply, the oil companies will not suffer—they never do. Those who will suffer will be the old-age pensioners and the single-parent families in the constituencies of every hon. Member; it is their heating bills that will rise. Therefore, there is nothing wrong with our being in the middle east to protect our access to oil supplies.

I cannot imagine Iraq provoking an armed clash at this moment. I cannot even perceive it sending aircraft into Saudi air space. I cannot perceive it trying to provoke a confrontation on the waters of the Persian Gulf. I am afraid that we are committed to a long haul—that is, if we do not rely on starvation. It could be 12 months before the Iraqi economy finally grinds to a halt. There is a great danger of the west focusing exclusively on Saddam Hussein. I hope that no wild people in any country are trying to assassinate him behind the scenes. I do not want him to become a martyr. If he falls, who will follow? As my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East said yesterday, it could be someone a great deal more unpleasant even than the unpleasant Saddam Hussein.

If it is a question not just of getting rid of the leadership but of getting rid of the Baath socialist regime, how do we do that without sending tanks all the way to Baghdad? I cannot imagine that the Government or the Americans would conceive such a policy. Surely our objective must be not, in the words of the Foreign Secretary, just to wipe the smile off Saddam Hussein's face, but to ensure that no one in Iraq—Saddam Hussein or any successor—will in future have the power or the wish to deploy nuclear, biological, chemical or conventional weapons. Whoever is in power in Iraq, there will be a burning sense of grievance about the lack of access to the Persian Gulf. Whoever is in power, there will be a continuing bitter envy of the wealth of Iraq's more fortunate neighbouring states. Both those sentiments are widely understood and supported throughout the Arab world, not least in countries whose leaderships are supporting United Nations actions.

I greatly welcome the call by the Soviet Foreign Secretary Mr. Shevardnadze for a middle eastern peace conference. It is a great opportunity in this crisis. It should deal with at least four matters. First, there must be some territorial adjustments. I will not speculate on what they should be, but it is clear that the territorial boundaries drawn up, almost in a fit of oversight, by imperial powers after the first world war are not tolerated by the people in that area. Secondly, there must be—and I recognise that it is easier said than done—a regime for the inspection and the control of nuclear, biological and chemical weapons throughout the middle east. That will be worth quite a high price. If we seek to impose such a controlling regime on Saddam Hussein, the Israelis also will have to accept control and inspection of whatever facilities they may possess, as will President Gaddafi. We cannot expect the Israelis to lower their guard towards the east and also towards the west without some assurance in both directions.

Thirdly—and The Times sneered at this the other day, and I was glad that the Foreign Secretary picked up the point—we should try to achieve a self-denying ordinance on sales of conventional armaments from the major arms-exporting countries dealing with that part of the world. I have said that many times in defence debates. Not many people have paid much attention to the argument, but now that we are looking over the edge of the abyss it is possible that something along the lines that I have suggested could be done. However, it would have to embrace not only the United States, the United Kingdom, France and the Soviet Union but China, Brazil, South Africa and other arms-exporting countries.

Fourthly, I think that there is a need for an Arab development fund through which the rich Arab states would commit themselves to major cross-border transfers of wealth. Those transfers would be based not on the political attitudes of the recipient countries but on the needs of the inhabitants of those countries. Such commitments should be made for 10 or 20 years ahead.

I would rather see a neutered and controlled Saddam Hussein—one whose people's long-standing grievances were being addressed by the international community—than a Saddam Hussein who was a martyr figure. I am confident that negotiations are going on behind the scenes, even if Her Majesty's Government are not party to them. I hope very much that that is so, anyway. Negotiations can have a hope of success only if sanctions are persisted with and military preparedness is maintained. We all pray not, but military means may have to be used. It is for that reason that I shall be supporting the Government this afternoon.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): The debate has proved how right it was that Parliament should be recalled. I was never in doubt from the beginning that Parliament would need to be recalled. The only question was when that should be. I think that the Government have achieved exactly the right timing. They have given an opportunity for the House to have a first-hand report on matters that are of great concern to us all. It has been provided with the opportunity for hon. Members to make some wide-ranging speeches. If the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) were in his place, I would say to him that, although I disagreed with a great deal of what he said this morning, I hope that we have not heard his last speech in this place.

I am sure that all of us were glad to hear the speech of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, which began the continuation of the debate this morning. I thank him and, through him, all the British forces who are involved in what has been, in every way, a most convincing, prompt and correct response. I say to my right hon. Friend that our thanks should be conveyed to those who have been involved in the diplomatic discussions, which will continue to take place. Those involved should be thanked for the part which they have played. I refer especially to what has been done in the United Nations and the contribution that Sir Crispin Tickell has made so forcefully. That deserves to be recognised across the Floor of the House. I am sure that it is agreed by all my right hon. and hon. Friends and by most Opposition Members that Ministers, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and all others involved, deserve the thanks of the House for their handling of a difficult and unexpected situation.

It would be wrong for us to attempt to magnify out of proportion our own contribution. We are not the only country involved. We must recognise what has been done by America and President Bush, and the part that American forces are playing in the defence of Saudi Arabia. The reduction of the military threat in the Gulf is of enormous importance; there is no gainsaying that.

The debate provides us with the opportunity to make it clear to the country generally, and to the individuals who are involved, that the hostages are not forgotten. I have never been more disgusted by anything that I have seen on television than the sight of Saddam Hussein fondling the heads of the children he was using as human shields. He was like some storekeeper fondling the wares on display in his bazaar. I hope that that is understood by those who were responsible for that disgraceful abuse of human rights. I refer to the rights of our own people and all others who are involved. Hostage-taking and hostage exploitation have no part in international relations at any level. The sooner that they are eliminated the better it will be for us all.

I want to be as brief as I can, so I shall concentrate on only one theme, from which some of the preceding speeches may have diverged slightly. I wish to focus on the overriding logic of the position that faces us. We are all agreed throughout the world that aggression must not succeed, and that means that Kuwait must be liberated. There is no room for compromise and no room for negotiations. We all agree, too, that the primary means of achieving that objective should be the embargo and the sanctions which the United Nations has authorised. They must be made effective. There must be a solid embargo. There must be no loopholes and no evasion. We all hope that those means will bring Saddam Hussein to his senses, so that he understands that the world is against him and that the fruits of his aggression must be given up.

All of us know, however, that there is a limit to the period during which sanctions can be expected to achieve their objective. There may well come a time when we have to say that sanctions have not worked. If that time comes, clearly the military option cannot be ruled out. It is important that from this moment on we do not let Saddam Hussein forget that. The alternative is too awful to contemplate. It would mean the humiliation, defeat and collapse of the United Nations structure. If Saddam Hussein gets away with his aggression, we are back to the unpleasant experiences that led to the collapse of the League of Nations. We cannot allow that to happen again. The credibility of the United Nations is on the line. I believe that the potential use of force is already embodied in the resolutions and articles that the United Nations has as its authority. There can be no compromise about that.

Perhaps it has not been stated as clearly as it should that the resolution of the crisis which was caused by Iraq lies in the hands of Iraq. Iraq can withdraw from Kuwait. It can agree to submit to international law and order. The people of Iraq must never be allowed to forget that. We may think —we may be right—that Saddam Hussein is deaf to reason and that he is a man with whom it is impossible to argue. We should not take it for granted, however, that everyone in Iraq is immune to reason. I hope very much that when my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary contributes to the debate he will say something about the propaganda war, which has been going on for some time. There is an urgent need to put across through the media in Britain, and internationally through the BBC World Service, the message that none of us wants to be forced into war and that it is up to Iraq to ensure that that does not happen.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): I shall first tell the House of the disgust and anger on Tyneside at the murder of Douglas Croskery and the inability to recover his body after a decent period. That anger persists; it is real and can be sensed in any conversation in any club, pub and anywhere where people congregate on Tyneside. There is a strong feeling that those who perpetrated that crime and were compliant in it should be brought to justice.

I entirely agreed with the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) and the Secretary of State for Defence when they paid tribute to our forces stationed in the Gulf. The conditions in which they work, the atmosphere, the desert and the humidity corrode men and machines. Therefore, it is obvious that individual machines and men cannot be expected to serve there for long periods, but will need to be rotated. The remarks of the hon. Member for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates) about further deployment and rotation, and their cost, need careful consideration by the House. I was a little concerned when the Defence Secretary seemed to imply that all those costs could be found within the existing defence budget. As a member of the Select Committee on Defence I shall have ample opportunity to question him on his thoughts and pursue the matter, and I shall do so.

I was deeply concerned this morning to see the reports of the potential for cholera among the refugees in no man's land. I welcome the additional £2 million that the Prime Minister announced yesterday, but my impression is that aircraft, trucks, and people to pilot both, are needed more than money. We must get the residents of the Indian sub-continent, Egypt and Palestine back to their countries and we must get supplies to them. There is ample evidence to suggest that supplies exist but are not reaching the proper destinations. Red Crescent and the Red Cross have made appeals, to which we should respond as a nation and call on our European partners, particularly those not making a great military contribution, to weigh in and do something quickly.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): I am grateful to the hon. Member. Does he agree that the refugee problem on the border of Jordan is perhaps the greatest threat to the stability of that country, which has been a true friend to us in the past?

Mr. McWilliam: I agree with the hon. Gentleman and feel particularly sorry for Jordan, which has an awful strain to bear. King Hussein has done his best. He tried to mediate in circumstances in which it was virtually impossible. He has been rebuffed and left with a problem on his doorstep that is not his responsibility—Jordan could not afford to deal with it anyway.

I do not understand why the Technology Development Group has not already been closed down. Its doors should be locked and barred, and the people sent out. I hope that when the Foreign Secretary replies he will have told his people in the Box to have that done so that he has news to give us. Frankly, there is no excuse for the continued existence of that organisation in London; it should be removed forthwith.

I hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will make an early announcement about a windfall profit tax on the oil companies. I have grave suspicions that movements in the price of petrol at the pumps do not truly reflect the reality of what is happening to the world price of oil.

Although we face a terrible situation, the potential for good is there. For the first time, both the Warsaw pact countries and the western countries are united in the United Nations in condemning naked aggression. For the first time, a truly international blockade has been set up and, for the first time, can be properly policed. Great good could come from that.

I echo the words of my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock), the Leader of the Opposition yesterday, and agree that good can come only if the practical politics of the crisis are explored as well as the legal niceties. We must bring the rest of the United Nations along with us and not be prepared to take unilateral action. That being said, we should not give any comfort to Saddam Hussein by suggesting that military means will not be employed if the sanctions are unsuccessful. We should make it plain to him that we shall seek to use military means if the sanctions are unsuccessful and he does not remove his forces from Kuwait. We should put that beyond any doubt.

The crisis focuses our attention on the chemical and biological warfare talks and the nuclear non-proliferation treaty renewal talks. It shows the urgency for concluding treaties on both. It shows the urgency, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, East (Dr. Gilbert) said, for a proper and intrusive inspection regime, particularly, but not only, in that region. It underlines the fact that dragging our heels, as we did on the chemical talks a couple of years ago, was not the right decision then.

I hope that the House will not rise today without expressing its thanks to all those people who have worked so hard to get the place ready for us to hold this most important debate. I was here on Monday when the place was a shambles; it was marvellous when we came in yesterday and, on behalf of us all, I thank those responsible.

Sir Michael Marshall (Arundel): I am glad to follow the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam) and I shall make specific suggestions about giving assistance to international refugees on the ground which follow directly from some of his points.

I hope that the House will understand if I make my remarks today in the context of work within the Inter-Parliamentary Union, which I hope to demonstrate is of direct relevance in trying to involve the maximum number of parliamentary colleagues from both sides of the House and the other place in seeking to carry forward the continued resolutions of the IPU. Those resolutions concern the development of democratic institutions and, above all, the peaceful resolution of conflict.

I wish to report to the House immediately that the British group of the Inter-Parliamentary Union has joined the IPU in Geneva in sending resolutions to the Speaker of the national assembly of Iraq calling for the effective adoption of UN resolutions, involving withdrawal from Kuwait and the release of hostages.

When we consider the background, one of the first things we should try to do is to understand precisely the democratic position in Kuwait, about which there has been some rather loose talk of a condemnatory nature which does not fairly reflect on the true history and ambitions of Kuwait.

You, Mr. Speaker, will recall that, as part of our work in encouraging democratic development, in 1983 you received the Speaker of the Kuwaiti National Council in a period when Kuwait was a member for 18 years, during the past quarter of a century, of the IPU.

There has since been a hiccup and that national council was suspended in 1986. But last June there were general elections in Kuwait and in July the general secretary of that council applied to the IPU to seek reaffiliation to membership. So the burgeoning process of return to democracy in Kuwait was cut short, as were many aspects of life in that country, by the appalling violations of Saddam Hussein and the Iraqi forces at the beginning of August.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East) rose——

Sir M. Marshall: I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman because I am anxious to keep to the spirit of the 10-minute speech rule which comes into operation shortly.

What can we do to try to foster contacts and dialogue not only with Kuwait but with all the other Arab countries that stand four square with us now? We are planning, through the offices of the IPU, to bring forward a visit that we had planned to make to the United Arab Emirates on the return of the House, and to add to that visit visits to neighbouring territories, subject to consultations already in hand with Her Majesty's Government and leaders of the Opposition parties.

In addition, at the IPU conference in Uruguay next month we shall not only be counting heads but taking the opportunity to hold discussions with other countries directly affected by the crisis. Recognising that there are some countries with which we have no diplomatic relations, we now have an opportunity to pursue relations with countries with which there is no direct Government contact. I will not specify the countries concerned, but hon. Members will appreciate that there will be opportunities to open dialogue with some countries with which we have had difficulties and in which the present situation perhaps allows new initiatives to be taken in the wider international and bilateral interest.

All such measures will take time and will have to be deployed as the situation develops. I am concerned about what we can do in the short term, and I stand four square with the thrust of the debate and what has been said from both Front Benches. I, too, wish to consider the plight of the hostages and refugees. I hope that when he replies to the debate, the Foreign Secetary will give a situation report on our nationals and the progress that has been made in achieving their release.

I wish to consider a wider aspect in relation to the international hostages who, as the hon. Member for Blaydon said, are in no man's land. I make my remarks in the context of much of the thinking that is going on in parliamentary circles, in the IPU and the UN, about ways in which the so-called peace dividend can be employed and how the military establishment of many countries can channel their resources for disaster relief.

That whole issue was aired at a conference in London in July. Countries are increasingly considering the matter because it is a way in which east-west dialogue can consider, for example, the whole question of what happens to forces from within former Warsaw pact countries and the way in which they can be channelled to provide effective assistance, and I shall make a few suggestions on the subject.

In view of that background, we should use NATO as our natural link and offer facilities through NATO—through the direct link that should be established with the UN disaster relief organisation—to seek agreement for the provision of assistance on the ground. I am thinking in terms of the military's access to communications and transport and its inbuilt facilities for the supply of medicine and food.

Perhaps we could look to NATO's secretary-general to convene a meeting, under the civil emergency procedures that are part of NATO's statutory procedures, to provide an opportunity to maximise the immediate deployment of people and resources to those from many countries now in Jordan who are grievously affected.

We should also seek, through dialogue with other parliamentarians, parallel meetings with Warsaw pact and other non-CSCE countries to see what part of their military facilities could provide that type of civil resource. All can play a part, but it is obvious that in such a wider international collaboration there could be special opportunities for countries such as Germany and Japan, where the inhibitions placed on them for the provision of direct military forces on constitutional grounds could be set aside in respect of the type of aid and direct assistance to which I am referring.

Under the United Nations disaster relief organisation we could, in using the military in the way that I am describing, introduce urgent steps to airlift relief supplies, and perhaps they could be dropped near to the refugee areas in Jordan. I support the suggestion, made earlier in the debate, that such facilities should be used as part of the airlift, which I trust we can deploy, to bring people out of the area.

Perhaps we could look to Cyprus, by agreement with the Government of that country, and the use of the British bases there, to provide a staging post, not only in the relief process but to get people out of the affected area as an interim step to returning them to their countries of origin.

In those ways, there will be oportunities not only for us to be seen to be acting in concert, but for us to work within the wider concept of the United Nations decade of international disaster relief, which began this year. I hope that we can move towards some plan and progress, which may be discussed when we have meetings at the United Nations special session with the IPU on 4 October and when the overall review takes place at the United Nations international day for natural disaster reduction on 10 October.

I have deliberately sought to be as brief as possible. I have used only headlines to put forward the way in which my mind is working. However, I am also reflecting the views of the officers and of those members of the executive of the IPU whom I have had the opportunity to consult.

If we can provide a peace dividend such as I have suggested, we shall begin to move to something that will have lasting value in the long term and that will also meet the immediate and desperate needs in the short term.

11.35 am

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): Like the hon. Member for Arundel (Sir M. Marshall), I will speak with headings. We have 10 minutes each, so I will not develop some of his points that are worth developing. I hope that he will forgive me.

I am glad that the House has been recalled. I believe that it should have been recalled earlier, given the serious events in the Gulf. It is right that the Government should report to the House of Commons and that we should carry out our job of questioning and probing the Executive. I want to do that briefly.

On the major issue, I will vote for the Adjournment, but I will vote on matters as they are. As events develop—and they will—it may well be a different matter. I can only make a judgment on matters so far and I will vote on that basis.

There are two issues on which I can touch only briefly. I have recently come back from India, Hong Kong and western Asia. Two matters arise there. It is not my scene, but I detected that there is a strong growth of Muslim fundamentalism. If we act wrongly with our forces and in the United Nations, we may generate a strength of feeling throughout the middle east and more widely that will undo our good intentions. When we look at the world from this country we sometimes do not understand that. I certainly did not. We ignore that at our peril.

The other issue is the question of the hostages. The Indians are very concerned about the hostages. Many suggestions have been put to the Foreign Secretary and to others. I hope that the Commonwealth can do something. If the Commonwealth is meaningful, with the Bangladeshis, with the Indians and with others, we could co-ordinate actions. It would be worth while for the Commonwealth and something that we could do. The scenes on the Jordanian border are dreadful.

I had prepared a great deal of stuff on this subject, but it will have to wait. The Kurds are another issue to consider in the next steps, when the possibility of war is over. We in this country have much to answer for over the years on the way in which we have treated the Kurds and on the redrawing of borders, and I hope that we shall look at that.

I want to raise briefly a number of issues that are, more precisely, for the Secretary of State for Defence. We are full of praise for the services, as we should be. Little of the Army is in the Gulf, but the Navy and the RAF are there. There will be a long wait. I hope that thought is being given to rest and recreation for the services out there, as it is an inhospitable part of the world. I served in the middle east for a long time during the war. Rest and recreation seem to be the last thing that people were worried about at the time, although the troops went there for months and even years on end. I understand that the Navy goes down to Mombasa, but what will be done about the others? I hope that the services are giving thought to that.

One technical problem that the Air Force had in the desert was sand. Sand got into 100 octane petrol when aircraft had to land in the desert. I was surprised to learn that 12 of our modern aircraft in the Gulf have had to return home because of the problem of sand in the turbines. I do not know whether that is true, but it has been said. That surprises me in view of all the research that we have done and of the aircraft that we have provided for Saudi Arabia. I hope that a lot of thought is being given to that.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Sod's law.

Mr. Rees: It may be sod's law, but the poor chap in the aeroplane is the one who has to suffer.

We have not had a satisfactory response on the subject of command and control. The right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) was funny with my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) when he asked about orders and terms of engagement. Of course, once the troops have landed, a second lieutenant's job is not to question but to fire his gun. However, at the beginning, someone should ask what we are doing and what our purpose is. Yesterday the noble Lord Bramall, former Chief of the Defence Staff, raised this issue. He said:

"there will have to be a proper chain of command with a good, experienced commander-in-chief to take charge of implementing the general strategy. We cannot win battles by committees, let alone by the military committee of the United Nations."

That is certainly true. He continued.

"Once the political guidelines and policy on the use of force have been established at governmental level and in the United Nations, the commander-in-chief, whoever he is—and he would have to be an American—and his subordinates must be allowed to fight their battle".

All this seems obvious. He went on:

"our Chief of Defence Staff or one of the chiefs of staff should be sent to satisfy himself—[Official Report, House of Lords, 6 September 1990; Vol 521, c. 1833-34.]

not that the United States knows what it is doing—I do not like this patronising attitude to the United States—but to get everything clear. The United States is in charge and it has the forces. It could decide whether to take back Kuwait.

The Secretary of State for Defence told us that 20 nations are sending forces, which made me think that there are too many ships in the Gulf. Whether there are enough soldiers is another matter. Lord Bramall raised an important point. The Secretary of State for Defence sloughed off a question from my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) about what was said by General Schwarzkopf and the Saudi commander-in-chief. Command must be clear. I know that old men are supposed to forget, but I have never forgotten the cock-up at Salerno. Books are written about it now, but it was clear at the time that there was a cock-up. I should like to know who was in charge.

Sir Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): No one.

Mr. Rees: The hon. Gentleman was probably there, and knows. Nothing that I have heard today makes me feel that it is any different in the Gulf today. I want to know who is in charge of the control of aircraft when they are airborne, and who allocates forces. It would be the first time in history if all this were being done properly, but something must be done about command.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East spoke of the British forces in Kuwait in 1961. A few years later, when I was a Minister with responsibility for the Army and the RAF, I learnt that when our soldiers got there, they could not operate because they had gone far too quickly into a hot climate. Thank God that there was not a war. Somebody had better not leave it too late, or we shall repeat the situation of 1961.

I am not satisfied with the command and control aspect. I do not want this to be left until something goes wrong and then to hear from the Government that steps will be taken. Steps must be taken now. I hope that there will be a long period of peace, but I do not think that there will. The Americans are in charge, and they will take out Kuwait. There will be a landing in Kuwait that will not be under the control of the Saudis because it will be from the sea with the marines. If that happens, do not tell us; I do not want to know that. I want to know that the chiefs of staff are discussing it.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): The Minister does not know.

Mr. Rees: If he does not know, that is a different matter.

I wanted to mention command and control because I have not heard anything satisfactory about it yet. I hope that I will not be treated with the same sleight of hand as my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East or the clever remark that was made by the leader of the Liberal Democrats.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): It is always a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Morley), with his experiences of the past. I could not agree more that command and control is an important aspect of the problem.

I propose to say a few words about that, but first I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on his speech and on the manner in which he has handled his responsibilities in the past few weeks. Rarely in British history have our defence and foreign policies been conducted in such harmony. Further, they have matched the hour, have been carried out efficiently, calmly and without bombast and with much patience and understanding. We owe a debt to my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Defence and for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for the way in which they have conducted the policies in the past few weeks.

We received an assurance yesterday from my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister that our objective in furtherance of the United Nations resolution is to remove Iraqi forces from Kuwait, if possible without resort to armed conflict. At the back of our minds are the awful lessons we had to learn the painful way during the 1930s and 1940s of dictators who, under one pretext or another, seized territories or gained breathing space before launching into further adventures. All those points were extensively developed yesterday, and I refer to them only because I wish to give my unequivocal support for the Government's approach to the crisis.

The right hon. Member for Dudley, East (Dr. Gilbert) hinted that we are probably in for a long haul, and he may be right. Whatever happens, whether it is months, a year, or more, we shall as an alliance be exposed to stresses and strains. There is the question of compensation for the impact of sanctions, and it is to be hoped that international action will be taken to help remedy or alleviate the problems of the less-developed and poorer nations involved in this international exercise.

The other source of friction that I should like to refer to concerns command and control—the possible friction that would weaken the cohesion of the alliance and particularly the military contribution of western European nations unless command and control is properly organised. There has already been criticism from the United States about the European effort, with which it is disappointed. Such criticism is not unusual. I have been involved in the NATO assembly for the past 10 years, and over the past few years there has been criticism from the United States that Europe is not playing its fair part in its contribution to the NATO alliance and that the burden should be shared more fairly. It is not surprising that that criticism should be made in this crisis.

I am not criticising the efforts of our European allies. Many had what they considered to be perfectly valid reasons for their initially cautious military response. Some wanted to get their nationals out of Kuwait and Iraq before making any military commitments. Others, such as Germany, had consitutional reasons. France, after a slower start, is matching the United Kingdom's military contribution. Other countries feel that under the present arrangements their contributions would be far too small to have any significant effect.

The Western European Union, which worked successfully during the Iran-Iraq conflict in the Gulf, took three weeks before meeting formally to co-ordinate the military response of the western European nation states that are members of WEU. It might have been met sooner, but it has met, its co-ordination role is well under way and we should not sneeze at it.

It is difficult to define clearly the extent to which WEU has an identity in the present circumstances. I noted the way in which Ministers who attended the WEU meeting on 21 August went straight to the European Community meeting that afternoon. Therefore it is not surprising that on 22 August The Times commented:

"this underlined the view held by some European countries that the union is the EC's substitute for a defence policy."

By contrast, on 23 August, two days after the WEU had met, the Financial Times more robustly stated:

"the WEU has been much derided in the past as a superfluous body but, on this occasion, it has proved an essential forum for defining and deciding Europe's security interests."

A great deal of co-ordination has clearly gone on. One's impression is that much of what is being done effectively is being done through NATO in preference to the WEU. NATO's political committee is said to have been meeting almost daily since the crisis began. On the other hand, we know that there are problems with NATO. France's reluctance to accept NATO as an instrument of military planning still gets in the way of NATO holding meetings of its chiefs of staff.

We have not yet established in western Europe the proper organisation to enable us to do more than co-ordinate our activities. Before this crisis is out, we in western Europe will need to establish plans to do something more than co-ordinate our activities. We must consider whether the European forces should be placed under a joint command to meet this emergency. If it is too late to do that, we ought to instruct our Ministers to think about what might be done to meet future emergencies outside the NATO area.

The significance of NATO is that it has a properly integrated command structure. It is not an alliance of nations that co-ordinate their military plans from time to time when a crisis arises. NATO has an integrated permanent command, in permanent session, and it knows what its objectives are. If the WEU cannot get its act together, we shall have to consider whether NATO's remit ought to be extended to include what hitherto has been outside its area of responsibility. I am sure that if we do not do that, the European Community will step in, and that is the last thing that I would want to happen.

Another defence issue has a direct bearing on our own capabilities. In July the Government published a valuable document, "Options for Change". Hon. Members will recall that it outlined broadly the Government's plans to reduce the level of expenditure on defence and to change the structure of defence in the light of changing circumstances in Europe and the improved relationship with the Soviet Union. Implicit in the Government's thinking is the belief that if NATO's role is to be diminished, the continued instability of the world will demand other defence structures, or at least modifications to existing defence structures, that will enable western Europe to play its part in keeping the peace and defending its legitimate interests, not just in Europe but outside Europe, too. I think that the House gave its blessing to the general thrust in "Options for Change". Our armed forces, particularly the Army, would be smaller. They would play a reduced role on the continent and would be more mobile. Our armed forces would be more capable of operating overseas, well outside the NATO area.

To those who wondered why the plans were not more far reaching, the Government argued that they did not know where or when the next threat to our security might come from. They argued that we live in an unstable world —certainly in Europe, let alone elsewhere—and that therefore it was best to be prudent. How right my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was to adopt that view. The question that I ask the Government to answer in this debate is how their thinking stands now. My view is that the Government got it about right, provided that they make it clear that these smaller, lighter, more mobile forces will not always be able adequately to meet some of the threats that might yet occur, let alone the one that faces us today, especially if we do not co-operate with our allies in reshaping the forces that we know need to be reshaped.

Any changes that we make to our forces must be as a result of full discussion and co-operation with our allies, and that also applies to any changes that they may make. Otherwise we shall be working in isolation, and if we work in isolation we in Europe will be found wanting and unable to play our full part in helping to preserve the peace.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): The key question that has come to the fore today is the question of who is in command of British and other foreign troops deployed in Saudi Arabia and the Gulf. So far we have had no satisfactory answer to that question. I hope that the Foreign Secretary will say more about it when he winds up the debate; certainly, with my colleagues on the Select Committee on Defence, I shall seek further information when the Committee meets this afternoon.

As a number of hon. Members have pointed out, Saddam Hussein did not suddenly turn into an aggressive tyrant on 2 August 1990. Hussein has been in power in Iraq for a long time: as a matter of fact, he came to power in the same year as our own beloved Prime Minister—and, as Labour Members are well aware, that was a very long time ago.

During that period, countless Iraqis have been imprisoned or killed; thousands of Kurds have been killed, many by chemical weapons; and millions of people have perished as a result of the Iraqi invasion of Iran. Throughout that time, the west has turned a blind eye to the excesses of the Iraqi regime in the interests of trade —including the arms trade, as my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) pointed out earlier. I fear, therefore, that the debate contains an element of humbug.

Many hon. Members—especially, perhaps, Conservative Members—have talked about the principles of international law and the rights of small nations. Let us face up to the rather uncomfortable fact that, but for the oil factor, western Governments would have sat on their hands and the Kuwaitis would have gone the same way as the Kurds. The House should resolve to press for higher standards in the future conduct of international affairs and idealism. If nothing else comes out of this crisis, that at least will be an important step in the right direction.

Having put that on record, let me say that I wholeheartedly welcome the response of the world community—not only the response of the western democracies, but the significant response of the vast majority of Arab Governments, the Soviet Union and the entire United Nations—in confronting the intolerable aggression that has undoubtedly been employed in Kuwait. Let me add, however, that the world community really must keep a grip on the situation through the United Nations. The House must not allow the Prime Minister to indulge her instinct for brawling when British lives and interests are at stake, and when there are still other ways of dealing with the position. I must express my relief and gratitude in regard to the measured tone of her speech yesterday.

I am also worried by the possibility that the United States and the United Kingdom may seek to force the pace and raise the stakes. I am uneasy about American talk of a long-term United States role in a new middle eastern security framework. I doubt whether such a presence would be accepted by the Arabs—especially against a background of the west having deliberately sought for many decades to divide and destabilise the Arab world as a matter of calculated policy.

As a number of hon. Members on both sides of the House have pointed out, the principal instrument of that policy has been the power and expansion of the state of Israel. In the circumstances, no one should be surprised that many Palestinians believe, however mistakenly, that the United States forces in the region could pose an even greater threat than the Iraqi regime.

That may seem perverse when viewed from a British, European or North American perspective, but, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if you or I were a resident of the west bank or Gaza—after 23 years of foreign military rule and 1,000 days of brutal repression of the Intifada—we could be forgiven for raising an eyebrow when the principal sponsor of that aggressor state reacts in such spectacular fashion to an Arab aggressor a few hundred miles further east.

[Mr. John Home Robertson]

We have taken those dual standards a stage further when the United States restores arms supplies to Israel and the United Kingdom cuts ministerial contacts with the Palestinians while they and their children are still in a plight identical to that of the people of Kuwait. That is part of the historical background of western malice and duplicity which has created an environment in which a person like Saddam Hussein can come to power. We must recognise the degree of suspicion about western motives which means that any ill-judged move by the United States or its allies in that region could play straight into the hands of Saddam Hussein.

If we jump the United Nations gun we could rally people throughout the Arab world to the Iraqi cause—that is the risk, and it is a serious risk. The Foreign Secretary and all his officials in the Foreign Office should be well aware of that risk from their long experience of Arab affairs. We should be urging appropriate caution on our friends in the United States of America. They should be doing everything possible to work with friendly forces in the middle east. I cannot see the sense of driving someone like King Hussein further into the arms of the Iraqi regime ,as seems to be happening just now.

The caution that I am urging there is the caution advocated by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition in his important speech yesterday. We need scrupulous adherence to the resolutions and to the proceedings of the United Nations. By all means let us reserve the right to use force, but let us try to keep this international team together—it can and should be done. It is imperative that this international campaign be maintained as a genuine and credible United Nations undertaking, with the maximum possible Arab participation.

This is no time or place for a military ego trip by western politicians. There is far too much at stake. There are the lives of British service men, facing the threat of chemical warfare, and the lives of British and foreign hostages. I was greatly relieved this morning to hear that five-week-old baby girl, born to a couple of my constituents in Kuwait just before Iraq moved in, has arrived safely back in Britain today with her mother and twin five-year-old brothers. Her father, Derek Wright, is still in Kuwait and his parents are still there because his mother does not want to leave her elderly husband in those circumstances. Many people are still being held hostage in Kuwait and Iraq and it would be appalling if such people were to become embroiled in any hostilities if that could be avoided.

Apart from the lives at risk, we should remember our long-term interests in the middle east, both political and economic. I therefore appeal most sincerely to the Government to keep in step with the United Nations and to let sanctions work if it is at all possible. Certainly, let us keep military options open, but for goodness sake, "ca' canny"—to use a Scottish expression—and resist the temptation to indulge in reckless rhetoric which could make the situation worse for our people in that part of the world.

This international campaign can succeed with a bit of discipline on the part of the west. It it does, it will be a magnificent precedent to enable the United Nations to confront tyrants and aggressors in many parts of the world in future. It is said that every cloud has a silver lining. If we can set a precedent in these weeks which can establish the United Nations as an effective world policeman to deal with tyrants, aggressors and evil regimes throughout the world, we shall have achieved a great deal. Let us hope that we can follow that through.

Mr. Robert Hayward (Kingswood): I thank you for giving me the opportunity to speak, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The House will well understand if I consider the issue from a slightly different perspective from that of many hon. Members, and I apologise now for my absence at the end of the debate. Unfortunately, I have to return to a long-standing constituency commitment.

It will prove impossible to summarise in 10 minutes the views and comments that have been made to me by friends and relatives of hostages, because there are as many views, from one extreme to the other, as there are friends and relatives. I again thank my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister for her kind comments yesterday, and the Copleys, the Brookes and British Airways, and all the helpers who have participated so enthusiastically over the past few weeks in the provision of the Gulf Support Group service. I was particularly pleased by the measured comments made during the debate of the past day and a half. On many occasions over the past few weeks, the media have given the impression that the British nation and politicians worldwide were dashing gung ho into war. Clearly that has been laid to rest by the majority of the speeches that we have heard.

In terms of the provision of the helpline and Gulf Support Group service, I pay tribute also to the many voluntary agencies that came forward, including the Samaritans, Childline, Bereavement Services, Cruse, Red Cross, and many others. However, the experience of the past few weeks has convinced me that when a problem arises that is general and not specific, we still cannot cope. Having been a Parliamentary Private Secretary in the Department of Transport at the time of the Lockerbie, Kegworth, King's Cross and Clapham disasters, it depresses me that the public believe that we are capable of providing support services at the drop of a hat, the fall of a plane, or the crash of a train. Unfortunately, that is not the case.

If one speaks to social services departments in county after county, they say that they are ready to provide services—but we had no evidence of that for two weeks. We had to kick-start the social services in most counties into operation, because the relatives and friends of hostages are spread throughout the country. There is also a general supposition—as I heard again on television this morning—that the emotional problems connected with both depression and elation affect only those returning to this country. However, anyone who has been at an airport and observed the families of returning hostages will know that concern and depression is not restricted to them, and that many of the most traumatised people are those waiting for their relatives to arrive. I hope that all services will recognise that fact. There is no shadow of doubt that the most traumatised person at Heathrow airport last Sunday was not someone returning from Kuwait or Baghdad but the father-in-law of a woman who was returning, but whose son—her husband—was not. I ask all services to direct their thoughts to those people, too.

Since the events of 2 August, there has been much criticism of the action of the Foregin Office and of British embassies in the Gulf. Although my comments are relayed in a good spirit, I hope that all those about whom I comment will consider the observations that are being made about them. We recognise that now is not the time to make a detailed analysis of what has occurred. Instead, we must address ourselves to what might happen in future. Nevertheless, we must review all events as they have evolved since early August and ask ourselves whether we could have done better.

I express my great appreciation to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, who is present in the Chamber, for providing financial assistance and for the much improved support that the helpline has received from the Foreign Office over the past fortnight. It has provided back-up whenever we wanted it, and has offered services that, to be honest, we do not really need.

As to other agencies, I am extremely critical of the media. They seem to have forgotten the relatives and friends of the hostages. A few weeks ago, a letter was published in the Daily Express from a gentleman in Saltford who commented that after President Hussein, Britain seemed to be fighting a battle against the media. It seems that at every stage the media have wanted to concentrate on the distress and agony that the situation has created. The media have wanted to hype up the pain.

A headline in The Sunday Times quoted Hussein as saying "Babies to starve". He did not say that. I ask the editorial staff of that paper to think how such a headline played on the nerves of all the families involved. It is not just the tabloids who are to blame. In many ways the tabloids have been good. However, the television companies have wanted to show films of the agony experienced.

London Weekend Television made three telephone calls within an hour asking for the names of families so that it could show

"the distress and agony that families are going through."

It really should be ashamed of itself. Independent Television News telephoned one family 30 times up to 1 o'clock one morning because they were related to a hostage. It, too, should be ashamed of itself. There is hardly one area of the national media which I could not condemn similarly. Those who are involved in the helplines and the relatives and the hostages are sick to death of the way in which the media have portrayed the events of the past few weeks. I also want to take this opportunity to condemn everything that Jesse Jackson did at Heathrow last Sunday.

The hostages and their families are in an extremely difficult position. We in our organisation will continue to provide all the help that we can. We know that there are not only many British people out there, but many of other nationalities. Those who have come back and the families of the hostages know that other nationalities are deeply involved.

We in our organisation and, I think, all politicians, would like to say to the hostages' families that they will always be in our consciousness, but, tragically, they cannot direct our foreign policy. If they do that, President Hussein will have won. He has put them in their present position contrary to every convention of international law and practice of the past 50 years. I am sure that the families of the hostages are only too conscious of the fact that it is President Hussein who is abusing their rights. Any slight criticism that they may have of anybody else palls into insignificance against their absolute condemnation of President Hussein's treatment of their families and friends.

Mr. David Lambie (Cunninghame, South): I do not want to follow the line taken by the hon. Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward), except to say that in any war the first casualty is always truth. Now, with organisations such as the Central Intelligence Agency covering the world, more and more disinformation is coming from American sources, to which, unfortunately, our media, including the Scottish media, have been giving great prominence.

Like most hon. Members who have spoken, I too am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition for asking for the recall. He should have done it earlier, but the past day and a half has justified the recall. However, I would have been happier if my right hon. Friend had taken the opportunity to recall the parliamentary Labour party to give it an opportunity to discuss the situation and Labour's response to it before he spoke on our behalf at the Dispatch Box.

Listening this morning to the Secretary of State for Defence, I thought that he was trying to justify the military inactivity of most countries, even those in the United Nations who voted for a military adventure in the middle east. My right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) said that he thought that the Secretary of State mentioned that 20 nations were taking part. I thought that the Secretary of State for Defence was trying to camouflage the situation, trying to convince many hon. Members that this is a United Nations venture and not just an American one.

I ask the Foreign Secretary why, after every fact-finding mission by Congress members to the middle east, the first thing that they complain about when being interviewed on American television is the lack of military support from every other country, including troops on the ground from the United Kingdom. The Secretary of State for Defence said that we now have 5,000 military personnel in the Gulf area. Will the Foreign Secretary confirm that 3,000 of them were already in the Gulf, the middle east and the eastern Mediterranean before the crisis? We have moved only a small number of personnel. The Prime Minister yesterday promised to send more forces, but from where? Will they come from Northern Ireland, where we have 10,000 troops? More people are dying in Northern Ireland than are dying in Kuwait. We need troops in Northern Ireland more than we need troops in the middle east.

Listening to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill), I wondered to whom he was talking. Was he talking to hon. Members, to the British military establishment, or to our so-called friends across the Atlantic in the United States? I hope that Labour spokesmen are not saying to the British military establishment and to the United States that they do not need to be afraid of a future Labour Government because they would carry out the same foreign and military policies as those carried out by the Conservative Government during the past 11 years.

In the short time available to me, I wish to make two main points. This situation would never have arisen if it were not for the ending of the cold war. If there were still two major super-powers—the Soviet Union and America—the Americans would never have dared to enter Saudi Arabia and say that they were doing so to defend Arab interests. They would have known that the Soviet Union would immediately come from the north to defend their friends in the northern part of the middle east—[Interruption.] Conservative Members sometimes do not like the truth. Like the thugs they are, they think that the only way to silence people is by putting them down. I hope that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will give some protection to independent Members.

There is now a world political vacuum. There is only one super-power, and unlike some of my right hon. and hon. Friends I have no faith in the intentions of the United States. I do not want to go over America's recent history, but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) said, they range from Vietnam to Nicaragua to Grenada to the Philippines and to Panama. I have no confidence in the peaceful intentions of the United States. I hope that when Mr. Gorbachev meets President Bush he will make it clear that the Soviet Union will not support any American military attack towards the north out of Saudi Arabia.

I am sure that many right hon. and hon. Members heard Secretary Baker speaking on television last night. He told us that a land embargo and a naval blockade had been put in place and that it would not succeed as quickly as America had hoped. He then said that there might have to be a call for an air embargo on Iraq. I hope that the Foreign Secretary will state clearly that that is not the British Government's policy. I hope also that those of my right hon. and hon. Friends who have decided to support the Government, or to abstain, will consider this serious issue. Which pilot, whether American or British, will be given the first order to shoot down a civilian aircraft which refuses to turn away when it is told that there is an embargo on supplying goods and equipment, food and medical supplies by air to Iraq? I hope that the Foreign Secretary will make it clear also that the policy of Secretary Baker is not the policy of the Government and that on no account will the Royal Air Force be given the right to shoot down unarmed civilian aircraft because they are entering Iraqi air space with food and medical supplies. We could learn overnight that such an aircraft has been shot down.

I fear that there are many in the United States, including the born-again Christians who permeate the Central Intelligence Agency, who are looking for an opportunity to escalate the potential armed conflict. The shooting down of unarmed civilian aircraft could be their first attempt at escalation. I hope that we shall hear from the Foreign Secretary, or from the boss, that on no account will the British Government sanction such a policy.

I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to stand united. Let us vote against the Government's policies. My constituents and I have more to fear from the British Prime Minister than from Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Ray Whitney (Wycombe): I agree with only one part of the extraordinary contribution of the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Lambie), and that is that Parliament should have been recalled at an earlier stage. The reluctance of the Leader of the Opposition to exercise his right to ask for the recall of Parliament, and his slowness to do so, was perhaps explained by the speech of the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South.

It is important that the House meets at such a crucial juncture, when we face threats to the interests of the United Kingdom and to the world as a whole. The international community recognises the seriousness of the threats, as do we in this place. The House is sometimes too modest and too diffident and tends to play down the role of right hon. and hon. Members as the spokesmen of their constituents and of the United Kingdom. At such a moment it is right that we should meet to express our views. It is we, not the editors of newspapers, the writers of editorials or the pundits in the media, who speaks for Britain. We were elected to speak for Britain and we should do so. I thank God that we are doing so.

I welcome the extraordinary degree of unity which is emerging as the debate continues. We have discordant voices, but it would be absurd to expect complete unity either in the country or within the House. As a democrat, I welcome that freedom as, I am sure, do all my colleagues. However, I find it lamentable that that note of discord—with only one exception, all such notes came from Opposition Members—is heavily overlaid with primitive and naked anti-Americanism, as was demonstrated yet again by the contribution of the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South.

I am sorry to introduce an antagonistic note, but it needs to be done in view of the contributions that have been made. Opposition Members have frequently sought to draw parallels between what has happened to Kuwait and what happened as a result of American actions in Grenada and Panama. That is deeply offensive. Anyone who seeks to make such parallels should ask the common people of Panama and Grenada whether they are satisfied with what has happened or whether they would prefer a Marxist dictatorship or the corrupt dictatorship of Noriega. Having received an answer to that, they could then go to the common people of Kuwait and ask their view about the actions of America and the international community.

I wish to talk about the British and other citizens held as hostages. Many other important subjects have been covered in this debate, but I regret that not enough has been said about the hostages. I imagine that almost all of us have constituents involved in one way or another with the terrible plight of the hostages. I have no doubt that every hon. Member, whatever view he or she takes on the broader issues, shares our detestation of what is being done to the hostages, for whom our sympathy is unbounded.

I shall offer a personal note—I was held hostage as a diplomat by the Chinese from August 1967 to June 1968. One aspect of being a hostage is that one does not know how long the ordeal will last. That is one of the dreadful uncertainties, quite apart from the hostages' worry about what will happen to them. I lay claim to total sympathy with the plight of those still held in Iraq, and the plight of their relatives and friends in this country. Having said that, it cannot be right for Government policy to be dictated by it. Some 40 diplomats and their families were held hostage in China during those 11 months as a result of the sacking of our mission by the Red Guards. We were held by the Gang of Four, as they were then known, who controlled

China. There was little public attention in this country and nothing on the scale that, rightly, we have now. There was no expectation that British policy then should have been influenced with regard to Hong Kong, or any other aspect of Anglo-Chinese relations, by the fact that the Chinese held us hostage. Sadly, that must be the judgment now with regard to British and other hostages held by Saddam Hussein.

It is time to end the barbarity of hostage-taking. There are two happy sides to this awful crisis. The first is the degree of international collaboration that has so far been maintained. I pray to God that, as the hard realities are faced, that degree of international unity will be maintained. It may not be totally maintained, but we must all seek to keep the high degree of unanimity that we have. We must not sacrifice for legalisms the principles enshrined in the United Nations resolutions relating to the complete withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait.

The post-cold war era gives the international community a great opportunity to establish a regime in which small nations can live in peace, without fear of aggression from their neighbours. It could bring an end to the whole desperate business of hostage-taking. Only recently we witnessed the horrors inflicted on Brian Keenan, and we tend not to remember as often as we should the plight of John McCarthy, Terry Waite and the other hostages. It is outrageous that we do not, week by week, bring the matter to the attention of the world. I hope that one outcome of the present whole mess will be an end to hostage taking, which is a scar on humanity. I look to those of the Muslim religion who are sincere believers in Islam to join us—sadly, hostage-taking seems at present a feature of Islamic communities—and those of other faiths in bringing the present barbarity to an end.

Above all, the debate has provided an opportunity—accepting that there are voices of discord—to show that the great call is for unanimity in proving that aggression must not be seen to pay.

12.30 pm

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): This has been an excellent debate which has totally justified the recall of Parliament. It is in marked contrast to the Falklands debate on that Saturday in March 1982. I recall returning from the Anglo-German Konigswinter conference at Cambridge for the debate. When I returned to that conference, my German friends expressed amazement at the shrillness, jingoistic nature and excitability of the British Parliament in reacting to the Falklands crisis.

This debate has been sober, realistic and practical. There has been a wide consensus among hon. Members. We have all condemned the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and its subsequent occupation and annexation. Most hon. Members have supported the impressive international response and particularly the blockade that has been undertaken in accordance with United Nations Security Council resolutions.

There has also been general recognition that we are in for a long haul. There has been little support for the idea of a quick, unilateral, surgical strike, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) pointed out the dangers and inadequacies of such an approach.

Most of us recognise that there may come a time when, in support of United Nations resolutions, force may have to be used. But, as the Leader of the Opposition said in his excellent speech yesterday, it is essential that any action has the widest possible international support and is taken in accordance with United Nations resolutions, the UN charter and under international law.

President Bush and his chief Ministers have so far handled the crisis with great skill and intelligence. If any of my hon. Friends doubt that—we have heard one such expression—I urge them to consider what would be the situation if President Reagan were still in office. There would not have been the concern to create such a wide-ranging international consensus, or to work through the United Nations, or the circumspection and restraint that have so far been the hallmark of the speeches and statements of President Bush and Secretary of State James Baker.

Naturally, the Americans want to protect their oil supplies—[Interruption.] This is a serious debate and it would be sensible for hon. Members to take it seriously. We all want to protect our oil supplies, and that goes for Japan, the countries of Europe and, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) said yesterday, the developing countries of the third world. We all want to protect our oil supplies and we are entitled to do so.

I do not believe that—as my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) hinted—it is the intention of the United States to set up a virtual protectorate in the Gulf. The reality, as we have seen from the tour by Secretary of State Brady, is that the United States can no longer afford permanent involvement on the scale that may well be required if security is to be maintained in the middle east.

I ask my hon. Friends to mark this point well. The new development in American foreign policy—and I believe that we must welcome it—is the realisation in the United States that although the United States remains a super-power, it must act within the widest possible international support. It is only sensible and wise for us to mark that.

My next point—the new and most welcome accord between the United States and the Soviet Union—has been mentioned by a number of hon. Members. It is not true to say that the Soviet Union is no longer a super-power if we judge that by the possession of nuclear weapons and of substantial armed forces. In that sense, the Soviet Union is a super-power. If we had had a middle east crisis on this scale five years ago, we could now be on the brink of world war. The fact that we are not marks the real change and shift that has occurred. In this crisis, the United States and the Soviet Union are co-operating in the Security Council.

The Soviet Union is taking a resolute line with Iraq, its former client. That was illustrated by the polite, but firm reception given to the Iraqi Foreign Minister in Moscow this week. This weekend, President Bush and President Gorbachev will meet in Helsinki, at the request of President Bush, to discuss common strategy over the crisis. That is an enormously welcome development.

The new relationship between the Soviet Union and the United States has breathed new life into the United Nations and has helped to make the response to the Iraqi invasion so international and so effective. We must welcome that and we must hope to build on and develop that constructive accord, which is so promising for the world and for the future of peace.

There is general agreement in the House that we must look beyond the immediate situation and that we must try to reach a long-term settlement in the middle east. It is interesting and significant that both Secretary of State James Baker and the Foreign Minister of the Soviet Union, Eduard Shevardnadze, have been talking about longer-term objectives and, above all, about the need to create a more stable order in the middle east, an area which is so vital to the world.

I do not have time to run over what should be included in that long-term settlement. Clearly, we must settle some of the basic disputes, especially, of course, the Palestinian issue. It is vital that we settle that. It is also vital that we come to our senses about exporting arms to the middle east. None of us should forget—and we all have a responsibility here—that the west helped to build up the military might of Iraq. We must draw the appropriate lesson from that and about chemical bans as well.

We must have a new security guarantee in the middle east. I was pleased to hear the Prime Minister talk about the possible role of the United Nations. The Arabs must be involved as well.

I will join my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition in voting for the Adjournment today, not because I am giving the Government a blank cheque—none of us should give any Government a blank cheque—but because I support the Government's actions so far and, above all, because, like my right hon. Friend, I support the case for an effective international response to a clear case of aggression by Iraq.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): The gravity of the situation cannot be overstated. All right-thinking people do not want war, hate war and want it to be avoided. However, we have to face the fact that there may be war because of Iraqi aggression against Kuwait. The debate is overshadowed by three factors that we should keep in mind. First, we are threatened with a war that will bring into play modern chemical weapons. That is to be dreaded and, if possible, avoided. Secondly, large numbers of our citizens and large numbers of the citizens of our allies are already in the hands of Saddam Hussein. We must never forget the hostages. Thirdly, Saddam has a master card. He could turn his attention to Israel and thereby unite almost all the Arab nations behind him. We should face up to those dark shadows.

Many hon. Members have used the words, "God forbid that this should happen." I echo them. I call on the Prime Minister to go to see Her Majesty the Queen and advise her that this nation should have a day of prayer and humility to ask almighty God to avert this calamity. The battle does not go to the strong or the swift. It is more honourable and ethical to ask for the avoidance of calamity than to call for deliverence from calamity once it has come.

I associate myself with the sympathy expressed to the families of our colleagues who have died since we last met. As an hon. Member representing Northern Ireland, I pay tribute to Ian Gow. He was a personal friend of Northern Ireland and the sympathy of the Province goes to his wife and sons. Ian Gow agreed with the Unionist representatives in their attitude to the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

Many people have castigated the United States and others for their attitude, but it was well for us that we had America and that it was able to do what is has done.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): And Great Britain.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Yes. Think of what a situation we should be in if America did not have the ability to respond to the call for help from the Saudis.

I support the Prime Minister for backing America from the start. I have never advocated a blank cheque approach in support of American policies. However, there is an inconsistency which galls the Unionists. Let us suppose that an hon. Member suggested that Kuwait and Iraq should have an agreement, and that that agreement should consist of the setting up of a conference with equal numbers of representatives from Iraq and Kuwait, or that the dictator himself should preside at the conference, and that the Kuwaitis should make every effort to agree with what Iraq wants and should bend their energies to that end, and that if at any time the Kuwaiti people wanted to vote themselves into Iraq the Governments of the world should support that. Any hon. Member who said, "That is the answer", would be cried down with the fury of the House. Yet the House, by an overwhelming vote, agreed to the Anglo-Irish Agreement. Hon. Members should remember that the root cause of the trouble in Northern Ireland is a claim of territory.

It is all very well castigating other people for their remarks, but we should look to this House today. In Northern Ireland we have had 3,000 people killed and 10,000 people maimed. A warship being prepared for the Royal Navy was bombed yesterday in the Belfast shipyard. Two nights ago, the police station at Lochgall, where the IRA were defeated a year ago, was devastated in an attack. And the deaths continue. When hon. Members agree to the course that the House is rightly taking, they should have a thought for Northern Ireland and should support the efforts being made to ensure that the Anglo-Irish Agreement is set aside and a new constitutional settlement achieved in Northern Ireland.

I want to say a word about the hostages, the refugees, the countries that are suffering as a result of the embargo and especially the families of the hostages. I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam), who spoke of Douglas Croskery, who was an Ulsterman and the first man to die in the Kuwaiti trouble. I should like to say, on behalf of the family represented by my hon. Friend the Member for North Down (Mr. Kilfedder), that we deeply appreciate the remarks made by the hon. Member for Blaydon.

I should like to associate myself with the other remarks that have been made about the suffering of the hostages. I hope that the House will not only take into consideration the countries that are suffering as a result of the embargo, such as Egypt and Jordan, but will remember that many businesses in our country are beginning to suffer and that unemployment will be the result of the pressures of this embargo. I hope that the Government will bear that in mind. I heard on television this morning a statement from the Government that "We must stand up for our ethical principles. Therefore, if people are unemployed it is just too bad." I hope that that is not the official Government view. I hope that they are prepared to help unemployed people who are put on the dole simply because of the embargo. They deserve the attention of the House and of the Government.

I trust that this war will be averted and that the House will keep its strength and show the world that we will not tolerate aggression. I hope and pray that the matters that we are discussing will continue to have the support of the world community. I believe that if they have worldwide support we have a sharp weapon against Hussein, who may say that this is a west-Arab struggle. That lying propaganda must not be given any credence whatever.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): One thing is certain: no hon. Member who has spoken in the debate so far has criticised the recall of Parliament. When the invasion occurred on 2 August I took the view that it would be right for the House to be recalled as quickly as possible. I remembered that in 1968, when I was a Member for another constituency, the House was recalled almost immediately following the invasion of Czechoslovakia.

Earlier this year, on 5 April, I had an Adjournment debate in which I urged "that the banning of all forms of high-level technology to Iraq should be given the highest priority and that every effort should be made urgently to seek co-operation on that, certainly from the countries of western Europe".—[Official Report, 5 April 1990; Vol. 170 c. 1352.]

I also argued that sanctions should include the ending of trade credits to the regime.

When the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the right hon. Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave), who replied to the debate last night, answered my Adjournment debate he disagreed with me on trade credits. His comments were quoted this week on "Panorama". He argued that if we stopped trade credits to Iraq, other countries would step in. That is indeed a familiar argument. I believe that this country, though not so much as France or the Soviet Union, has some responsibility for the build-up of the armaments industry in Iraq. We should recognise that and learn the lessons from it for the future when allowing weapons to be supplied to dictatorships of the most brutal and terrorist kind. According to the "Panorama" progamme, it appears that the company, located in Britain, that has contributed to Iraq's nuclear build-up continues to do that work. That is something which the Government must look into urgently.

I take the view, of course, that the invasion of Kuwait was an act of outright criminality. It is, as we all know, a blatant lie that the Iraqis had been invited in by opposition elements. That lie hardly lasted a single week. Shortly after we were told that Kuwait was just another province of Iraq and that that could not be changed. People such as myself, who were not around here at the time but who know it from contemporary history, must surely recall what happened in 1938 when Nazi troops marched into Austria. It was said then that, arising from the wish of the Austrian and German people, it was one greater German nation. The same familiar lie has been repeated now in endless propaganda from a terrorist dictatorship.

I also take the view that the Security Council acted correctly and promptly. The resolutions on sanctions and the blockade that have been approved should ensure that Kuwait is freed from enemy occupation. The international community should not be satisfied with anything less. Kuwait must be freed. If that is not achieved, everything that we are doing will have been a waste of time. The primary objective is that Kuwait should be freed from occupation. There can be no negotiations, no deals on that basic demand.

I do not accept that in return for ending the occupation, some offer should be made to the criminal regime in Iraq. Various suggestions have been made on the international scene and by a few hon. Members in our debate. It has been suggested that an island here or an island there should be given to Iraq. That would be rewarding the aggressor. It is not the job of the inernational community to find ways in which a dictator can, somehow, save face. He took upon himself the responsibility of that invasion. He must bear that responsibility to his own people and to the international community.

Some have argued that what is required is an international conference—it has been said by some of my hon. Friends and a few Conservative Members—to try to settle a number of outstanding issues in the middle east, including the present crisis. I agree with some of the aims of such a conference. Much reference in the debate has been made to the Palestinian issue. I have never disagreed that that is a very important problem. I speak as one—I have never been ashamed of it—who believes that it was right in 1948 that the state of Israel should have been set up, for obvious reasons. But if the Jews have a right to a homeland of their own, so have the Palestinians. I have harshly criticised, and I shall continue to do so, the outlandish and hawkish ways in which successive Israeli Governments have acted.

I took part here in some of the exchanges in 1967. It is true that at that time Israel took upon itself that aggression, but, by heavens, it was provoked into so doing. In 1973 it did not, rightly or wrongly, take upon itself that initiative, but in 1967 it came to the conclusion, as most people did, that, as in 1948, the Arab world was going to invade. As a result, the occupied territories were taken. There were no occupied territories before then. My criticism of Israel is that, having gained those occupied territories, it should have used them for negotiating purposes, rather than taking the line that has unfortunately been taken and stating that the land is all part of Israel and should remain so.

Surely the difference between Kuwait and the occupied territories, is that since 1948 there has been a state of war between Israel and most of the Arab world; there was no state of war between Iraq and Kuwait. If Kuwait is to be criticised, it must be for the way in which, over the past few years, it has done everything possible to appease the dictatorship in Iraq, advancing loans of every conceivable kind.

When some of my hon. Friends say, "Let us have an international conference in the first place", my mind goes back to 1956. I was not a Member of Parliament then, but on Sunday 4 November I demonstrated up the road in Trafalgar square. I was deeply angered, shocked and humiliated by what the Tory Government had done: in my opinion it was a criminal act with no justification, and, although that view may have been shared by a minority in the country, it was a pretty sizeable minority.

I did not say with others opposed to the aggression then that an international conference should first take place; nor did my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), who at that time represented a different constituency. We said, first and foremost, that what the Eden Government had brought about—criminal aggression—must be ended. For all sorts of reasons, as we know, it was ended.

If Labour Members were right to say that 34 years ago, when aggression was perpetrated by a Government in this country, how can we now be indifferent to what a terrorist dictatorship has done in Kuwait? How could we be consistent if we were not equally angry and dismayed, and as determined about the freeing of Kuwait as we were 34 years ago about the Suez operation? I see no inconsistency. I believe that we should always oppose aggression in all its forms, and I shall continue to do so.

What if the sanctions and the blockade do not achieve our objective? I have already stressed that that objective must be the freeing of Kuwait, and I accept the possibility that the sanctions and the blockade will not achieve it. I believe, however, that it is essential to allow time for sanctions—strictly applied—to work. The regime is not likely to be brought to its knees within a few weeks: it has a certain amount of reserves and resilience. Nevertheless, it appears that sanctions are already beginning to bite, and, if that is happening after such a short time, it would indeed be foolish to conclude that they are not going to work. We should give them time—and that view should, I believe, be adopted by the leading player in this matter the United States. If I had to choose between the editorials in The Times and those in The Daily Telegraph, I would opt for The Daily Telegraph, which has argued strongly for caution and for allowing the sanctions policy to work.

On the other hand, if sanctions ultimately do not work —I shall speak frankly; we are all responsible for our words—I believe that force should be used. To say otherwise would be inconsistent with what I have already said: that Kuwait should be freed from enemy occupation. Let me strongly urge, however, that the broad alliance that has come into being be maintained. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition was absolutely right: if force is to be used, it must be used with the approval of the United Nations.

A broad consensus should be maintained at all times to isolate the terrorist regime, and to ensure that as much international support as possible is maintained by Britain, the United States, other powers and those Arab countries that understand how essential it is for the consequences of the aggressive act committed on 2 August to be brought to an end.

Sir David Price (Eastleigh): The last time I addressed the House on the subject of a crisis in the middle east was 13 September 1956. On that occasion I followed the then hon. Member for Bristol, South-East; yesterday we heard from him again wearing the rather different motley of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). Then, as now, we took rather different views of the crisis. To put it at its simplest at this late hour in the debate, the right hon. Gentleman profoundly distrusted the Government. This time he has added his profound distrust of the Americans. On both occasions I express my trust of the Government and on this occasion of the Americans.

At this late stage in the debate the House will be relieved to hear that I shall not attempt to give my analysis of what has happened in the middle east over the past 34 years and of how we should handle the crisis. I shall raise only one or two human problems which I hope will command the attention of the House and further action by the Government.

I hope that the House will agree that it is insufficient to say that we support the implementation of the international rule of law. We must also pick up the casualties of such implementation even though the origin of their situation is Iraqi aggression.

As my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, said last night in his winding-up speech, we are talking about Saddam Hussein's refugees. However, the plain fact is that we have to cope with the situation as we find it. Our embassies in Kuwait and Baghdad are doing everything that they can for our own people. The criticisms that have been made are ill-placed, given the remarkably difficult circumstances in which the embassies have been working. Before this debate is over, we should make it clear that we pay the fullest tribute to what our staff there are doing.

When those British subjects get out of Iraq and Kuwait we should do more. First, when the aircraft come back full of British refugees there should not only be immigration officers to meet them but people from the Department of Social Security to offer immediate help. Although the majority have families to go to, there is evidence that some arrive penniless and dispossessed. I am sure that the House will agree that they have a call upon our resources just as our prisoners of war did at the end of the war when they came back from various camps in Germany and the far east.

Secondly, my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) told the House about some of the problems that he has encountered in his self-help group. I suggest to the House that we have reached the stage at which it is insufficient to rely upon voluntary assistance, and it should be taken over officially because the scale of the numbers is too great to expect purely voluntary organisations to cope with it.

Moving from the subject of our own people to the problem of the many foreign nationals who have been caught in Kuwait and Iraq—some 2·5 million people—we have heard of the plight of many of these refugees when they reach the Jordanian border. The figures are uncertain, but it is thought that about a quarter of a million people are on the Jordanian side of the border. As part of the world community and as co-sponsors of the Security Council's resolutions, we have a responsibility for these people, and that has been acknowledged by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. Last night she gave us the good news that we are to increase our contributions to a certain international organisation, and that is greatly to be welcomed.

I suggest that there are four specific measures that the British people can take through the Government now. The first is to make use of that admirable body the Royal Army Medical Corps. It has field ambulances which are self-contained so that when it goes on a job it does not make any demands on the resources of the country that it is going into. It did excellent work in Nepal two years ago and this would be a proper civilian use of military personnel. One of my hon. Friends made the suggestion in general terms that the military should be used, and here is an excellent opportunity to do so at once. As I have some experience of the Royal Army Medical Corps, I can assure the House that it is excellent.

I would like us to send also members of the Royal Engineers—some field squadrons of sappers, who are extremely versatile. We talk about refugee camps, but none exist. Something must be built as temporary accommodation. The Corps of Royal Engineers is superb at that kind of task, being extremely efficient and adaptable.

Right hon. and hon. Members referred also to the need for drivers and to maintain trucks under difficult conditions in the desert. The Royal Corps of Transport is extremely experienced in such work.

Anyone who is worried that sending British soldiers to do a civilian job in Jordan would create problems with the Jordanians may be assured that that would not arise. King Hussein above all knows the merits and the capabilities of the British armed forces, having himself been trained by them and having had a long association with them. I am sure it is a challenge that our armed forces would take up willingly.

Finally, I suggest to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs that there are surplus civilian aircraft available for charter as we come to the end of the holiday season which should be used now to take foreign nationals from the Gulf to their various home countries, such as India, Pakistan and Bangladesh.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will respond to those four specific proposals so that something can be done now. The scale of the problem is quite hideous. If we ask ourselves the old question, "Who is my neighbour?", I am clear that the refugees near Amman are my neighbours.

Sir David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): As we near the end of our two-day debate, we can be thankful that the tone was set at the very beginning, in the speeches of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, and has moved the House towards a fairly clear consensus on how the Government should react to the events in the Gulf.

There has been total agreement in the House that a unique attempt to obliterate a member state of the United Nations must be reversed. There has been almost total agreement in the House that the economic blockade should be supported and made effective. There is almost universal hope in the House that sanctions will work, and there is the nearly unanimous view that if they do not or circumstances make it necessary, force may have to be used on behalf of the Government and people of Kuwait.

There was also a general echo of opinion on both sides of the house that if it proves necessary to use force, the widest possible international agreement is essential. There is a widespread feeling in the House that any kind of single United States adventure, with the United Kingdom in tow, would not be welcomed. There is a broad view across the House that further agreement in the United Nations is desirable, and, if that is not available, at the very least, that all 20 nations involved in the present forces, plus the two super-powers, should have to consent to any military activity. That is why this weekend's summit between Mr. Gorbachev and President Bush will be so important.

In the light of what I perceive to be a great consensus in the House, some of us repudiate the comments made yesterday by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). I do not doubt his sincerity in such matters, but I am not alone in resenting his suggestion that those of us who vote in the Aye Lobby this afternoon will somehow be voting for war, while he will somehow be voting for peace. That suggestion cannot be allowed to stand, because it is not true. When my right hon. and hon. Friends and I go into the Lobby this afternoon in support of the Government, we shall be saying that we acknowledge that hundreds of our own civilians, as well as thousands of our troops, are at risk in the Gulf. We recognise that the Government have access, which we do not have, to intelligence reports and, increasingly in this day and age, to satellite reports on the situation in Iraq. Therefore, Opposition Members and Government Back Benchers must wish Ministers well in the appallingly difficult judgments that they may have to make in the weeks ahead. That is the spirit in which we shall go into the Lobby today. It is nothing to do with advocating war as against peace.

I have just four points to make. First, we have not paid enough attention to the refugee problem. It is right and natural that the Government and the House should express great concern about the hundreds of our people whose lives are at risk in the Gulf. That is wholly proper. But we should also recognise that hundreds of thousands of people have been dispossessed as a result of Saddam Hussein's actions.

The right hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour), who has been to Kuwait far more often than I have, made a telling point when he said that after the invasion nobody could be found in Kuwait to man a substitute Government on behalf of Saddam Hussein. The truth is that Kuwait was, as we know, a rentier economy. A great proportion of its population sent remittances home. It comprised Bangladeshis, Pakistanis, Indians, Filipinos and so on. The image that Saddam Hussein tried to create of his marching in against a privileged royal family is not true. He has wrecked the hopes and the livelihoods of thousands of the poorest people of the world.

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir David Steel: I am reluctant to give way, because, like everybody else, I want to be brief.

Welcome though the extra money announced by the Prime Minister yesterday is, the refugee problem will not be solved by the signing of cheques. I echo what the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) and the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) have said. If we have spare aeroplanes, now is the time for them to be sent to Jordan to help in an immediate airlift to deal with the refugee problem.

Secondly, one of the lessons of this episode is that the world community must now come to grips with the appalling problem of the free sale of arms and equipment round the world. There is nothing more deeply hypocritical than the way in which the developed nations have poured arms into the middle east and then stood around collectively wringing their hands the minute they were used. We have reaped the benefits of the profits of arms sales from all round the world. The two biggest suppliers to Iraq were two of the permanent members of the Security Council—the Soviet Union and France.

My mind goes back to a speech made in 1980 at the Liberal international congress by Hans Dietrich Genscher, the German Foreign Minister, calling not for a stop to arms sales—we are not as romantic as that—but at least for an international register of arms manufacturers and sales under the authority of the United Nations. It is time, 10 years on and in the light of what has happened, that that idea was firmly pursued by the world community. We cannot continue to traffic in the weapons of death for profit in the irresponsible way in which we have.

Thirdly, many hon. Members have referred to the wider situation in the middle east. It is true that the Israeli occupation of the west bank and Gaza has gone on for a long time. Again, my mind goes back to my time as a young Member of Parliament when I was dispatched as a member of the parliamentary delegation to the United Nations General Assembly in the autumn of 1967. That was the time when Lord Caradon, whose passing we all mourn this week, was our Minister at the United Nations. To him more than anyone else were attributed the efforts to secure the passing of resolution 242. That was a great act of international statesmanship. But the trouble is that, for 23 years, resolution 242 has remained nothing but a piece of paper. Action on it has not taken place. That was because of the continuation of the cold war. The Soviet Union saw in the middle east the possibility of latching on to a conflict, and using it as part of its expansionist plans. That meant that resolution 242 could never be put into effect and become a reality.

Unhappily, when the thaw came, we and the rest of the world were, understandably, taken up with other excitements. With the dismantling of the Berlin wall and events in southern Africa, we took our eyes off the middle east. But we must return to it now and admit that that area of conflict has been neglected for many years.

I agree with those who yesterday said that King Hussein of Jordan had been rather badly treated. We have not recognised the great difficulties that he, in particular, has had in his country. I do not deplore his efforts at continued dialogue and discussion, together with the Secretary-General of the United Nations. Like the Minister of State, I regret the decision of the Palestine Liberation Organisation to support Saddam Hussein, but we must analyse why that has happened. In May, I went to Tunis to meet Yasser Arafat and the Secretary-General of the Arab League. I took careful note of what they said to me. They both registered their dismay at the lack of positive response from Israel and the western powers to Yasser Arafat's initiatives. They said that most radical and extremist forces were liable to say to them, "What is the use of promising to abandon terrorism or recognising Israel's right to exist if it produces no peace?" They said that the pressure for war and terrorism thus increases, so that so-called moderate Governments in the middle east come under threat from fundamentalists hostile to the lack of progress towards a peace settlement and the lack of justice for the Palestinians.

Unhappily, those words have come true, only a few weeks after they were uttered, through the support that has been given to Saddam Hussein and the way in which he has been able to latch on to the Palestinian grievance and attempt to undermine—thankfully, so far unsuccessfully—the Governments of Jordan and Egypt.

The House has an obligation to tell the Government that, because we have such good support from so many Arab friends in the current operation, we should say to them that when the crisis is over we will recognise that we have been a little lax—especially successive Governments of the United States—and that we will deal with the Palestinian grievance and with the wider issue of the middle east peace settlement. We must return it to the front of the international agenda.

Fourthly, when in the past I have discussed with Israeli politicians the question of a demilitarised zone in the west bank, they have pooh-poohed that because of the vulnerability of their territorial position—and they had a point. However, are we now moving into a more hopeful era? I welcome what the Prime Minister said yesterday about a better world order, in which the United Nations, because of the co-operation of the super-powers, will have real bite and authority. In such a position, to talk of a long-term United Nations role in the middle east, as part of the peace settlement, is no longer fanciful but a realistic proposition.

Out of this great turmoil must come some signs of hope. I welcome what the Prime Minister said yesterday and I am glad that she has moved away from her unfortunate remarks in Helsinki when she criticised the lack of effort by our fellow Europeans, and I am glad that the Secretary of State for Defence paid tribute to them today. It was rather as though Churchill, in the middle of the last war, had said, "We do not think that the French Resistance is doing enough." The Prime Minister's observation was not helpful, and neither was her vision of NATO instead of the United States becoming the new world policeman in out-of-area operations.

What we must look for, and the Prime Minister rightly referred to this yesterday, is the possibility of the United Nations, because of the way in which it has tackled this matter, realising the dreams of its founders and becoming an effective world policeman. If that happens, some good will have come out of this terrible tragedy.

1.18 pm

Mr. Churchill (Davyhulme): It is always a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Tweedale, Etterick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel), and I congratulate him on his robust remarks. I endorse his call for Britain to take the lead in establishing an airlift to transport the refugees from Jordan.

The debate has shown a remarkable degree of unanimity in all quarters in condemning the Iraqi invasion and in expressing determination to see the liberation of Kuwait and the restoration of its legitimate Government.

I preface my remarks by joining those who have paid tribute to our late and valued colleague, Ian Gow. He was a loyal servant of this House, a courageous patriot and a dear friend to many on both sides of the House. He will be sadly missed. Our condolences go to his widow, Jane, and their two sons.

How tragic it is that just as 45 years of cold war confrontation was coming to an end, and we seemed to be moving into smoother waters, we should find ourselves confronted by a grave threat from an entirely different quarter. This is not a crisis which has crept up on us unannounced. Ten years ago, on 11 July 1980, I had occasion to warn in an article in The Times of the determination of the Iraqi Government to acquire weapons of mass destruction, and was the first to report the fact that the Government of France had delivered to Iraq 72 kg of weapons grade enriched uranium, sufficient to make three nuclear weapons. It would be difficult to conceive of a more reckless or more venal action by a democratic Government.

Thus, it is not just private companies have enabled Saddam Hussein to acquire weapons of mass destruction. Governments have done so as well, including one of our principal partners within the European Community. I find that both appalling and unacceptable. Of course, a year later the Israeli air force took out the Osirak facility, thus nipping Iraq's nuclear capability in the bud and postponing its realisation for an entire decade. For that act Israel was roundly but, in my view, wrongly and regrettably condemned by the world community.

Iraq's invasion of its defenceless neighbour Kuwait was a clear act of war, a flagrant aggression and an act of defiance against the entire international community. Were Iraq to be allowed to get away with such behaviour, international relations would be back to the law of the jungle. That is why the Iraqi dictator must be stopped. Saddam Hussein has thrown down the gauntlet to the world. There can be no doubt that, but for the magnificent and swift response of the United States and Britain, Saddam Hussein's forces would today be occupying Saudi Arabia, and the United Arab Emirates would be under threat. At a stroke, he would have gained control of over half the world's proved oil reserves and posed a mortal threat to all the industrialised nations.

We owe a great debt to President Bush and our United States ally as well as to Her Majesty's Government, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Defence and Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for their swift and sure response to the crisis. It is at times such as this that the British nation appreciates the qualities of the strong and decisive leadership of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

I congratulate also the Leader of the Opposition, who has spoken so robustly for Britain and not in a party political way. He has given his wholehearted support to the Government in calling for the defeat of Saddam Hussein. It is heartening that that robustness has been echoed in every quarter of the House.

Round one has gone to the Allies. The Iraqi conquest of Saudi Arabia has been forestalled. But what next? It is possible, of course, that Iraq will strike at the allies. As each day goes by, however, that becomes less likely. Nor is it by any means impossible that Iraq, with its back to the wall and isolated even within the Arab world, will launch a surprise attack against Israel, to turn a blatant act of aggression against a Muslim and Arab neighbour into an Arab-Israeli confrontation. In either case, that would mean war.

But, what if Saddam Hussein does not strike? Of course, we all wish to see the crisis resolved without further military action, but, barring a coup in Baghdad, that seems increasingly unlikely. It is argued from many quarters that we should allow time to let sanctions work, but what

It is true that the United Nations has never been so unanimous in the face of aggression. It is important that the international coalition that has been put in place should be kept in being as far as possible. It is also true that, given Iraq's geographic position and the political line-up against her, there is greater prospect of sanctions being effective in this case than in any other. No Iraqi oil is being exported and no oil revenues earned. Even so, it will be many months before the oil embargo brings Saddam Hussein to his knees.

The logic of the position adopted by those opposed to allied military action in any circumstances is that they favour a policy of mass starvation of the Iraqi nation, and the hostages being held by Iraq, and ultimately, if that policy were to fail, there would be an ignominious withdrawal by the allies. That would leave Saddam Hussein as the victor, the conqueror of Kuwait, possessed of weapons of mass destruction posing a constant and immediate threat to Saudi Arabia and all the Gulf states. That would be a catastrophe of enormous proportions which would leave Iraq's Arab neighbours and Israel at the mercy of a monster who has chemical weapons at his disposal that he has repeatedly used against combatants and non-combatants alike in the Iran-Iraq war, and even against his own civilian population in Iraqi Kurdistan.

Today, Iraq possesses not only chemical weapons, but biological ones, together with the means of dispensing them by air, by multiple rocket launchers, with Frog and Scud missiles. The Scud missiles have been modified by the Iraqis to give them a range of 600 km and they now hold the entire population of Israel under threat. It will not be long before Iraq acquires nuclear weapons, which it has been working to secure for more than a decade.

If there is to be peace and stability in this part of the middle east, Kuwait must be liberated, Iraq deprived of its weapons of mass destruction and Saddam Hussein defeated. That will almost certainly require military action. By taking the initiative, the allies will drastically reduce the casualties to our own forces, as well as limit the suffering and loss of life among the Iraqi population that would result from a prolonged siege.

Britain's prompt deployment of Royal naval ships and Royal Air Force squadrons to the Gulf was an entirely appropriate response to deter the invasion of Saudi Arabia and enforce a naval blockade.

Mr. Flannery rose——

Mr. Churchill: I am sorry, but I shall not give way.

The confrontation in the Gulf is now moving into a new phase, with more than 100,000 United States forces so far deployed. If Kuwait is to be liberated, Britain must play her part on the ground as well as in the air and at sea. The time has come to deploy to the Gulf ground forces with elements of 5 Airborne Brigade, 3 Royal Marine commando brigade and armoured forces. It is becoming urgent for a unified allied military command to be established under a United States supreme allied commander. That must be a structure in which Britain, as well as Saudi Arabia, plays its part.

We have full confidence in our armed forces; there are none finer in the world. We know that they will acquit themselves with distinction if they are called upon to engage the enemy. As a precursor to the liberation of Kuwait, if our own and allied casualites are to be kept to a minimum, which is of the essence, the allies must not shirk from making a pre-emptive strike, if need be, to take out Iraq's air force, missiles and weapons of mass destruction. Thereafter, the Iraqi army, the fifth largest in the world, will be at the mercy of the high-tech weapons deployed by the allies. The crews of Iraq's 5,000 tanks will be running for all they are worth to escape their fiery coffins.

[Mr. Churchill]

Let there be no doubt that time is running out for Saddam Hussein. Let the message go out from this House today that if Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States decide on military action to resolve the crisis, they can count on the full-hearted support of the House and the nation.

1.29 pm

Mr. David Young (Bolton, South-East): There is little divergence of view in the House about the action that has so far been taken. But there are no winners in war. While war might eventually happen, we must give sanctions a chance and try to see that diplomacy and sanctions create the result that we want to achieve.

There is no anti-Americanism in asking that militarily we proceed under the rule of the United Nations. If a pre-emptive strike allowed it to be argued that America had used an international force to secure national oil interests, that would be the death of the United Nations for the foreseeable future.

The Arabs represent the key to achieving a solution. The average Arab sees America as the country that could have brought the Israeli Government to the conference table and, that opportunity having been ignored, he then watched on his television the smashing of the limbs of prisoners held by the Israelis.

We seek the removal of Saddam Hussein's troops from Kuwait without conditions being applied to that withdrawal. The settlement thereby achieved must represent the backcloth to future peace throughout the middle east, with countries of Arab and other nationalities conforming to the same rule of law. We are seeking not simply to put down one dictator but to preserve everlasting peace in an area in which war may come to the people not only of that area but of the whole world.

I beg that the refugees in Jordan are seen as people whose only fault was to be in the wrong place at the wrong time. The whole world must help to resolve their plight.

I have constituents who are relations of people held in Iraq. They do not want to hear threats about bringing dictators to trial. That does not make them feel that their relations, who might have to give evidence, will be safe. They appreciate that the blackmail that Saddam Hussein is attempting to inflict cannot determine British policy. But the refugees are our people and we must seek not only to get them all returned but give active Government support financially to the relations here. For example, a constituent of mine had her quarterly telephone bill doubled when her husband was mising for just 10 days. Such people require Government as well as voluntary support.

I shall support the steps that are being taken so long as we proceed under the aegis of the United Nations. In saying that, I believe that I speak for hon. Members in all parts of the House.

Mr. Speaker: I call Mr. Gerald Kaufman.

Miss Kate Hoey (Vauxhall): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate very much your difficulty in balancing the debate and in calling speakers. However, it is important to point out that men make wars and that women bear the consequences. Not one women Member from any party has been called——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This takes time out of the winding-up speeches. I have done my best to balance this debate. Even if we had had a four-day debate, it would have been difficult to get every hon. Member in.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The whole country will have noticed that out of the many speakers, the only woman called was the Prime Minister. The country will have taken note of the fact that this institutional sexism leads to a less balanced and less representative debate.

Mr. Speaker: I believe that the whole House accepts that we are all elected here as Members of Parliament to represent our constituents.

1.35 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): The Opposition asked for the recall of Parliament because we felt that there was an important role for the House of Commons to play in defining the nature of the crisis caused by Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, the response that our country and the world community should make to that crisis and the outcome that we wish to see. The debate has justified the recall.

Why has the world reacted so unprecedentedly to Iraq's invasion and illegal annexation of Kuwait? Some say that the response is simply a self-interested western reaction motivated by concern for oil prices and for oil supplies. I respond to those who offer that argument with a question. Why did Saddam Hussein invade Kuwait? It was not for some noble ideal and it was not even because of his grievance about the adequacy of Iraq's outlet to the Gulf. Saddam Hussein committed his aggression precisely and solely for oil—its production level and its price.

The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) said yesterday that if Kuwait grew carrots rather than pumped oil, our forces would not be there. If Kuwait grew carrots rather than pumped oil, Saddam Hussein would not have invaded Kuwait.

It is entirely proper that Saddam Hussein's aggression should receive a response, although it is far less proper that the petrol companies should so greedily seek to cash in on a grave crisis. British service men are not readily accepting the hazards and hardships of service in Saudi Arabia to defend the right of BP and of Esso to put up their prices.

The response is not solely a western response. The most significant aspect of the reaction is its near universality —from the Soviet Union, from China, from our Commonwealth partner Australia, from the non-aligned countries and from the Arab and Islamic countries. It is a global response and that is right, because the crisis is a global crisis. Saddam Hussein has not simply sought to obliterate a small neighbour. He has destabilised the Arab world and split the League of Arab States. He has destabilised the Islamic world from the Atlantic to the bay of Bengal.

Saddam Hussein has done a cynical disservice to the cause of the Palestinians whom he claims to champion. He has created a horrific refugee problem on his border with Jordan. He is callously victimising fellow Muslims and others from the third world. He has taken innocent women, children and men from many countries as hostages to act as a human shield behind which his army can hide. He has brought crisis, anguish and economic misery to third-world countries such as India, Pakistan and Bangladesh. Above all, he has raised the spectre of a chemical and nuclear war which would not stop short at the immediate middle eastern region, but could engulf the whole world. That is why the response to his aggression has been a world response and an unprecedented response.

The response has been twofold because the problem is twofold. First, there is the determination of the United Nations Security Council to oust Iraq from Kuwait. Let us be clear. Every one of the Security Council's resolutions has specifically laid down that the withdrawal should be unconditional, and unconditional means no concessions to Iraq. Resolution 660 perfectly properly recommends intensive negotiations between Iraq and Kuwait for resolution of their differences but negotiation must be after Iraq has withdrawn. As resolution 661 lays down, it must be after of Kuwait has been restored.

When I meet the Kuwaiti Government in exile in Taif next week, I shall tell them of my party's support for that objective and the measures adopted by the United Nations to achieve that objective, including the stringent sanctions laid down in resolution 661 and the naval interception and interdiction authorised by resolution 665—a resolution for which I, on behalf of the Labour party, repeatedly pressed. I shall tell them that we shall support an air blockade if that is what the Security Council authorises. I am glad that the United States Secretary of State, Mr. James Baker, has made clear this week that an air blockade depends on obtaining a Security Council resolution. If the international community persists with these measures, and maintains its unity, sense of common purpose and determination, sanctions can succeed. We must make sure that they do succeed.

The second response has been to the threat by Iraq to Saudi Arabia. That threat is based not on the jihad—the holy war—that Saddam Hussein has belatedly proclaimed, but on his greed for Saudi oil as well and on the stranglehold on the world economy that possession of such oil would give him. There is no doubt that Saddam Hussein meant to go into Saudi Arabia. That is why it was not only proper but essential to deter such an attack by the speedy deployment of outside forces, requested by Saudi Arabia under article 51 of the United Nations charter. Earlier today, the Secretary of State for Defence made it clear that our forces in Saudi Arabia are there at the specific invitation of the Saudi Arabian Government, under article 51.

When I meet the Saudi Government the day after tomorrow, I shall tell them that the Labour party fully supports the measures taken under proper United Nations authority, to ensure that their country is not raped as Kuwait was.

Mr. Flannery: We are in the Gulf under the auspices of the United Nations, not selectively but totally. Is the Labour party now to be selective? Will we decide that article 51, which the Prime Minister loves dearly, will allow us to attack? That is the problem that worries many honourable and sincere Members.

Mr. Kaufman: My hon. Friend has raised a point to which I shall be coming in detail.

The lawful and necessary deterrence of the threatened invasion of Saudi Arabia requires the assistance—assistance invited by Saudi Arabia, as is her right—of forces from other countries, from the United States, from Egypt, from Syria, Morocco, Pakistan and Britain. When I visit members of our service units in the Gulf next week I shall tell them—our constituents and the husbands, sons and brothers of our constituents—that they have the full support of Her Majesty's Opposition in the job that they are doing to stop a second Iraqi invasion.

We in the Labour party are sure that both operations are essential and that both are clearly authorised under United Nations resolutions and the United Nations charter. From the day that this crisis broke, the Labour party has advocated and supported action to reverse Iraqi aggression and to deter further aggression. We have advocated throughout that such action should take place under the clear and unquestionable authority of the United Nations charter. We welcome the consistent record of the United Nations and the consistent record of the United Kingdom Government in taking action only under the clear and unquestionable authority of the United Nations.

If there is a vote today, we shall vote for the Adjournment of the House to express our satisfaction that all action taken so far has been of a kind that we have advocated. We shall be voting on what has been done so far. We shall not be voting to give a blank cheque for whatever action may be taken in the future. No Government in a democracy could expect such a blank cheque and no Opposition, however loyal, could sign one.

We urge that all action taken by the United Nations and by the Government will in future continue to be of the kind that we continue to advocate. If it is, we shall welcome it, as we have welcomed action so far. We believe that any further operations found necessary, such as an air blockade, should, like operations already undertaken, be clearly and unequivocally authorised by the United Nations.

When, early in the crisis, the Government informed me that they believed that United Nations authority under article 51 could be argued for a naval blockade, I, having called for a naval blockade immediately Iraq invaded, responded that being able to argue a case under article 51 was not as satisfactory as being able to demonstrate clear and unequivocal authority. By going back to the Security Council for a resolution, the Government eventually and rightly took that course. It will always be better for the Government and our other partners and allies to take that course. It is not enough to be able to argue a technical case under article 51. The Soviet Union, China, the Arab nations and many others must be convinced of the appropriateness of action if it is to win consent and carry support.

The Prime Minister said yesterday:

"We will need to look to the future, the time when Iraq has withdrawn from Kuwait, as it must, and the legitimate Government have been restored. There will then need to be arrangements to ensure Kuwait's security and that of other countries in the region. I believe that this will need to involve the United Nations." [Official Report, 7 September 1990; Vol. 177, c.742.]

The Prime Minister was absolutely right to say that. It is a course of action that we, too, have consistently advocated. If the United Nations is to take the action that the Prime Minister proposes, as I hope that it will, it needs to continue to maintain its coherence and its effectiveness. It can do so only if its approach since the crisis began is maintained and safeguarded. If the international consensus is broken as a result of action that key permanent members of the Security Council either cannot support or actively oppose, not only will there not be an effective United Nations machinery available to police a settlement but there will not be a settlement to police.

It is crucial that there be such a settlement and that the objectives of the two operations now in progress be achieved, because, even if we achieve these objectives, as we must, the middle east will be no more at peace than it was five weeks ago before Saddam Hussein committed his aggression. The Palestinians will still be denied their right to self-determination and huge numbers of Palestinian refugees will still be rotting in refugee camps. Israel will still be eyeball to eyeball with Syria and in a state of war with Jordan. Lebanon will still be a tormented land, with foreign hostages, including John McCarthy, Terry Waite and Jackie Mann from Britain, held there and foreign troops from Syria and Israel installed there. The whole region will still be a bazaar in which arms are sold to the highest bidder, or doled out free to the most congenial recipient. The middle east will still be a powder keg liable to explode, as it has exploded so often before.

That is why, on behalf of our party, I have advocated that once Iraq is expelled from Kuwait—I repeat, once Iraq is expelled from Kuwait—and only after our objectives are clearly achieved, there must then be an international conference, under United Nations auspices, to negotiate a settlement of these dangerous issues.

When I made that proposal last weekend, a foolish newspaper, which used to carry some authority in this country, derided my party's policy as being somehow a kind of concession to Saddam Hussein. We cannot allow Saddam Hussein to dictate the middle east agenda, either positively or negatively.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kaufman: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me for not giving way, but I do not wish to take up the Foreign Secretary's time.

An international conference on the middle east has long been advocated by the British Government. I see that the Prime Minister nods. She, on behalf of the Government, and her Foreign Secretaries have consistently advocated such a conference. It has been advocated by other permanent members of the United Nations Security Council and by the Israeli Labour party, the League of Arab States and the Palestine Liberation Organisation. I believe that this conference should seek urgent negotiations, involving all relevant participants, on a comprehensive middle east settlement.

Such a settlement should result in peace treaties between Israel and Syria, Jordan and Lebanon. It should require the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon. It should provide for Palestinian self-determination. It should make provision to find a decent solution for the running sore of the Palestinian refugees, which for so long has been an affront to common humanity. Such a settlement should be acceptable to all parties. Oil revenues can be among the sources of funds to deal with this problem. The conference should provide built-in guarantees for the security both of Israel and of all other participating countries. It should seek to rid the middle east of nuclear and chemical weapons and to prevent any further nations from acquiring a nuclear or chemical capability. An international code of practice must be adopted to limit and control arms sales in the region which, as the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait makes clear, have been an almost criminal self-indulgence by too many countries. Such an agenda is formidable and daunting. Its achievement will be extremely difficult, but we must adopt this agenda.

I was greatly encouraged when this week, addressing the House of Representatives Foreign Affairs Committee in Washington, Secretary of State James Baker said:

> "Once the present danger passes, we cannot let its lessons go unheeded . . . We seek a region in which change can occur and legitimate security concerns can be preserved and preserved peacefully"

by the building of what Secretary of State Baker called "a more durable order."

He referred particularly to making today's crisis

> "a springboard for revived efforts to resolve the conflicts, including the festering conflict between Israel and its Palestinian and Arab neighbours".

What Secretary of State Baker advocates, we on the Opposition Benches advocate.

I was greatly encouraged as well when the Soviet Foreign Minister, Eduard Shevardnadze, advocated an international conference on the middle east. It is good to see the two super-powers in harmony. We look forward to that harmony being reinforced by the Helsinki summit this weekend. It is very encouraging that it was President Bush who took the initiative in calling that summit.

This new harmony is the key to success. Many people, including right hon. and hon. Members in this debate, have asked why we should react with such vehemence and stringency to the Iraqi aggression when other aggressions in the past have not evoked a comparable response. It is very easy to understand why hon. Members who are concerned about the situation in one place or another where aggressive acts have taken place should ask why it is only now and in this instance that action has been taken, and why other instances have been allowed to go by. The reason is that in the case of those other aggressions there was division among the permanent members of the Security Council which precluded or frustrated action, or even brought about vetoes when action was attempted.

The founders of the United Nations constructed a system that would work only if the five permanent members were in agreement. For 45 years the cold war prevented such agreement; now it can be and has been achieved, and there is the possibility of a new era in international relations in which the United Nations can work as it was always meant to work. Now, when we demonstrate to Saddam Hussein that the United Nations will not allow aggression to pay, not only will it send Saddam Hussein back out of Kuwait, but it will tell anyone else in any other part of the world who wants to try the same game that they will meet the same fate.

Mr. Secretary Baker rightly drew attention to the end of the cold war as the explanation for the historic international reaction to the invasion of Kuwait. He said:

> "Together we are finding common interest which will united the East and the West. Partnership is replacing conflict".

This crisis, for which Parliament has been recalled, is the first demonstration of that partnership. The crisis remains dangerous; it will remain dangerous for some time to come —perhaps a considerable time. We shall have daunting challenges to meet and grave decisions to make, and we shall have to meet those challenges and make those decisions on the basis of the principles of the United Nations, which has taken action to deal with this crisis. Let us hope that we can continue to make those decisions together: I am sure that that is the nation's wish.

Yet the remarkable international response to the crisis not only strengthens our resolution but gives us hope—hope that, in this new era, new aggressions can be prevented and long-standing problems can be resolved. In "Henry IV, Part I", Shakespeare put into Hotspur's mouth the words:

"Out of this nettle, danger, we pluck this flower, safety."

With resolution and unity, from the nettle of Saddam Hussein's aggression we can pluck the flower of lasting peace in the middle east.

1.57 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Douglas Hurd): This has been a strong and thoughtful debate, and the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) has just made a strong and thoughtful speech. There have been no differences in the analysis of the aggression, or about what needs to be done to reverse it; there has been the occasional difference over how to do that but, with some tiny exceptions, we have had a calm debate.

Nevertheless, the fact is that there is anxiety, there is tension and there is danger in the air. I found the same in the Gulf when I visited our own communities there. It is worth remembering that we have many more subjects in the Gulf and the surrounding countries than any other foreign country has—nearly 40,000, in all kinds of occupations and professions. I found them overwhelmingly leading normal lives and reading with amazement the accounts of their being gripped by panic, or of the area being on the edge of war.

That is because the days of immediate, acute danger have passed, thanks to the prompt response of the United States and the United Kingdom above all. Often as I went around and listened to the thanks that we received for that action and saw the high level of trust and standing in which we are now held in those Gulf states I thought of the old proverb, "He gives twice who gives quickly". I learned that there are several Arab equivalents to that proverb.

The aggressor is still in Kuwait. The wrong has not been put right and therefore the danger is still there. We have to build up pressures on the aggressor until they become intolerable and Iraq has to leave Kuwait. I believe that there are three pressures—isolation, sanctions, and the certainty that he will lose. I shall say a word about each of those three.

First, I must pick up on one of the refrains of this debate, which was quite naturally the hostages. When I speak of hostages, I am not forgetting those held in Lebanon. There was a timely petition at the beginning of today's debate. I am not forgetting Mr. Richter who is in prison in Baghdad or Mr. Cooper who is in prison in Iran. We are in touch with the relatives of all these people.

I shall say a few words about the much larger number of hostages in Iraq and Kuwait. The House represents those people and their families. In the debate it was striking that not one hon. Member argued that because of the plight, anxiety, unhappiness and suffering of the hostages and their families we should weaken or temper this country's resistance to aggression. That is a striking and welcome fact, and I believe that they accept that. It is a hard thing to say, but a necessary thing to say. In return, they are entitled to something that they have—our undertaking that we shall not forget them or in any way relax our efforts to get them out safe and sound.

Let me give a few facts about the hostages. A total of 510 nationals have now been evacuated from Iraq and Kuwait since 1 September. The first group of 206 came on an Iraqi Airways flight from Baghdad on 1 September, and the second group of 57 came by Virgin Airways flight from Amman on the fifth. I am glad to say that, as the House knows, the third group arrived in the early hours of this morning—247 women and children from Amman on a British Airways flight. We believe that about 240 British women and children are in Baghdad waiting for exit visas from the Iraqi authorities. We and our embassy hope that we can arrange for their evacuation by Iraqi Airways to Amman and then by a British airline to London on Sunday 9 September.

Most of those people originated from Kuwait and were moved to Baghdad either in bus convoys arranged by the British embassy in Kuwait or by the Iraqis. We think it likely, although we cannot be sure, that almost all the women and children who wish to leave Kuwait have now had the opportunity to do so. Many are still there having decided, given the agonising and intolerable choice, that they would rather stay with their husbands.

I asked our ambassador, Mr. Walker, to go back to our embassy in Baghdad after the invasion. I am glad that our embassy there is at full strength. The staff there are working day and night to find the facts, to find the people and to help them home safe and sound.

At our embassy in Kuwait the ambassador and three colleagues are blockaded in. Nothing can come in as it is ringed by armed soldiers and no one can go out. Despite that, through the warden system, they have been able to organise two sizeable convoys from Kuwait to Baghdad.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward), who explained to the House why he could not be here, made an effective speech on this subject. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I have seen for ourselves, the work that he has done in the Connaught Rooms with Gulf Helpline has been notable. Of course, he is quite right and we in the Foreign Office have to learn lessons from the first few weeks after the invasion in particular. I hope that the media listened to the remarks of my hon. Friend and will have noted the strong support in all parts of the House for the points that he made, not only on his own behalf but on behalf of the hostages and, more particularly, their relatives and friends in this country.

I turn to the wider question which, quite rightly, has been a big refrain in the debate. I refer to the evacuees at the three camps in Jordan and elsewhere. They comprise Asians and Arabs, but overwhelmingly Asians who have fled from Saddam Hussein. There are now at least 60,000 new refugees or evacuees in the three camps in Jordan. A total of 190,000 refugees have so far been repatriated from Jordan by a mixture of various commercial flights and flights organised by individual Governments and the international relief organisations.

Yesterday, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave details of the help that we have provided, including the £5·5 million given to the International Organisation for Migration. The IOM is organising 55 flights over the next few days to repatriate 9,000 refugees, most of them Sri Lankans and Bangladeshis.

I listened carefully to the ideas put forward in the debate, notably by hon. Friends the Member for Arundel

[Mr. Douglas Hurd]

(Sir M. Marshall) and for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price). We shall see which of those ideas are practicable. A crucial point made to me by the Crown Prince Hassan of Jordan, who has particularly interested himself in the question, is that we do not want to establish fresh camps. Jordan has enough camps full of refugees. What is needed now is to get those refugees home. Of course, they must be fed and be given the medicine that they need as soon as possible, but above all we must get them home. We want to get on with doing that as part of the international effort. We have already helped to co-ordinate evacuation flights through the IOM, and we are looking urgently——

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hurd: May I please get on?

We are looking urgently at further areas of help. I have asked my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development to go to Jordan early next week—on Tuesday, I hope—to supervise our part in the operation and to assess what else needs to be done.

I turn to the three pressures on the aggressor that I mentioned earlier. The first is isolation. Yesterday, the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) made a notable speech about the unique coalition that has been formed between the United States, Canada and Europe, co-ordinated through the Western European Union.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Will my right hon. Friend allow me to intervene? Is he aware that I have attended every moment of this debate, both yesterday and today, because I believe that it is the most important debate since I first entered the House 20 years ago? It has been very heartening to witness the degree of support that exists in the House. Is my right hon. Friend aware also that the European Parliament is holding an emergency debate next Wednesday, when the other countries of Europe will be able to express their support for the action that has been taken, their abhorrence at the barbarity that has occurred, and their determination that no gain should come of it?

Mr. Hurd: Any expression, particularly by elected representatives in whatever Parliament, which rams home the lesson that my hon. Friend mentions—as that of the Inter-Parliamentary Union has already done—will be very welcome.

I mentioned the isolation of the aggressor and the coalition that has been formed against him. I visited some of the Gulf states and talked to some of the leaders of the Arab part of that coalition. I hope to visit Egypt—one of the other major leaders—before too long.

Mr. Ron Brown: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way now?

Mr. Hurd: No, I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman. I have a good deal of ground to cover in replying to right hon. and hon. Members who have already spoken.

I found our Arab friends—the majority of those in the Arab League—staunch in the face of the current situation. One or two, such as the Kuwait Government in exile, are naturally impatient, but in all the conversations that I had with Governments, I found an understanding that patience is needed as well as firmness. It was interesting that the journalists accompanying me were constantly asking the Arabs whether they would remain constant and firm, whereas the Arabs were constantly asking me whether we in the west would remain constant and firm. I think that the truth is that both will, but it was borne in on me how much mutual reassurance is needed all the time. I welcome the news that the right hon. Member for Gorton will be going to the middle east because he will contribute to that process.

In my conversations, particularly with King Fahd and his notable Foreign Minister, Prince Saud, I found a concern about all those who are looking for a middle way which falls short of the resolutions of the Security Council and the Arab League. I want to say a word about that, particularly in connection with what has been said in the House about Jordan.

I do not believe that the Jordanian Government or the King of Jordan have in some way been an accomplice or a tool of Saddam Hussein. In his conversations with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and with me the day before yesterday the king made it clear that he believed that the annexation of Kuwait was unjustified, that it must end and that Jordan must apply the mandatory sanctions.

As many hon. Members have pointed out, Jordan is an old friend and deserves of us understanding of her real problems. We have shown that understanding on the clear assumption that Jordan fully applies the mandatory sanctions.

Mr. Heffer: In that case, surely the Government could do something about organising an immediate airlift of refugees out of Jordan. If the right hon. Gentleman is saying that that is to happen, let us have some concrete action immediately.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman must have missed what I was saying five minutes ago. That is what is happening. The money that we are contributing to the IOM is financing flights day by day. I gave the figures earlier.

Mr. Heffer: That is not enough.

Mr. Ron Brown: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hurd: No.

Mr. Brown: The right hon. Gentleman is being selective.

Mr. Hurd: Yes, I am being selective, as is my right.

What is not right or realistic—this is where we part company with the Jordanian analysis—is to search for some compromise which falls short of the full reversing of the aggression. We—the international community—cannot afford to allow Saddam Hussein to go smiling home out of Kuwait with two islands or an oilfield in his pocket. The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) was clear about that, and his analysis was very good.

Occasionally, I read in the newspapers accounts of supposed equivocation in the Saudi attitude. Prince Saud made it clear to me and to the BBC publicly that if the Arabs were to allow or to contemplate such a middle way, falling short of the reversal of aggression, the Arabs would have settled for something less, something lower than the international community was insisting on. He, one of the prime leaders of the Arab part of our coalition, was clear that the Arabs would not, and could not afford to, go down that particular path.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Before the right hon. Gentleman leaves that matter, will he clarify one point that seems to be in doubt? The Prime Minister said yesterday that she felt that she had the legal authority under the charter to take military action without going back to the Security Council. Could the right hon. Gentleman tell the House whether the Government believe that they have the right to take military action against Iraq without the consent of the Saudi Government?

Mr. Hurd: I shall come to the question of military action a little later if I may.

I come now to the points made by many hon. Members about the Palestinian question and the welcome that was given to what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said yesterday on the subject. I have been saying the same thing on my journeys around the Gulf. This is another dispute and another, though different, set of fears and injustices. We in the western part of the coalition have to show that we understand that. Saddam Hussein has given the Palestinians a major blow and the major mistake that Mr. Arafat has made in supporting him simply illustrates the point. They have postponed the day when the question can be justly and equitably settled, and the Palestinians need to understand that. However, we need to show that we have not forgotten. I have discussed this matter twice with Mr. Baker, the United States Secretary of State, since the invasion. As the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister did, I welcome what he said and the prominence given to his words when he spoke to the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives. His use of the word "springboard" was apt, and we must build on it. I am sure that the House would wish us to do so.

I am sorry that I missed the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow). He referred to a war of ideas. He was right to say that getting the right messages through to Iraq is crucial. At every port of call in the Gulf I discussed with our friends how we and they could help each other to make that happen.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): As broadcasts in Iraq are jammed, would there be some merit in considering, with the United Nations, a leaflet drop to its population?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend has already mentioned that to me, and I shall ensure that, despite the obvious difficulties, his suggestion is considered.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Hurd: I have a certain amount of ground still to cover, so I should prefer not to take any further interventions. Otherwise, I shall not conclude by 2.30 pm.

I come to the second form of pressure on the aggressor —that of sanctions. I draw attention to the press notice just issued by the Department of Trade and Industry, which reminds British business men of the severe penalties that they will suffer if they break the sanctions. I need not say a great deal about that as the ground was fully covered by my right hon. and hon. Friends yesterday. The oil trade on which Iraq relies for its foreign currency has been virtually stopped. Iraq will not run out of oil, but it should run out of money. Quite apart from the difficulties of getting other goods into Iraq, the number of people who would be prepared to supply Iraq without payment will be fairly limited. That illustrates the importance of the points made by the Leader of the Opposition yesterday about finances. As he said, it is crucial that the financial tap is turned off. That means that all Governments must ensure that Iraq cannot trade, cannot obtain access to Kuwait's assets and cannot find ways around UN sanctions to secure credit or cash.

We froze Kuwaiti assets in Britain within hours to prevent their seizure by Iraq. Iraqi assets were frozen by Britain and by the European Community on 4 August. We must follow up all possible signs of financial and trading violations of the United Nations sanctions, and that includes working to ensure that Iraq's financial oxygen is turned off.

I want to say a word about foodstuffs because that will be a major subject for discussion during the next few weeks. Several hon. Members have refered to that in the debate. We have a clear view on that, and on the reference in the Security Council resolution to the supply of foodstuffs on humanitarian grounds. It is necessary to establish that a humanitarian need exists. It is for the Security Council, as the author of the resolution, and not for individual states, to make that determination. The details of that are now under active discussion in the sanctions committee in New York and it may be that an objective examination of the case is needed. The House will surely agree that we cannot allow Saddam Hussein, the aggressor, to manipulate the subject to his own advantage. The humanitarian clause must be objectively assessed and decided by those who are responsible for the resolution.

I do not want, and neither do I have the time, to go into detailed questions of past dealings with Iraq. I expect that there will be occasions on which the House will return to that matter, when the historians will pore over it. I was asked about a particular office. Any office in Britain that is run by anyone is subject to our law. That has meant that no Iraqi office in the past could be used for the procurement of arms or banned technology. That has been the position since our arms embargo took effect more than 10 years ago. At present, no such office can be used for the procurement of any goods that are subject to sanctions, and they cover virtually the entire range. We must be vigilant, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has to operate within our rules. If there were evidence of any office run by anyone operating against our laws, that would lead to prosecution and the consequences of that if any individual were found guilty.

Mr. Nellist: Will the Secretary of State give way on that point?

Mr. Hurd: As I warned the House, I have more ground to cover; I would rather get on with my speech.

The third pressure—

Mr. Nellist: But it affects the factory in Coventry.

Mr. Hurd: I made no reference to Coventry.

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) must resume his seat.

Mr. Hurd: The third pressure on the aggressor should be, and is, the certainty that he will lose. The more I think about it and the more I listen to people throughout the world, the more I believe that it is the crucial pressure. The House has accepted that it is. We were told in the press that the House would be dominated by legal argument about article 51 and the basis of self-defence. That has not turned out to be so. The House has accepted—not universally, but overwhelmingly, and certainly that is the position between the two Front Benches—that the military option cannot be excluded. The Leader of the Opposition, in the legal part of his speech, accepted that one basis for that could be article 51 joined with a request from the Kuwaiti Government.

The great preoccupation with legalisms, which could have spoiled the debate substantially, has not occurred. The legal question is not for discussion. The question which is being discussed is the wisdom and efficacy of the way in which we should proceed and not so much the legal basis.

We believe that it must be right to hold together to the greatest possible extent the coalition of which I have spoken. That must be sensible and right. It must be right to time and organise measures with that aim in mind. I ask those who have emphasised that—I listened carefully to the hon. Member for Walsall, North and others who emphasised this approach—to consider a further matter. It cannot be right to put the choice entirely and wholly within the machinery of the United Nations. We know that machinery. We know that it includes vetoes and—[Interruption.] That reaction suggests that some hon. Members have not seriously considered the matter. We cannot leave open the possibility that necessary action against the aggressor would be blocked by such means. If we were to leave open that possibility, we would leave open the possibility that he might go away rejoicing in possession of Kuwait. The House has undertaken and said that the first priority must be to prevent that from happening.

The logic of the argument points to two conclusions. First, it must be right to keep together to the maximum extent the coalition of which we are talking. Secondly, and crucially, it cannot be right wholly to subordinate our action to the machinery of United Nations. The right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), who was the proponent of the argument, is creating an uncertainty where certainty is necessary. The certainty that the aggressor will lose—that he will be be stopped, to use the expression of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister—is crucial to a peaceful solution. If that certainty is qualified by some doubt, by some feeling in the mind of the aggressor that he might escape with his booty, the chances of a peaceful solution are reduced.

Mr. Dalyell rose——

Mr. Hurd: I must get on. Some queries have been raised that I shall solve by carrying on, as I said I would do.

There have been questions about command and control. I have consulted my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence. Earlier, he spoke of the work in process to ensure that the command and control arrangements are properly co-ordinated in the region. The first priority has been to get forces into the region to ensure the defence of Saudi Arabia and other states. The work now is to ensure that the forces of the different countries are properly co-ordinated, and that work is in hand.

As for air operations, each nation retains command of its own forces, but arrangements for effective co-ordination have been made, and are being strengthened, between the Saudis, the United States and us. The naval forces are already being co-ordinated. I saw that when I visited HMS Battleaxe in Doha harbour. As more ships arrive, that work will become more complex and there will be meetings in the next few days to strengthen the co-ordination, including that taking place through the Western European Union.

There has rightly been much reference to the future. On my visit to the Gulf, I found that the more forward-looking people were looking ahead to the future, and we should do so also.

There has been some autobiography during the debate and I shall not weary the House with mine. The first time I went to the Gulf was with my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), when we were in opposition, arguing strongly against the policy of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) of withdrawal from the Gulf. In 1971, it was judged that it was too late to reverse that decision, and the orthodoxy for years after that was that there was no place in the collective security of the Gulf for a western effort. That orthodoxy has been challenged twice in the past few years, not by us, but by the states in the area. During the Iran-Iraq war, and again in the past few days, they have asked us back. That is the background to the discussion of the future.

There is no question of imposing a system; it has to be collective, perhaps through the United Nations, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister suggested. It must include the effort to deal with weapons, the dangers of which have been stressed in this debate. We cannot be more precise at present. I simply say, and I hope that the House will agree, that if there were such a collective effort, invitation and request, our history, aptitudes and interests would incline us to agree.

What is at stake has been fairly clearly identified in the House. The moving speech of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) illustrates from his angle, and with his vocabulary and experience, the point in many of our minds. We all share the hope of a better world order, and we all know that that has ceased to be a platitude and a hope so distant that we just talk about it and nothing happens. It has become almost a real hope because of the ending of the cold war, the leadership given by the United States' President and the welcome change in the policies of President Gorbachev. I shall be in Moscow next week and have an opportunity to explore those points with Mr. Shevardnadze.

Some people, particularly Opposition Members, talk of this development in terms of great aspirations and the brotherhood of man. I see it in more traditional, Tory terms, a concert of nations, and so does the right hon. Member for Leeds, East, who is a good Tory under the skin. I see it in Tory terms as an increasingly effective concert of nations acting in sensible self interest for the preservation and extension of international order. The real question for the House is whether this moment of brightness and reassurance, which the House has often discussed and which we have seen in the past 12 months across Europe, South Africa and elsewhere, is a purely fleeting moment or whether we can make it endure.

At stake is, of course, the future of Kuwait, the future of the hostages and the happiness and peace of many hundreds of thousands of people. But something else is at stake. If this coalition which has been formed against aggression holds together and reverses the aggression, the prospects of which I have been talking remain good.

If it does not—if, despite the new efficiency of the UN, despite the coalition, despite the European cohesion, despite the excellent leadership of the United States and despite the adhesion of the majority of the Arab world —then we are back into anarchy punctuated by explosions of force. The clouds would have extinguished that possible light and hope.

So we must do all we can to prevent that defeat and to secure that success and that reversal of aggression. We are working and shall work hard for that purpose. We shall work on the side of international order and, therefore, on the side of hope.

Mr. Dalyell rose——

It being half-past Two o'clock, MR. SPEAKER proceeded, pursuant to the Resolution yesterday, to put the Question already proposed from the Chair.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

WRIT ISSUED DURING THE ADJOURNMENT

MR. SPEAKER acquainted the House that he had issued, during the Adjournment, a warrant for a new writ for the borough constituency of Eastbourne in the room of Ian Reginald Edward Gow, Esq, deceased.

Oral Answers to Questions

SOCIAL SECURITY

Social Fund

1. Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many and what percentage of income support claimants aged under 60 years are repaying social fund loans by deductions from their benefit payments.

3. Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many and what percentage of income support claimants aged under 60 years are repaying social fund loans by deductions from their benefit payments.

The Minister for Social Security and Disabled People (Mr. Nicholas Scott): At the end of August this year 384,207 social fund loans were being recovered from income support recipients aged under 60, representing 13·3 per cent. of income support recipients in that age group.

Mr. Wareing: Now that the Government have succeeded in their objective of further impoverishing the poor, is not it time that they began to listen to their Social Security Advisory Committee which, in its seventh report, said that in no way was the social fund curing or assisting in alleviating poverty for the very poorest people? Will the Minister give an assurance that he will immediately implement the recommendation that loans for capital items should not have to be repaid, and that he will take steps to ensure that loans that are provided are repaid at a level at which poor people are not driven to go to commercial moneylenders?

Mr. Scott: I would accept neither that there has been an increase in poverty in this country in the past 10 years, nor that the social fund is not doing an important and sensitive job in meeting need where it needs to be met. Some 2·4 million loans are now being given at a cost of about £334 million and half a million grants at a cost of £131 million. They have been targeted on those who need help most.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Will my right hon. Friend assure me that persons who applied for capital allocations under the single payment scheme year after year are not doing exactly the same for the same items under the present system? Does he recall an occasion when one of my constituents applied for over £600-worth of capital items, which she got, and the following year applied for identical items, which she did not get? What happens now? Can people now get loans for the same items, and is a careful record kept?

Mr. Scott: We keep careful records on each claimant's patterns of applications for loans. After a year, there might be a renewed need for a particular item, but we seek to counter abuse as actively as possible.

Mr. Sillars: Is the Minister of State aware that people come to my surgery who have been denied a social fund loan, not on the basis that they have no need, but because the Department's calculation is that they could not repay it. The need does not disappear. Those people then have to go to private moneylenders, where the minimum rate at the moment is 75 per cent. How can the right hon. Gentleman justify that?

Mr. Scott: I am interested that the hon. Gentleman has a number of constituents in that position, as about 1·6 per cent. of cases are turned down on the basis that the claimant is unable to repay the loan. In those circumstances, it would be wrong for us to give a loan to the applicant. Alternative sources of funds are suggested to those claimants and they are offered advice on how to manage their affairs.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Has the Minister had time to study the case that I sent to the Secretary of State, about a young lady in Southend-on-Sea who applied for a social fund loan because she was allocated a council house in place of bed-and-breakfast accommodation, and was told that that could not be regarded as a priority within the limited budget? When I pointed out that the young lady had just come out of prison, she was given the grant because apparently that is a priority under the guidance given by the Department. While the Secretary of State is considering that case, will the Minister try to ease bureaucracy in the DSS by putting up a notice in every department saying, "If you have been to prison please advise the staff, because that could be to your financial advantage"?

Mr. Scott: My hon. Friend will not expect me to comment on the particular case that is being considered by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. The guidance that is issued by my right hon. Friend is supplemented by guidance on local needs that may exist in a particular area, but the final decision is made by independent social fund officers who can use their discretion and take account of that guidance as they see fit.

Mr. Meacher: How can a person on income support be expected to get by with deductions on social fund repayments when Matthew Parris, a former Tory Member of Parliament, could not get by for one week on income support, even without social fund repayments? Is not it impossibly difficult for the nearly 500,000 poorest families on social fund deductions, not only to repay their social fund loan, but to pay any housing, electricity, gas and water charge arrears and now also poll tax deductions? Have the Government reached the ultimate absurdity of denying loans to the poorest families who need them most because those families are too poor to repay?

Mr. Scott: If I may say so without referring back to the alleged experience of our previous colleague, 2·4 million loans have been made at a cost of £334 million. It seems better that that money should go interest free to people who need it than that people should be led into the hands of loan sharks, as was mentioned earlier in this exchange.

Attendance Allowance

2. Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many disabled people in Bradford have had attendance allowance suspended, pending review, over the past year; and how many have had (a) the decision to suspend upheld and (b) their review application upheld and arrears paid.

Mr. Scott: Attendance allowance is suspended pending a review only if there is reason to suspect that the claimant no longer satisfies the conditions for the benefit. Statistics are not kept on the number of those suspensions, though their numbers are likely to be very small.

Mr. Madden: Does the Minister accept that it is distressing and worrying for any benefit recipient to have benefit suspended and income cut? Will he give an assurance that his Department is not targeting disabled people in Bradford or elsewhere, because there certainly are suspicions that a cost-cutting exercise is under way and that disabled people are being made the victims of it in an unnecessary and unacceptable way?

Mr. Scott: That happens rarely, so rarely that we do not collect the statistics. Benefit would be suspended if a claimant returned his order book, if there were a change in his care needs or if a person were in hospital for longer than four weeks or in prison, and therefore was not in need of attendance allowance. Those are the circumstances in which suspension might be considered.

Mr. John Greenway: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the number of recipients of attendance allowance and other disability benefits has increased dramatically under this Government in the past 10 years? Can he tell the House what arrangements he proposes to include in the social security Bill in the next Session to ensure that those who apply for benefits have their applications dealt with smoothly and that we reduce the number of appeals?

Mr. Scott: We shall certainly improve the administration of the new disability allowance, which will subsume the present attendance allowance, and the methods of assessment, with reduced reliance on medical evidence. We shall also substantially lower the benchmark that people need to qualify for the new benefit.

Mr. Cryer: How can the Minister claim that the incidence of attendance allowances being suspended pending a review is sparse when there are no statistics to demonstrate the case one way or the other? Does he accept that there are far too many cases and that it would be fairer if the benefits were continued pending any review that the Department seeks to invoke? People feel harshly treated and must often make great sacrifices and endure hardship as a result of those reviews, most of which result in the back payments being made.

Mr. Scott: Obviously, we take account of the experiences of our local offices in deciding whether there is a problem in any benefit area. If there appears to be a problem, we move swiftly to tackle it. There is no evidence of such a problem in this instance.

Personal Pensions

5. Mr. Donald Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the latest estimate of the numbers who have taken out personal pensions.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mrs. Gillian Shephard): A total of 4·1 million people have so far taken out a personal pension.

Mr. Thompson: I thank my hon. Friend for that satisfactory answer. Will she comment on the Labour party's policy? Having frightened pensioners——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a bad habit. In this Session can we stick to the Government's policies at Question Time?

Mr. Thompson: I am sure that it will not be the Government's policy to frighten potential pensioners as it is the policy of the Labour party.

Mrs. Shephard: My hon. Friend is right. The Government's policy is to encourage choice in pensions so that people can remain in SERPS, take out a personal pension or belong to an occupational pension scheme. It would not be the Government's intention to "turn the pensions market on its head."

Mr. Frank Field: As the Government do not believe in bucking the market, will the Minister tell the House why she feels that the proposals need to be subsidised from the national insurance fund? Will she tell the House to what extent the national insurance fund has been raided in an attempt to make the scheme a success?

Mrs. Shephard: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that the Government of which he was a member also introduced incentives for changes in social security policy. He will also know that the major cost of personal pensions is not the 2 per cent. incentive but the cost of rebates, as it would be for occupational pensions. The incentive represents less than 2 per cent. of the total income of the national insurance fund.

Mr. Butler: If contracting out of the state system has proved so popular, does my hon. Friend have any plans to extend the principle?

Mrs. Shephard: I have already said that the Government are in favour of choice in pensions policy and no doubt we shall be looking for ways to extend the principle of choice.

Mr. Flynn: Will the Minister treat us to a rare moment of honesty on this matter——

Hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a little harsh. Will the hon. Gentleman withdraw that phrase?

Mr. Flynn: I shall withdraw it. I did say "rare". I was not suggesting that the Minister is constantly dishonest.

Will the Minister admit that this has nothing to do with choice? The Government are trying to shuffle off their responsibility to 4·1 million people, who will find when their pensions are paid, as independent sources have shown, that at least 1 million of them have been badly advised and bribed out of a good scheme that has been running for a long time. Will the Government give us an undertaking that all those who have been misled out of the pension scheme will be told when it is in their best interest financially to return to the national insurance scheme?

Mrs. Shephard: The matter was fully rehearsed during the passage of the Social Security Bill this year, so the hon. Gentleman will know that all those marketing personal pensions must belong to the Life Assurance and Unit Trust Regulatory Organisation or the Financial Intermediaries, Managers and Brokers Regulatory Organisation and have to observe a code of conduct about the best advice that has to be given to the customer. The hon. Gentleman and his party do not like the success of the extension of choice.

Family Credit

7. Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many families are now in receipt of family credit.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The number of families receiving family credit has risen in each month during 1990. The latest available information is for the end of July, by which stage the caseload had reached 323,000. That is the highest ever level since the scheme began.

Mr. Arbuthnot: Is it correct that the Government are carrying out a successful campaign to publicise family credit and does my hon. Friend agree that the Government's commitment to the family is well demonstrated by the fact that this year nearly £5,500 million is being paid in social security benefits to low-income families? Is it true that when the Labour party was in power, it cut benefits to families?

Mrs. Shephard: Family credit certainly represents an important part of the Government's policy for the family. Interestingly, on average the amounts payable in family credit come to £30 a week but over 15 per cent. of family credit recipients receive £50 or more. The advertising campaign increased not only applications but the level of awareness of that worthwhile benefit.

Mr. Pike: Is the Minister concerned about people who take part-time work and thereby become ineligible for family credit, who would be better off being out of work and claiming benefit and income support? Is not it time that the Government did something to help them?

Mrs. Shephard: I think that the hon. Gentleman is referring to the cases of certain ancillary workers, of which I am aware. The chief adjudication officer has issued further guidance for those cases and we are considering its effects carefully. It was clearly never our intention that families should find themselves unable to get income support or family credit.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Will my hon. Friend confirm that every family who is receiving family credit is also receiving child allowance? Will she confirm that income support, whether it be family credit, supplementary benefit or other systems, has always taken the child allowance into account? Does she agree that instead of referring to child benefit, we should refer to child allowance, so that we can agree with our right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, who said on 17 March 1981 that the tax and benefits system should always take account of people who have children and that it is a matter not of income support but of child allowance?

Mrs. Shephard: I thank my hon. Friend for that contribution, which was as interesting as one has come to expect from him. All families with children receive child benefit for each child. As for the name of the benefit, I quite like child benefit.

Social Fund

8. Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many and what percentage of income support claimants aged under 60 years are repaying social fund loans by deductions from their benefit payments.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my earlier reply to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing).

Mr. Michael: May I refer the Minister to his reply and ask that he listens to his own words? Does he agree that it is outrageous for a Minister to admit that there are people who are getting such a low income from the Government that they cannot afford to repay a loan and that therefore the Government refuse them a loan? Is not it outrageous for him to say that they will get not help but only advice from the Government? Is not he aware that he is talking about the poorest people of our society who want help, not advice from him and his Department?

Mr. Scott: As I said—perhaps the hon. Gentleman did not hear my reply—only a tiny percentage of people are refused help on the basis that they are unable to repay a loan. Some people may be refused loans but be given a community care grant instead.

Mr. McAllion: It has been alleged that the Department is about to issue instructions to the officers who administer the social fund that they must keep within budget next year on pain of disciplinary action. Will the Minister take this opportunity to deny any such possibility being considered by the Department, and does he agree that the only condition that should be applied to social fund applications is whether the applicant needs help from the social fund?

Mr. Scott: It is the duty of local office managers so to manage their budgets that they stay within them over the year. Last year, we gave extra help to local offices that were under stress, which showed the continuing flexibility of the social fund.

Maintenance

9. Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received on his proposals to ensure that fathers pay maintenance.

The Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): I have received correspondence on this subject from one of the major lone-parent organisations, members of the public and other interested parties. We shall shortly publish full details of our proposals in a White Paper.

Mr. Favell: Any plans that my right hon. Friend has to ensure that fathers recognise their duties to children, whom they helped bring into the word, will be most welcome. Does he have any plans to point out to single mothers—mothers who have never been married—the enormous pressures that will be put on them by having children while they are unmarried? Any Member of Parliament hears from teachers, pressure groups, social workers and so on how enormously difficult it is for single mothers.

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend's very helpful suggestions range rather wider than my specific remit for social security, but, indeed, our policies on child maintenance range beyond social security. I am concerned that we should have a clear-cut, more workable system to ensure that where maintenance can properly be expected it is paid. That is in the interests of lone parents, whatever the cause of the lone parenthood, and, above all, in the interests of children.

Ms. Abbott: Is the Minister aware that there is widespread support for the idea that fathers should take responsibility for their families but that there is also widespread fear that the proposals represent a backdoor way of cutting maintenance for single mothers? Will the right hon. Gentleman assure the House that no single mother will be worse off as a result of the proposals and of whatever legislation may arise from them than she would otherwise have been?

Mr. Newton: I think that the hon. Lady referred to cutting maintenance. Clearly, the aim of the proposals as a whole is to increase the amount of maintenance that is paid. But perhaps the hon. Lady simply made a verbal slip.

I cannot attempt today to anticipate all the details of the White Paper that we shall publish, but our aim is to improve the position of lone parents and, not least, to provide them with a better platform on the basis of which they can work if they wish.

Mrs. Roe: Can my right hon. Friend provide the House with figures to show the proportion of absent parents who are currently providing maintenance?

Mr. Newton: Yes. I can do that in round figures. Maintenance is paid in about one third of all the cases in which it might be expected. For lone parents on income support, maintenance is paid in slightly less than a quarter of cases. Both figures are too low and one of our aims will be to increase them.

Ms. Short: Everyone is in favour of fathers maintaining their children. Is the Secretary of State interested only in saving the Treasury money or does he agree with the Labour party that lone parents and their children should be helped to escape from a life of poverty and given a chance to be independent and therefore better off?

We all know that, under the present Government, increasing numbers of lone parents have been forced to live on benefits—by cuts in child benefit and by the removal of the right to claim the costs of child care when working part time. We need encouragement to fathers to pay maintenance, but surely we also need an increase in child benefit and a chance for lone parents to have access to child care and training so that they can escape from poverty and so that they and their children may be better off.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Lady may be mildly surprised to hear me say that somewhere, buried in her question, was a general proposition—about seeking to encourage independence and the like—with which I would certainly agree, although I accept that there may turn out to be detailed differences of opinion between the hon. Lady and me about precisely how those objectives are to be achieved. I hope that I shall carry her with me on this, however: the Government have already taken a number of steps to improve the working of the system, even within the existing arrangements—including, most notably, a substantial increase in the earnings disregard for lone parents in respect of housing benefit, which has taken place this very month.

Mr. Burns: Is my right hon. Friend aware that any proposals that come before the House will take a considerable time to be implemented because of the pressure of parliamentary business? In the meantime, my constituents and those of other hon. Members will suffer severely because their ex-husbands refuse to pay them maintenance and can use delaying tactics in the court—for example, in the provision of the relevant and necessary proof of earnings and so on—and so evade giving any funding for their former families. Is there anything that my right hon. Friend and his Department can do in the meantime to help those ladies who are in genuine financial difficulties as a result of that practice?

Mr. Newton: I do not think that we can solve these problems entirely without the proposals that we shall be bringing forward, which will obviously take a little time. But there are things that we can do and, indeed, that we are doing. The Social Security Act 1990, which was passed during the summer and of which the relevant provisions are just coming into effect, gives us power to transfer DSS maintenance orders to a claimant who is going off income support and gives the DSS power to enforce a claimant's own maintenance order if that would be helpful. Both those provisions are directed at solving precisely the problems to which my hon. Friend referred.

Carers

10. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he will take to investigate the problems of full-time carers.

Mr. Newton: A report based on research commissioned by the Department into the effectiveness of invalid care allowance as an income-maintenance benefit is expected to be published in the next few months. Our concern to improve the support available to carers, is reflected in a range of Government policies, including the extension of invalid care allowance to married women and the introduction earlier this month of a carers premium in the income-related benefits.

Mr. Cousins: Does the Minister recognise that without the help of about 1 million full-time carers, the hospitals and social services systems in this country would have collapsed long ago and that, for the most part, all that work goes unrewarded and unrecognised? Does he also recognise that the invalid care allowance is a very limited contribution and the extension to married women was wrung out of the Government by the European Court? Will the Minister now make the extension of a care allowance system to all carers an absolute priority? As a basic minimum, will he offer all full-time carers national insurance credits so that they are not disadvantaged for pensions and unemployment benefit when their period of full-time caring ceases?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman may seek to minimise what has been done, but when this Government took office, the number of people receiving invalid care allowance was less than 10,000. It is now well over 100,000 and that is making a substantial contribution. That, together with the other improvements that we have made, including the increased earnings disregard for those on invalid care allowance, which was introduced last April, and the carers premium, which is being introduced this month, show our real concern to help those about whom the hon. Gentleman is also rightly concerned.

Mr. Conway: Will my right hon. Friend remind the House about the change of provision for those requiring full-time care who are suffering from terminal diseases such as cancer? Will he also pay credit to organisations like the Macmillan nurses, which enable those suffferers to have dignity in their own homes at that stressful time and which very much welcome the changes the Department is making to ensure that help arrives in time and is worth while?

Mr. Newton: I should very much like to join in that tribute and I met a Macmillan nurse in my constituency on Saturday. The contribution made to the support of carers, which goes well beyond the social security system, is an important and encouraging feature of what is happening in our health and social services.

With regard to my hon. Friend's first point, I am delighted that we have been able to extend attendance allowance, without the old time limit, to the terminally ill. My hon. Friend might like to know that we expect 6,000 successful awards of invalid care allowance—in other words, a further increase in recipients of that benefit—to follow the extension of attendance allowance.

Dr. Godman: Will the Minister assure the House that he will do his level best to ensure that applications for that allowance are assessed as quickly as possible? At my surgeries I have found that informal carers have had to wait far too long for the assessment of their applications. Will the Minister look again at the too-harsh criteria by which such applications are assessed by his officials?

Mr. Newton: I am always looking for ways to improve that and other parts of the social security system. I shall bear in mind what the hon. Gentleman has said. With regard to the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, I can give him an unequivocal yes. There is no doubt that delays in processing ICA, partly because of the rapid expansion of the benefit, became longer than we wished and we will continue to do everything possible to reduce them.

National Insurance

13. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the latest estimate of the number of standard rate taxpayers who would be affected by the abolition of the upper earnings limit on national insurance contributions.

Mr. Newton: If the upper earnings limit for employees' national insurance contributions were removed, about 3·3 million people would pay more contributions, of whom about 2·1 million would be standard rate taxpayers and about another 500,000 self-employed people, of whom about 200,000 would be standard rate taxpayers, would pay more contributions if the upper profits limit were also removed.

Mr. Nicholson: I am grateful for that valuable information, which my hon. Friends and I will certainly wish to use in the coming months. Does my right hon. Friend recall a previous occasion when rash and extravagant promises were made to sections of the electorate as bribes by the Labour party and then, once the Labour party had obtained power, those electors paid for those promises in higher inflation and taxation? Does my right hon. Friend believe that the British people will be taken in yet again?

Mr. Newton: I certainly do not believe that the British people will be taken in by a number of the things that were said in Blackpool 10 days ago and on several other occasions by the hon. Members for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) and for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short). It is relevant that the figures that I have just given the House clearly show how spurious was the attempt to pretend that basic rate taxpayers would not face extra bills as a result of Labour party policy.

Mr. Meacher: As the abolition of the upper earnings limit is intended to finance a desperately needed pension increase, is the Secretary of State ashamed that the 2 million poorest pensioners, who have no income but the state retirement pension or income support, have had a zero increase in their pension in real terms over the past 11 years? Is the right hon. Gentleman or the Prime Minister proud that, since 1979, all tax cuts to the rich have been paid for as a result of the Tory Government's breaking of the uprating link with earnings? Given that the Government have purloined £22 billion owing to pensioners over the past 11 years, is not it about time that the Government gave priority to the poorest pensioners rather than to the richest taxpayers?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman has not only a rare talent for hyperbole but a very short memory indeed. It is just a year, almost to the day, since the present Government put £200 million extra public money into increasing premiums in the income support system for older and more disabled pensioners. That is a clear indication of our concern to improve their position.

Disabled People

14. Sir David Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement about spending on disabled people since 1979.

Mr. Scott: Social security help for long-term sick and disabled people has increased in real terms by more than £4 billion since 1978-79 to a total of £8·3 billion in 1989-90. The proposals we outlined in "The Way Ahead", along with the changes announced in October 1989, will add some £300 million by 1993-94 and will give extra help to an estimated 850,000 people.

Sir David Price: Does my right hon. Friend accept that it would be churlish of the House not to acknowledge the improvements that he and his colleagues have made? Does he accept also that we have a long way to go before any of us can feel really satisfied that we are doing right by our disabled brethren and sisters? Will my right hon. Friend therefore acknowledge that many hon. Members, including myself for as long as I am in this House, will come back, like Oliver Twist, asking for more for the disabled until we feel that justice is really done?

Mr. Scott: I certainly agree that there are continuing needs for disabled people, despite the dramatic improvements that have been made over the past 10 years. They are not restricted simply to benefits. We also need a more co-ordinated approach to services for disabled people, improved access to our public buildings, and further efforts to bring technology to the service of people with disabilities.

Pensioners' Incomes

15. Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the latest trend in pensioners' real incomes since 1979.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I am pleased to be able to tell my hon. Friend that the latest available information shows that pensioners' average total net incomes grew by over 31 per cent. in real terms in the Government's first eight years of office.

Mr. Hughes: I thank my hon. Friend for her reply. Does she agree that it is very good news for pensioners? They will now know that, over a long period, the Government have taken seriously the standard of living of pensioners. Does my hon. Friend agree also that people who are just above benefit level are nevertheless living on small amounts of money and that, therefore, it is right that the Government should concentrate help on them and not make promises such as those made by Labour Members which they know that they cannot keep?

Mrs. Shephard: My hon. Friend is right when he says that there is a need to target help for pensioners, as for other groups. Pensioners with incomes from savings have seen their incomes increase by 130 per cent. Occupational pension income has also gone up, by 77 per cent. in that time. However, the Government are conscious that not all pensioners have been able to benefit from those increases in income, and that is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has just drawn the attention of the House to the £200 million package last year which helped 2·6 million pensioners.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: May we have an assurance that in next year's uprating of social security benefits and pensions the calculation will be based on this year's September year-on-year retail prices index? May we have an unconditional assurance on that matter from the Dispatch Box?

Mrs. Shephard: The hon. Gentleman knows that the current historical method of calculating upratings ensures that the benefits are protected against price increases over a measured period. In years when inflation falls after the new rates are set pensioners gain—that will be the case this year.

Benefit Payments

16. Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment has been made of the effect on financial incentives to work of changes over the past five years in social security benefit payments.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: One of the major aims of our policies in social security has been to maintain and, where possible, improve financial incentives to work, and we are constantly monitoring the effects of policy changes in this area.

Mr. Knapman: Does my hon. Friend agree that, as a result of our reforms, help is being targeted to where it is most needed and that, in particular, low-paid and wage-earning families cannot be worse off now because they work?

Mrs. Shepard: I agree. We have reformed the income-related benefits and restructured national insurance. We have also improved earnings disregards. By those means we have virtually eliminated the worst effects of the poverty trap and considerably alleviated the unemployment trap.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Hilda Murrell

53. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on his actions in relation to the investigation by West Mercia police into the case of Hilda Murrell.

The Attorney-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): As I informed the hon. Gentleman on 6 September, the Director of Public Prosecutions has decided that the available evidence in this case is insufficient to sustain a charge of murder against any person and has notified the chief constable of West Mercia accordingly. My own actions have been restricted to answering the hon. Gentleman's questions regarding the matter and writing to him to inform him of the Director's decision.

Mr. Dalyell: May I ask the Attorney-General a careful question of which I have given him notice? In the light of the convictions of Mr. McKenzie in respect of two murders based on his own confessions, why has the decision been taken not to prosecute him for the alleged murder of Hilda Murrell based on his own confession?

The Attorney-General: Mr. McKenzie was convicted of manslaughter on the ground of diminished responsibility, not of murder. The convictions are currently the subject of an appeal by Mr. McKenzie and are therefore sub judice. In the Murrell case further lines of inquiry suggested by the Director of Public Prosecutions did not produce evidence warranting the prosecution of Mr. McKenzie.

Mr. Fraser: Does the insufficiency of the evidence mean that the police are therefore looking for another suspect?

The Attorney-General: It means that there is no evidence sufficient to warrant a prosecution against anybody and, therefore, the case remains open.

Government Documents

57. Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Attorney-General if there are any plans to review the guidelines to Government Departments for the selection of documents for permanent preservation by the Public Record Office,.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): No, Sir. The guidelines on the selection of public records for permanent preservation are kept under review by the Public Record Office, for which the Lord Chancellor has ministerial responsibility. There are no current plans to make any alterations of substance to the guidelines.

Mr. Kennedy: May I bring to the attention of the Solicitor-General the written answers from each Government Department that were given to my hon. Friend the Member for Southport (Mr. Fearn) earlier this year? With the single exception of the Department of Trade and Industry, those Departments evaded answering directly what percentage of their files were passed on intact to the Public Record Office. The DTI admitted that, in 1989, under 5 per cent. of its files were passed over intact. Surely that suggests, once again, excessive secrecy at the heart of Whitehall. Should not more of those files be made available in their full form for the purpose of future records? Does the Solicitor-General recognise that, contrary to his response to my question, the shortfall in the number of intact files passed on highlights the need for a review of the system?

The Solicitor-General: I doubt whether that figure conveys the full picture. A large number of such files deal with personal instances, which are simply too numerous to be maintained in the public records. I find it hard to believe that the 5 per cent. figure arises except from the fact that the great majority have to be destroyed after 30 years. The guidelines are updated about every 10 years; they were updated in 1958, 1962, 1971 and 1983, and can be expected to be updated in about three or four years' time.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that I was amazed, if not astounded, when a constituent of mine who had been a prisoner-of-war in 1940—50 years ago—was told that he could not obtain his records for at least another 25 years because of state security? Is it possible that, in the world in which we live, 50 years on is too short a time and everybody has to wait 75 years before they can have the records of what they said then? How can such records in any way affect state security?

The Solicitor-General: If my hon. Friend looks at "Modern Public Records", the White Paper published in 1982, he will see that it explains the criteria for the selection of such records. Obviously, I do not know the position of my hon. Friend's constituent. It might well be that his records had been destroyed simply on the basis that they were personal.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: No.

Mr. Skinner: Why do not the Government bring the records really up to date and release the record of the statements and conversations between the ex-Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) and the Foreign Secretary? Why do not they release those statements today to clear up the arguments that we hear between those two?

The Solicitor-General: The hon. Gentleman looks fit and well, and I am sure that in 30, 40 or 50 years' time he will enjoy reading those records.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Community Care

17. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of applications for community care grants were refused in 1988-89, 1989-90 and the first half of 1990-91.

The Minister for Social Security and Disabled People (Mr. Nicholas Scott): The proportion of community care grants refused in 1988-89 was 48 per cent., in 1989-90 it was 54 per cent. and in the period April to August 1990 it was 55 per cent.

Mrs. Mahon: I am sure that the House will agree that those are disgusting statistics. Is the Minister aware that those shameful statistics represent people in need who, under the old system, would have been entitled to something? What preparations will be made and what money will be put into the system to meet the needs of the people who will be caught up in the imminent recession?

Mr. Scott: Only 4·4 per cent. of applications for community care grants were turned down because they were of insufficient priority—the substantial majority were turned down because they did not meet the basic eligibility test for the community care grant system. The statistics that I read out should be seen against the background of an increase of 66 per cent. for applications for community care grants and an increase of 50 per cent. in awards.

Mr. Dickens: Is not it a fact that the grants have to be examined very closely indeed because the Government are the custodians of taxpayers' money, and taxpayers do not have a bottomless pit of money? Therefore, the Government's policy of directing resources and targeting them closely on where they are needed is right and preserves the taxpayers' rights.

Mr. Scott: Of course we must be careful and prudent with the taxpayers' money. We also have to be careful to meet need where it exists. Some 500,000 community care grants have been given and effectively targeted since the introduction of the scheme.

Child Benefit

19. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy annually to uprate child benefit in line with inflation.

The Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): I will continue to carry out my statutory duty by reviewing the rate of child benefit annually and considering its future level in the light of all the relevant circumstances.

Mr. Wallace: I thank the Secretary of State for that reply, which I could scarcely describe as helpful. He knows that this question comes up annually and will not go away, because of the serious way in which inflation has eroded the real value of child benefit over many years. That benefit is well directed to help families, and has almost a 100 per cent. take-up. Given the current rate of inflation, will the Secretary of State accept that if the Government are to be true to their claim to be the party that supports the family, we need something much more positive than the answer that he has just given?

Mr. Newton: I think that the hon. Gentleman knows full well the reason for the answer that I gave, precisely because it is this particular time of year. Having been pursued around Bournemouth last week at intervals by people inviting me to speculate on this self-same subject —and, finally, having drawn from one of our most distinguished television political commentators the remark, "It sounds as if even your 'no comment' is off the record"—I do not propose to be drawn further this afternoon.

Disabled People

20. Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the latest estimate of the numbers of people who will benefit from the measures outlined in "The Way Ahead".

Mr. Scott: We estimate that some 850,000 people will benefit from the proposals set out in "The Way Ahead" and the interim measures that we announced in October 1989.

Mr. Paice: Does my right hon. Friend agree that that extra number of people, and the extra £300 million to be spent on implementing the proposals—on top of the fact that we have doubled expenditure in real terms on the long-term sick and disabled since 1978-79—demonstrate clearly that this Government are the caring Government, and that those who would say otherwise have failed when they have had the chance to prove it?

Mr. Scott: Certainly I agree. One of the most interesting statistics—using money at constant prices—shows that the last Labour Government managed to increase spending on the long-term sick and disabled by some £220 million a year; we have increased it by £370 million.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Tropical Forests

58. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to review the operation of the tropical forestry action plan; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): We have endorsed the strengthening and reform of the tropical forestry action plan—the TFAP—called for by the independent review of the plan commissioned by the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organisation —the FAO. We are working to see reform implemented; a good start was made at the FAO's committee on forestry last month.

Mr. Wallace: The plan has perhaps been a disappointment, although we recognise that it was set up in good faith and with good objectives. The right hon. Lady has been quoted as saying that she will not let up pressure to change it; will she tell us in which direction she would like the change to move? Does she agree that the local pressures for the exploitation of the forests can be abated only if, at the same time, we tackle the fundamental problems of poverty, trade and aid?

Mrs. Chalker: The local problems of forestry are uppermost in our minds. We seek to tackle sustainable development and the whole question of the poverty of those people living in the forest. As part of the reform we have urged strongly—and I have got my EC colleagues to do likewise—that the forest people should be involved in the plans for forestry. The review called for a greater priority for the tropical forestry action plan within the FAO. The TFAP covers 81 countries, and is far more than the FAO. We have asked for revised guidelines for clearer aims and objectives. We also asked, as did the review, for better collaboration among the co-financing organisations —the World Bank, the FAO and the World Resources Institute. We have asked for increased and more timely resources to strengthen tropical forestry countries' own ability in planning policy expertise and implementation. We now await the meeting in November of officials of the FAO to see those reforms implemented in full.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Are not there more ways than one of assisting the preservation of the tropical rain forest? Should not we be looking beyond merely this action plan to the bilateral work that Britain has been doing in assisting the Latin American countries in the Amazon basin in preserving their rain forests? Will my right hon. Friend commend the project that is now going ahead in Brazil?

Mrs. Chalker: I most certainly commend that project, and I hope to visit Brazil at the end of this month. Britain now has some 200 projects under way or in preparation at a cost to the aid programme of £160 million—56 of those are through non-governmental organisations concerned with the environment, and 40 are research programmes. There are many ways in which we can help the environment further and my hon. Friend will find them in "Environment and British aid programme" and chapter 4 of "This Common Inheritance".

Mr. Dalyell: What is the time scale for the reform, particularly as the position is extremely urgent—as the Minister knows—for Sarawak and Sabah and the rest of the islands of Borneo?

Mrs. Chalker: I hope that the reforms will be in place by early next year. As the hon. Gentleman knows, there is some concern—that I share—that the FAO has been resistant to the types of changes that are wanted by all the donor countries. Given that there was such unanimity in the committee on forestry which met in September in Rome—I have put it on the EC development committee's agenda for the beginning of November—I have some hope that we will see fast implementation and then implementation in national forestry programmes, which is what the hon. Gentleman wants.

Developing Countries

59. Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what fresh measures he is proposing to assist developing countries to deal with environmental problems.

65. Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what fresh measures he is proposing to assist developing countries to deal with environmental problems.

Mrs. Chalker: We have launched initiatives to develop new bilateral projects and to promote new multilateral measures in relation to environmental concerns such as forestry, energy efficiency, biological diversity, the ozone layer, and climate change.

Our policies are set out in the White Paper on the environment and in the ODA booklet "The Environment and the British Aid Programme".

Mr. Paice: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the opportunity that many of us have recently had to visit countries in eastern Europe demonstrated to us the importance of developing countries assuming a capitalist economic system to meet their environmental imperatives, such as sustainable management of the rain forests? What support is her Department giving to the World Conservation Monitoring Centre in Cambridge and to its work in supporting our overall objectives?

Mrs. Chalker: We do indeed support the World Conservation Monitoring Centre. It is supplied jointly by the International Union for Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources, the United Nations Environmental Programme, the World Wide Fund for Nature and ourselves. The centre has an important continuous function of collection, analysis, interpretation and dissemination of data, and we have involved it in our tropical managed areas assessment project. On our behalf, it is giving advice to the Government of India on conservation monitoring; it is preparing a manual on centres of plant diversity; it is involved in the biological diversity status report; and it is doing work on the conservation and management of biodiversity.

The centre is a thoroughly excellent organisation, supported not just by us but by worldwide organisations.

Mrs. Clywd: What assistance does the Minister propose to give to Cambodia, with its considerable environmental problems, which include landmines that are daily killing and maiming innocent people? Can she tell us whether British forces were in any way involved in training those who laid the mines, as some people allege; and what military and other expertise we can now give the Cambodian men, women and children to de-mine thousands of square miles of their country's land which are virtually unusable because they are unsafe?

Mrs. Chalker: That has nothing to do with the original question. The hon. Lady will find that I have answered today a question on Cambodia asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester). We are indeed concerned, and we are giving additional help to the non-governmental organisations to help civil-war-displaced persons in Cambodia.

The question that the hon. Lady has asked has nothing to do with me and it contains no fact. It is purely part of her campaign to discredit honourable people, including a very honourable member of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office whom she attacked at the Labour party conference, who cannot answer for himself and about whom she and her hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) have made disgraceful allegations which are untrue.

Mrs. Clwyd rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Emergency Relief

62. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on emergency relief aid expended under the United Kingdom's aid programme.

Mrs. Chalker: Providing immediate and effective humanitarian assistance is one of the key areas of the aid programme. Last year we spent more than £61 million in disaster relief, help for refugees and emergency food aid.

Mr. Marshall: Does my right hon. Friend realise that her answer will be warmly welcomed, and that her warm-hearted response to the problems of these countries is supported by the vast majority of people of this country?

Mrs. Chalker: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments. The outlook in Ethiopia for next year is bleak. The FAO and US Agency for International Development crop assessment mission will give donors more detailed reports at the end of next month. Meanwhile, I have just announced 19,000 further tonnes of food aid for Ethiopia through the World Food Programme; a further 5,000 tonnes of cereals to the NGO CARE; £500,000 to the Save the Children Fund for the purchase of trucks and spares for the southern line operation; and £600,000 worth of vegetable oil to the UNHCR for Somalian and Sudanese refugees in Ethiopia. We shall continue to monitor the situation extremely carefully and provide further help. Our total emergency aid for Ethiopia so far this year is more than £16·5 million.

Population Growth

64. Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the contribution made by United Kingdom aid towards reducing growth in the world's population.

Mrs. Chalker: Helping to reduce rapid population growth has high priority in our aid programme. I aim to increase the level and quality of all population-related assistance. We will focus bilateral support on a number of countries to improve the quality and delivery of their family planning services and to improve the health, education, income and status of women.

Business of the House

3.30 pm

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Sir Geoffrey Howe): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a short business statement about the business of the House on Friday. The business for Friday 19 October will be as follows:

A debate on the transitional measures relating to the EC consequences of German unification on a take-note motion. Relevant documents will be shown in the Official Report. [See Written Answers to Questions tomorrow.]

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): I thank the Leader of the House for the business statement and also for arranging for the Chancellor to make a statement this afternoon on the exchange rate mechanism.

Since the decision to enter was clearly taken for political reasons, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman use his full authority to drag the Prime Minister to the Dispatch Box in a full debate next week to explain her Government's deep divisions over Europe? Will he arrange for the Foreign Secretary to make a full statement on his return on the latest developments in the Gulf crisis and on his consultations about the United Nations' resolutions on the shootings?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall leave the hon. Gentleman's first point to be dealt with on its merits through the usual channels. I appreciate his gratitude for the fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will make a statement about the exchange rate mechanism immediately following this one. The House will know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs is currently in the middle east. I shall bring to his attention the points raised by the hon. Gentleman. The question of a statement or a possible statement can most usefully be considered when my right hon. Friend returns to Britain.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the House that questions on this statement should be confined to the business on Friday.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Does not the Leader of the House realise that his statement is totally inadequate? My hon. Friend the Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster) is absolutely right. During the recess, we had one of the most important economic statements in recent years and as this is a quiet week, Friday should have been used for a debate, led by the Prime Minister, in which she could have explained this extremely important decision. More importantly, she could have explained the differences between herself and the Chancellor and the Foreign Secretary in their perceptions of the long-term significance of ERM membership. Perhaps, in winding up, the Leader of the House could have explained the difference between himself and all three of them on the long-term implications.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The right hon. Gentleman has got it completely wrong. The less questioning that takes place now about the statement that I have just made, the more quickly the House can get on to discuss with the Chancellor of the Exchequer the statement that he will make on the point raised by the right hon. Gentleman. It is idle to pretend that the subject that I have announced for debate on Friday is unimportant. We shall debate transitional measures following the conclusion of the conflict with Germany and German unification. These are important matters and it is right to discuss them on Friday.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): If my right hon. and learned Friend rejects the blandishments of the hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster) and our right hon. Friend the Prime Minister does not speak, does that mean that we would not have to listen to the Leader of the Opposition? Many of us would be happy with that. If there is an additional gap on Friday and I were to table an early-day motion in support of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's expressed views in 1981 to 1983 on child benefit, would there be time to discuss that? It would be a useful debate.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend's enthusiasms are well known, but they do not relate directly to the business of the House on Friday.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Will the Leader of the House confirm that the documents that he mentioned relating to Friday's debate constitute some 23 individual proposals, for each of which the Government have provided an explanatory memorandum? Will he further confirm that, if the Select Committee on European Legislation believes that any one of those documents should be considered on its own, those documents will not be deemed to have been dealt with in one debate on Friday?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I understand the hon. Gentleman's close, serious and professional interest in these matters. The documents are summarised in paragraphs 6 and 7 of Cmnd. 1246—the Government's observations on the report of the Foreign Affairs Committee on German unification. I know that the Scrutiny Committee will be considering these matters tomorrow, and the precise shape of next Friday's debate may take account of the hon. Gentleman's recommendations, although I cannot promise to meet him in precisely the way that he suggested.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Which Ministers will be involved in the debate? Will the Leader of the House use his good offices with Mr. Speaker to ensure that the right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewksbury (Mr. Ridley) can play a full part in the debate?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman, as always, has more than one objective in mind. The appropriate Ministers will speak in the debate, no doubt including at the outset a Foreign Office Minister. The question of who else will speak in the debate is entirely a matter for Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): May we have a statement on Friday, or earlier if possible, on the substance of the Central Television programme on Cambodia, which demonstrated beyond challenge that the Government are giving aid and comfort to the Khmer Rouge, including the Pol Pot faction? Is not that small, impoverished country, which threatens nobody, being virtually squeezed out of existence? Is there not the possibility of mass annihilation if Pol Pot and his faction reach the capital, which they are likely to do within the next few months?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman is tenacious, but absurd in his continued tenacity. The Government have many times denied the allegations to which he referred, and there is no substance to them.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall call the two hon. Members who are standing, but I ask them to confine their questions to what is likely to happen on Friday, and not to discuss more general issues.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): It is right and proper that on Friday we should debate the unification of Germany. However, at the risk of sounding excessively parochial, I must stress that the unification of Germany has profound implications for, among others, those who live in our maritime communities. I hope that, on Friday, the appropriate Minister will offer a comment or two on the role that will be played by a grossly enlarged German fishing fleet and the consequences for the interests of our fishing communities.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Certainly, in so far as that issue may emerge from the documents to which I have referred, it will be an appropriate subject for the hon. Gentleman to raise in the debate on Friday.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Why does not the Leader of the House admit that the real reason why the Prime Minister will not reply to the debate on Friday, or on any other day, is because the right hon. and learned Gentleman cannot guarantee a 10-minute standing ovation before she begins?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I suspect that, if challenged, I could.

Exchange Rate Mechanism

3.38 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. John Major): I should like to make a statement about sterling's entry to the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system, which took effect on Monday, 8 October.

Sterling now has a fixed central rate against each of the other currencies in the ERM. The entry rate is set against the ecu and translates to a central rate against the deutschmark of DM 2.95. That was marginally above the market level when the decision to enter was announced on Friday, 5 October and is a little below the current market rate.

Sterling is able to move by a maximum of 6 per cent. above or below the central rates. Our choice of the wider 6 per cent. margins is intended to allow sterling to settle into the system, and follows recent precedent. In due course, we will move to the narrow band of 2¼ per cent. margins. The terms of entry we have agreed with our partners are those that we sought.

The Government have long made it clear that sterling would enter the exchange rate mechanism during stage 1 of economic and monetary union, which began in July. It has now done do, at the earliest appropriate time. I would like to explain how our decision fits into the Government's wider economic strategy.

It has become abundantly clear that policy is now reducing inflationary pressures in the economy. Monetary growth on all measures has fallen sharply, and the growth of narrow money is within its target range. The growth of demand has slowed. Although the rise in oil prices will continue to feed through for a while, the prospect is for a substantial reduction in inflation over the coming year. That will be so both in absolute terms and in relation to inflation in other European countries. It was for those reasons that we felt able to reduce interest rates by 1 per cent.

A firm exchange rate is a vital part of our policy to maintain tight monetary conditions in order to reduce inflation. As I have repeatedly made clear, membership of the exchange rate machanism will be an additional discipline for the United Kingdom economy. In no sense is it a soft option. Monetary policy will remain tight. I must emphasise that I will not make a further reduction in interest rates until I am sure that it is safe and prudent to do so.

Membership has important implications for British companies and their employees. They must contain their costs. If they fail to do so, they will not be bailed out by a devaluation of the currency. That is the key message for those engaged in pay bargaining this autumn and subsequently.

But in addition to acting as a discipline on costs, membership of the exchange rate mechanism offers significant benefits for British industry. It will help to provide greater stability of exchange rates with our main trading partners and thus the certainty that business needs to plan for the future. It will also make Britain even more attractive for inward investment.

Although entry to the narrow band of the exchange rate mechanism will fulfil our obligations under stage 1 of economic and monetary union, it does not imply any change in our opposition to the imposition of a single currency. In the intergovernmental conference in December, we shall continue to argue against that plan and for the proposals that I first set out in June. As the House knows, they propose an evolutionary and market-based approach, based on the creation of a new European monetary fund and a common currency—the hard ecu.

In summary, the mechanism has a proven record of success over recent years in producing greater stability of exchange rates and lower inflation. The Government believe that Britain too will benefit from membership. The exchange rate mechanism will reinforce our counter-inflationary policies, help to provide the stability and certainty that industry needs, and set the right framework for a resumption of soundlybased and non-inflationary growth. I commend entry to the House.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): As the Chancellor is aware, the Labour party welcomes the decision that sterling should join the exchange rate mechanism, not least because of the potential benefit that a more stable exchange rate could bring to the process of Britain's much-needed economic recovery. However, it will not of itself lead Britain out of the economic cul-de-sac of high and rising inflation, recession, increasing unemployment and serious balance of payments deficits to which the Government's policies have led.

I want to ask the Chancellor first about the celebrated Madrid conditions into which the Prime Minister entered in June 1989, and which she reported to the House formally on 29 June last year. At that time, the Prime Minister was in no doubt that the rate of inflation was too high for Britain to enter the exchange rate mechanism. In a reply to a question from my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, she said:

"On the exchange rate mechanism, our promise has been that we would go in when the time was right. I"— note, "I"—

"put conditions on that and made it much clearer that when those conditions were met we should be able to go in. One condition depends on us, which is that we get inflation well down".

Earlier, she said:

"we must first get our inflation down."—[Official Report, 29 June 1989; Vol. 155, c. 1111, 1110.]

Every time that she has been asked since then, the Prime Minister has repeated the condition. In July 1989, inflation was to be "significantly lower". The Chancellor said on 26 March this year:

"we wish to see inflation fall before we enter the mechanism."—[Official Report, 26 March 1990; Vol. 170, c. 117.]

Only two weeks ago, the Prime Minister was reported as saying in Switzerland:

"The Madrid conditions won't be changed and they include getting inflation nearer the European average."

The Prime Minister's role is crucial—she invented the Madrid conditions. They were not imposed on her by other members of the European Community. The present Chancellor was not in Madrid when these conditions were suggested by the Prime Minister, and neither was his predecessor, the former Chancellor. It was the Prime Minister herself, assisted by the then Foreign Secretary, who is now Leader of the House, and who accompanied her to the Madrid summit. Sadly, his views do not seem to coincide with those of the Prime Minister or of the present Chancellor.

But if the condition is clear—and it could hardly be made more clear—that inflation had to be reduced before we entered the exchange rate mechanism, it is equally clear that it has not been fulfilled. Headline inflation in June 1989 was 8·3 per cent. and is now 10·9 per cent. If we take inflation on the basis that the Chancellor likes to take it —by excluding completely mortgage rates and the poll tax, which is a favourable estimate from the Government's point of view—then, it was 5·8 per cent. and now, it is 7·9 per cent.

I ask the Chancellor to explain why there has been such a humiliating U-turn by the Prime Minister who was the inventor of the Madrid conditions and is now their arch-destroyer. Is it not simply because the Government, due to their appalling mismanagement of our economy, have been forced to concede that they could not achieve the inflation target which they had set for themselves?

Why does not the Chancellor admit this in his statement to the House, on television and elsewhere? Why does not the Prime Minister—whose role is so crucial in this affair that she must take part in the debate which we hope to have in the House—admit it? If our parliamentary accountability is as important as she frequently claims in this context, why is she reluctant to take part in the debate? Is it not because she would find it impossible to justify the abandonment of a commitment that she made to the House on 29 June last year?

Would not the Chancellor have been wiser to admit that our economy is in dire trouble, rather than to pretend, as he did once again today, that all would soon be well and to claim, as he did on Channel 4 television on the day of his announcement, that at that time there was "an ideal conjunction of events"

Ideal, when inflation was twice as high as that in the rest of the countries in the exchange rate mechanism? Ideal, when the economic consequences of the Gulf crisis are quite unknown? If these conditions were ideal, what were the Government waiting for during all the years when inflation was low and during all the years when there was no Gulf crisis?

Does the Chancellor not understand that nonsense like this not only fuels scepticism in the markets and elsewhere, but fosters downright incredulity about statements by Ministers? Is is not clear that the Government, baulked and cornered by their economic failure, have joined the exchange rate mechanism as a last resort?

Now that Britain has joined, will the Chancellor give us his estimate of the consequences for our economy? I hope that he will answer these questions directly. Given our serious balance of payments problems, is it his judgment that the rate at which we agreed to join is sustainable? What is his estimate of the effect on the balance of payments over the period ahead? Will the balance of payments deficit be progressively reduced? Is he satisfied that the arrangements through the central banks under the Basle-Nyborg agreements will be adequate to sustain the management of a currency as widely traded as sterling? Why did he not seek a strengthening of regional policy in the Community as one means of helping to bridge the gap between countries with more successful economies and countries, such as Britain, which are in difficulties?

Finally, I wish to ask the Chancellor—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Smith: This is an extremely important matter of economic and political policy, and the Government should not complain when they are asked questions by an Opposition whose function it is to do precisely that. The questions that I want to ask the Chancellor flow from how economic policy is to be directed now that we are subject to the disciplines of the ERM.

First, is it not clear that, between now and the next election, responsible economic management will not permit cuts both in interest rates and in personal income tax? To build confidence over the period ahead, will the Chancellor today rule out the possibility of personal income tax cuts before the general election as too wildly irresponsible to be seriously contemplated by any sensible Government? Does he not yet understand that, in the new situation, the supply side policies advocated by this side of the House are even more crucial? Unless we end the debilitating neglect of trading, the collapse of regional policy and the failure to advance new technology—in short, unless we adopt an industrial strategy—is it not clear that we shall not succeed within the ERM, just as we have failed outside it?

Mr. Major: I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) for his initial welcome for our decision. We both agree that it is the right decision for the British economy. He spent so much time on the Madrid conditions because he knows that we are right to enter the mechanism. As recently as a few weeks ago, he said:

"We believe that we should enter the ERM at an early date."

The Government agree with him, and we have done so.

Several conditions were set out in Madrid. The first concerned the abolition of exchange controls, which is substantially completed. The second related to the single market, and the majority of the measures are now concluded and more are in hand. The third related to progress on financial services, which is also nearly concluded. The fourth was progress on competition policy, on which the Commission, on this at least is acting firmly. The only remaining condition was the need for inflation convergence, and it is now clear that we are moving away from divergence in inflation to convergence in inflation. [Interruption.] If the hon. Gentlemen listen longer, they will learn a little more.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman then asked why we were waiting for a conjunction of events and what they might be. We were waiting essentially for three events: first, the right market conditions and the right market rate, and that we had; secondly, a clear indication that monetary aggregates were coming into line, and that they have; thirdly, signs in the real economy of close and certain disinflation, and that we had. The combination of those factors made this the right time to enter the mechanism.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman asked about the consequences for the economy. The first and most certain consequence is that entry of the ERM will reinforce monetary policy and help us push inflation lower, which is our central policy aim. He asked whether the rate was sustainable, and I share his view that that is an important question. I am confident that a central rate of DM2·95 is sustainable, for a series of reasons which I will set out now, if the House will do me the courtesy of listening.

First, DM2·95 is the average inflation-adjusted real rate of the past decade. It is the recent market rate and, as a number of analysts have pointed out, the pound's purchasing power parity—in essence, the rate at which the prices of our goods would be equal to the prices of German goods—is above DM2·95. Three analysts have calculated it specially: one at DM3·30, one at DM3·19 and one at DM2·95. Similarly, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman may know, the International Monetary Fund has released figures that suggest that industry will be competitive at DM2·95.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): When has it ever been right?

Mr. Major: When has the hon. Gentleman ever been right?

I understand the concern that underlies the question. The truth is that the trade gap is the result of domestic demand outstripping supply and not an uncompetitive exchange rate. That is the reality of what has happened.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman's next question concerned the central banks. I am content that the central bank agreement is satisfactory and I think that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is aware of that. I did not regard stronger regional policies as necessary or negotiable in my discussions with my partners in Europe.

On the responsibility for future economic management, the right hon. and learned Gentleman referred to the possibility of interest rate cuts and tax cuts. I made clear a few moments ago the position on interest rate cuts. Tax cuts are a matter for the Budget and not before.

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): My right hon. Friend the Chancellor is reported to have said that a remark by Mr. Delors that we joined the ERM in order to slow down EMU is "rather rum". Is that not a good description of Mr. Delors's position, given that we have been in the lead in implementing the single market and that my right hon. Friend's proposals for a hard ecu are a far more practical, effective and better way forward than Mr. Delors's proposals for stages 2 and 3?

Mr. Major: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for those remarks. I agree entirely. The hard ecu moves us in the direction of a market-led approach, which I believe is the only sustainable way forward.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): As Parliament —both sides of the House of Commons—has rendered itself impotent on these matters, is it not imperative that there should be no further erosion of Britain's position until the electorate have been consulted at a general election?

Mr. Major: With respect to the right hon. Gentleman, I do not agree with his underlying premise.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): Now that the euphoria of the markets has subsided, will my right hon. Friend re-emphasise that joining the ERM is not a soft option, and that it is essential for us to keep tight monetary control? Does he agree that there has been a wide welcome for the fact that we do not agree with a single currency and that at the new meetings the hard ecu suggestion will be put forward?

Mr. Major: I certainly agree with my right hon. Friend's final point, and I confirm it. I think that the euphoria of the markets was overdone both before and immediately after entry and, in some cases, the gloom is now being overdone. Entry into the exchange rate mechanism is an additional discipline to underpin monetary policy. It is that and no more.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): The Chancellor will be aware that this is one of the most serious decisions affecting the jobs and livelihoods of millions of people in this country. He maintains that he has got the right exchange rate. That view is not shared by the vast majority of experts, academics and others in this country.

I shall ask two questions. First, if it turns out that the right hon. Gentleman is wrong on this vital matter, what powers does he have left to change the exchange rate now that it has been agreed with the ERM? Secondly, now that we are part of the ERM, taking account of all he said about tighter discipline, will he spell out what average increase in earnings in the United Kingdom is compatible with retaining what competitiveness we have already?

Mr. Major: On the final point, it depends on the individual company and the individual company's productivity. On the substantive—[Interruption.] It is the question of averages that has got this country into so much trouble over the past 20 years. On the right hon. Gentleman's central point of jobs and livelihoods, the most important thing for jobs and livelihoods in the future is, first, to obtain a firm downward pressure on inflation and, secondly, to keep it. That is the central reason for entering the exchange rate mechanism.

On whether the rate is sustainable, I set out in some detail the arguments in favour of that a few moments ago. As to what opportunities will arise in the unlikely event of the right hon. Gentleman's next premise being correct, we intend to stay within the bands to which we have committed ourselves. That was the purpose of setting the bands in the first place.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the acid test is to ensure that the British economy is as competitive as possible, and in doing so to remind the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) that the views and expressions of Mr. Tuffin, in repudiating any attempt to hold down wages, are a prescription for our not being competitive? Furthermore, does he agree that the views of Mr. Sam Brittan in the Financial Times that he hopes that British monetary policy will be made in Berlin must be repudiated?

Mr. Major: As my hon. Friend says, the wages round is important. Wage settlements above that which is affordable would have a short-term effect on inflation but a far more fundamental effect on the number of jobs in the economy. That, essentially, is the message that employers and employees must grasp when deciding what increases should be. As my hon. Friends know, we have committed ourselves to stay within the bands that we have set and we shall use monetary policy for that purpose.

Mr. Alan Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Does the Chancellor recognise that inflation and interest rates would have been lower in this country in the past year if we had been in the exchange rate mechanism a year or more earlier, when Labour opposed it as strongly as the Prime Minister? Will he explain how he and the Prime Minister can continue to talk about tax cuts when the fiscal policy that may need to operate inside the exchange rate mechanism could require him to increase taxes in some circumstances? Does he rule that out? As the Prime Minister's objections to joining the exchange rate mechanism before inflation was down to the level of our partners have been blown away like confetti in a gale, may we hope that her objections to a single currency and a more independent European central bank will go the same way?

Mr. Major: On the last point, I think the hon. Gentleman is unlikely to see that, and I think that he is unlikely to see that among my right hon. and hon. Friends either. On his first proposition, that inflation would have been lower if we had been in the exchange rate mechanism, if the conditions had been there for us to have been in the exchange rate mechanism, the hon. Gentleman might have been right, because the inflationary record of countries within the exchange rate mechanism is better than those not in it. The conditions for entry were not present. A year or so ago, monetary aggregates were not falling and the real economy was not slowing. We were heading for a position where inflation was going up, not down. Clearly, one could not have entered then.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Does the Chancellor recall that, when his predecessor joined informally, we had significant reductions in interest rates and inflation for several months, but a period of regular increases in interest rates to the present savage levels after that period of joy? That was apparently because Britain is almost unique in Europe in having a chronic balance of trade deficit with the EEC. Was not this confirmed by Hoare Govett, which has just published a splendid paper suggesting of the initial good news:

"As with all magic, it is hocus pocus—and would be unlikely to last for more than a year."

If by any chance my right hon. Friend, who has our great respect, and the Government are wrong and such critics are right, what powers are available to the Government to do anything? Can we withdraw from the ERM? Can we realign the currency ourselves; or will we be stuck with a situation in which interest rates go up and down all the time depending on our relationship with the deutschmark?

Mr. Major: With great respect to my hon. Friend, the concerns that he expressed were expressed in a number of countries when they entered the exchange rate mechanism in earlier years, and subsequent events have shown that those concerns were not justified. I reiterate: those countries that have been within the exchange rate mechanism and have kept to the admittedly difficult disciplines of the exchange rate mechanism have had a better inflation record over a period than we have. I wish this country to have that better inflation record—for British industry, British commerce and the British consumer. That is why I believe that it is right for us to enter and why I believe that the move will be successful.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): I accept the need for entry, so that we are not excluded from influencing developments within the Community, but is the Chancellor aware that, of itself, entry at an over-valuation will do nothing for our balance of payments, nothing for manufacturing industry, nothing to help us to get more skills in our enterprises and nothing for investment? Is he aware that what he has produced is just a panacea—a panacea of hope and nothing else?

Mr. Major: The right hon. Gentleman's question is based entirely on a false premise. I am the last person who needs telling that entry into the ERM is not a panacea, because it was I who coined that phrase a year ago.

Mr. David Howell: Will my right hon. Friend accept that he took the decision that the pound should enter the ERM with considerable skill, and that he deserves warm congratulations on that, even though we shall have a tough struggle to keep the pound where it is? Entry into the ERM ends a long period during which the pound has been kicked around the exchange rate market like a football, and we should be thankful for that.

Does my right hon. Friend recognise that, if the ERM discipline is to work, we shall require much stronger monetary methods and techniques than we have had in the past—techniques of the kind that he and his colleagues were considering back in January? Will he undertake to pursue methods of strengthening our monetary control in this country—including reviewing, and possibly strengthening, the status of our own central monetary authority, the Bank of England?

Mr. Major: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his remarks about our entry into the exchange rate mechanism. We are certainly clear in our minds that we need to ensure that monetary policy is a safe and secure discipline, and I shall certainly continue to do whatever I can to ensure that it is.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Does the Chancellor agree that when he uses the word "discipline" he means "decisions taken elsewhere"? And is it not a fact that a nation entering a fixed or near-rigid exchange rate mechanism with a heavy and persistent balance of trade deficit ceases to be a nation of that characteristic and, in the end, becomes a depressed area of a new economic nation?

Mr. Major: When I use the term "discipline" I mean no devaluation and no constant descent into the easy option. In the 1990s, we cannot afford the easy option and, we are determined not to have it.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on providing a much-needed extra discipline for the control of inflation, and on putting an end to the widespread perception that wage costs could continue to increase for ever and that we could continue to be bailed out by a declining currency? I also congratulate my right hon. Friend on climbing into the driver's cab of that notorious gravy train, the European Commission, with the prospect of putting an end to Mr. Delors's ambitions.

Mr. Major: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments about our entry into the exchange rate mechanism, and I share the views that he has expressed about it. On economic and monetary union, I share my hon. Friend's concern about the destination for which some in the European Community are heading at present. I believe that our proposals represent the right way to proceed, and we shall argue for them very strongly indeed in the intergovernmental conference.

Mr. Leighton: Is the Chancellor aware that pegging sterling at nearly DM3 to the pound is virtually equivalent to signing the death warrant of British manufacturing industry? Is he aware that it is a crazy, stupid and misguided policy? I prophesy that he has it wrong and that the pound will not stay at DM2·95.

Is the right hon. Gentleman also aware that going into the ERM makes absolutely no sense if we do not want stages 2 and 3 of the Delors plan? I am glad that the Prime Minister is paying attention, because she blusters, huffs and puffs, but in the end always gives way. That is what she has done again.

Mr. Major: I did not notice my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister giving way and accepting the European budget which the Labour party left us in 1979.

With regard to competitiveness, I have a good deal more confidence in British industry than do Opposition Members. I simply do not understand why Opposition Members persistently talk down the capacity of our industry to compete.

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): Does not my right hon. Friend agree that the tightening of money since mid-1988 has done a good job—no one can ever say again that high interest rates do not work in bearing down on inflation—and that that is why he took his decision on the ERM last week? Does not my right hon. Friend also agree that the Opposition's policy of trying always to suggest an alternative to high interest rates, such as discredited credit controls, proves again that the Opposition are wrong?

Mr. Major: I entirely agree. Our inflationary problem was substantially the result of the dramatic growth of demand. Monetary policy has brought that growth of demand down and will increasingly bring down inflation.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): Can we assume that the Government are opposed only to the imposition of a single currency and that they would go along with an optional single currency? Is not such flexibility over monetary union essential if we are to enlarge, as I think we must, to include Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Poland? By insisting on a single currency for everyone, we are effectively ensuring that the European Community will remain only a 12-member Community.

Mr. Major: On the second point, I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman. We believe that it is in the longer-term interests of Europe to ensure that the Community of 12 can become a larger Community to admit the increasingly emergent democracies in eastern Europe. We would be wise to do nothing to inhibit their entry at a later stage by decisions taken at an early stage.

An imposed single currency is not only difficult in terms of the concerns of the House of Commons, with which I have full agreement, but also has real econonic dangers for many European nations and we will continue to make those plain. For that reason, we believe that the market-led hard ecu approach is right.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): Does my right hon. Friend share my dismay about the fact that the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) appeared to judge only one criterion of the level of inflation—the RPI—when a much better guide to the trend is the tightening of monetary aggregates? Will my right hon. Friend take credit for taking sterling into the exchange rate mechanism at the earliest possible time when it was clear that monetary aggregates would lead to declining inflation?

Will he also repeat and underline the fact that, on a purchasing power parity basis, the DM2·95 central rate will not render British industry uncompetitive and that British industry must now take that rate into account when judging future costs and wage rounds?

Mr. Major: On purchasing power parity, my hon. Friend is entirely right. I quoted some figures earlier which are a clear illustration of that. I am grateful for my hon. Friend's earlier remarks.

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): Despite the potential advantages of joining the ERM, is not the trouble with the Government's decision of 5 October the fact that it was taken at the wrong time, for the wrong reasons and at the wrong rate? In view of all the suspicions and concerns of our Community partners, would it not be good for the Government to say that they intend to be a bona fide member of the exchange rate mechanism and that they intend to take a constructive attitude at the intergovernmental conference in November?

Mr. Major: We will take a constructive line at the intergovernmental conference in November, but a constructive line for the future of Europe does not necessarily mean agreeing to each and every plan that may be promoted by one part of the European Community. A constructive line may well mean standing up for British interests and what we see as the long-term interests of Europe. I give the hon. Gentleman an undertaking that we will do that. We will certainly be bona fide members of the exchange rate mechanism. I made it clear today that, as soon as it is appropriate, we will move to the narrow bands. I do not share the hon. Gentleman's view that it was the wrong time to enter. I believe that it was the right time to enter, and that is why I did so.

Mr. Ian Stewart (Herefordshire, North): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that it was his view that it was appropriate for a first reduction in interest rates to be made which led to his decision to enter the ERM at that time, and not the other way round, as has been generally suggested against his momentous decision? Despite the constraints of the EMS in future, can he assure us that he will do his best not to be pressed into any reductions in interest rates unless and until he judges that they are appropriate in the light of domestic economic and monetary circumstances?

Mr. Major: I certainly confirm the latter point. On the first of the important points that my right hon. Friend made, I think that it was the right time to cut interest rates and to enter the exchange rate mechanism. Indeed, the monetary conditions—first, the fact that narrow money is in its target range; secondly, the fact that broad money growth has fallen every single month since January; and thirdly, the fact that bank lending is now decelerating and the indications that one can see of the flat housing market and other matters in the real economy—were classic signs that interest rates needed to be cut by 1 per cent.

I also felt that it was the right time to enter the mechanism. I also had to bear in mind the fact that, since an interest rate cut was clearly justified, if it had preceded entry, it might have been seen as an attempt to drive the exchange rate down in advance of entry or, alternatively, a signal that we were not going to enter for some time. Both of those would have caused market turbulence. Fortunately, it was the right time to do both, and we did.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Is the Chancellor aware that it ill becomes Conservative Members who apparently cannot survive on £26,500 a year to lecture the workers of this country about the need to accept low wage increases in the present pay round? May I be the third hon. Member to ask the Chancellor—on two or three occasions, he has mentioned devaluing the currency—to spell out to the House and the country what powers are available to correct his own mistake if he has got it wrong? If he refuses to explain that, we can only assume that he has left himself without any power.

Mr. Major: On the hon. Gentleman's first point, the requirement to spell out clearly the implications of unaffordable pay increases is clear. If people do not know that avoidably large wage increases will cost jobs, they may then negotiate wage increases that would create unemployment, and nobody wishes to do so.

On the second point, I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's premise that we have gone in either at the wrong time or at the wrong rate, and events will bear that out.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the most welcome statement that he has made today. Does he agree that most people in this country, in addition to lower mortgage interest rates, want to be paid and to save in a currency which is strong, stable and valuable? Does my right hon. Friend agree that, having taken the momentous decision to join the exchange rate mechanism, we have taken a most important step towards economic and monetary union from which there can be no turning back?

Mr. Major: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind remarks about our entry into the exchange rate mechanism. The exchange rate mechanism will play a significant part in assisting other aspects of policy to bring down the rate of inflation so that savings will have a secure value. I entirely share my hon. Friend's view on that matter. I do not necessarily draw the same conclusion about future developments towards monetary union.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): If it is such a favourable exchange rate, does the Chancellor now expect a favourable balance of trade, particularly with West Germany?

Mr. Major: As I have pointed out on several occasions during the past few moments, the purchasing power parity rate, which is what matters, is more favourable than many other people have yet considered. If the hon. Gentleman will wait and see, events will give him his answer.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): I congratulate the Chancellor on his momentous decision. Does he agree that this is the first time since the Labour devaluation in 1967 that British industry faces the disciplines of a regime of credibly stable exchange rates? It is also absolutely clear from this afternoon's proceedings that the Labour party remains at heart a party of devaluationists. The vital thing is for both sides of British industry to take on board the full enormous importance of the changed circumstances that they now face.

Mr. Major: It could not be put more clearly, and I entirely agree with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Jim Sillars (Glasgow, Govan): Does the Chancellor recall quoting the experiences of other countries entering the ERM? Does he agree that it is a fair parallel to cite the French experience—another weak currency like our own—on entering the ERM? Is it not the case that the French had not only to maintain very high interest rates and introduce credit controls, but to tighten their fiscal policy? Why does the Chancellor think that he can get away with a very loose fiscal policy, when the French had to tighten theirs?

Mr. Major: I think that the hon. Gentleman is overlooking several facts. First, we have a very tight fiscal policy and fiscal surplus, which the French did not; secondly, we have put in place a whole series of supply side improvements, but the French have not; thirdly, they have a socialist Government pursuing socialist policies and we have not.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his decision 10 days ago has been almost universally welcomed in this country? It is a significant step forward, as is his reminder yet again today that the eventual single currency will be reached by agreement, not imposition, which is, after all, the Community habit and was at the specific request of Heads of Government when they asked Mr. Delors to draw up the plans.

Mr. Major: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his support on those matters, which I greatly welcome.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Is not the truth about the timing and level of our entry to the ERM the short-term interests of the Conservative party? The Chancellor thinks that, via an overvalued exchange rate, he will buy, for a short time, a cut in inflation and the stability to cut interest rates. After the election has been called, we shall see a terrible recession because the exchange rate is overvalued. Surely the danger for the Chancellor is that the markets have read all this, and that therefore the pound will drop in value. He will not get his desired outcome—the cut in interest rates—as the whole strategy will blow up in his face. That will be the price he pays for acting in the interests of the Tory party rather than the British economy.

Mr. Major: The hon. Lady and her party should not judge us by their standards. Entry into the ERM is not about short-term advantages and long-term costs—in reality it is almost precisely the reverse. There will be short-term restrictions on policy in return for the long-term advantage of lower inflation. That is the right way to proceed.

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on making it clear in his speeches, notably at the party conference, that the success or otherwise of the ERM ultimately depends on self-discipline within the economy? I note his hope, his appeal and his wish for lower wage rates. Will he also make it clear to the country that there must be no resurgence of the bloated house prices that played such a large part in our inflation in the first place if this policy is to succeed?

Mr. Major: I absolutely share the views that my hon. Friend has expressed. The way in which house prices took off a couple of years ago added significantly to our difficulties—they took off after the election, so they did not help us win—and they represented a considerable complication in policy.

My hon. Friend is entirely right as well in what he says about wage rates, which should apply to management as well as the work force.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): Will not the Chancellor admit that, despite his brave words, British manufacturing industry is not competitive, at almost DM3 to the pound? If it is not competitive, what will the result be? In the early 1980s, the Government destroyed almost 30 per cent. of British manufacturing industry, now the rest of British industry will also go down the plughole because of the Chancellor's folly, dictated not by reliance on economic strategy but by political expediency.

Mr. Major: The hon. Gentleman may feel that, but if he does, he is wrong. In addition, I do not agree with his remarks about competitiveness. I reiterate my point that the size of the trade gap—which I have publicly stated I regret—is essentially the result of excess demand over our capacity to supply at home, no lack of competitiveness. That is why our export performance has been so good.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Will my right hon. Friend acknowledge that, necessary and commendable as entry into the ERM may be, there is nevertheless widespread concern in the country that it will inevitably lead not only to economic and monetary union but to a form of single currency and centralised banking control, and of control over our economy and taxation policies that will take away this nation's national sovereignty and replace it with the elements of a European super-federal state? Will he make it absolutely clear that under no circumstances will the Government's policies end at that destination?

Mr. Major: I am happy to tell my hon. and learned Friend that I see no prospect of us moving towards a federal state.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): Does ERM mean exchange rate mechanism of election rigging manoeuvre? Will the Chancellor explain clearly and simply to the House what mechanism exists to devalue the pound within the ERM?

Mr. Major: I will tell the hon. Gentleman precisely what ERM means—it means an assistance towards low inflation. I am not contemplating devaluation, which is the traditional policy of Opposition parties, not a Conservative Government.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): My right hon. Friend is of course aware that the belated conversion of the Labour party's Front Bench spokesmen to welcoming membership of the European Community reflects their hope that by doing so they will belong to a socialist Europe. Does he accept that, although many of us welcome the fact that we are being moved closer to Europe, we wish to see a Conservative Europe and welcome his latest manoeuvre because it gives us a voice in the central policies of the European Community?

[Mr. Andrew Rowe]

Mr. Major: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. What has become crystal clear during this questioning, to a greater extent than I imagined, is that the Opposition are split on the issue of the exchange rate mechanism. Their Front Bench spokesmen want to go in, but their Back Benchers are already asking how to come out—that is how split they are.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to have regard for the subsequent business, an important debate on financial services and the European market, in which some hon. Members now standing wish to participate. I shall take three more questions from each side and then we must move on.

Ms. Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): Is the Chancellor aware that a document that the House will be considering shortly—the Government's official response to the report of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry on the EC and financial services—clearly states that ERM entry will be considered only

"when the level of United Kingdom inflation is significantly lower."

In view of that statement, will the Chancellor admit that, for political reasons, the Government have made a complete about-turn?

Mr. Major: That is a very charming attempt, but I will not. The relevant factor is not the historic inflation rate when we were not in the exchange rate mechanism but what the inflation rate will be when we are in the exchange rate mechanism.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Does my right hon. Friend agree that membership of the ERM makes sense to a Government committed to national economic sovereignty only if it is seen not so much as a cosy support system but as a measure of fiscal rectitude equivalent to the old gold standard? In that sense, what hope would there be for any Government who retained membership of the ERM but pursued policies of high spending, borrowing and taxation, and low interest rates, as a Labour Government would? Would not that send the pound not so much floating as crashing through the floorboards?

Mr. Major: That, of course, crisply put by my hon. Friend, is why Opposition Back Benchers hate the idea of the exchange rate mechanism and would never, in practice, have let a Labour Government enter and, in the unlikely event of a Labour Government coming to power, they would seek to bring them out. I hope that the markets and our colleagues in Europe understand that.

Mr. Robert Litherland (Manchester, Central): The Chancellor puts great emphasis on self-discipline. If voluntary wage restraint did not come up to his expectations, however, would he ever consider a wage freeze?

Mr. Major: I do not think that the experience of wage freezes in the past 20 years—under Governments of both major parties—has been at all satisfactory, and I do not envisage our taking such action. The reason why I set out so clearly the importance of the wage round is that the sooner that it is clearly understood by both sides of industry that it is necessary for wage increases to be only those that are affordable, the less will be the impact in the form of job losses.

Mr. Graham Riddick (Colne Valley): Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the more distasteful aspects of the whole ERM debate has been the way in which Mr. Jacques Delors has been saying that the inevitable next step is a single currency whether Britain likes it or not? Will my right hon. Friend confirm once again that the inevitable next step is no such thing, and that the present Government will not be dictated to by this Brussels bureaucrat?

Mr. Major: I am happy to reiterate to my hon. Friend that we are not at all in favour of stage 3 of the Delors plan, and that we intend to pursue very fiercely our own plans for a market-led approach.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): Everyone knows that the Government have been thinking about joining the exchange rate mechanism for 11 years, and that they have been looking into it particularly deeply during the past five. Given this amazing conjunction of events, and the Chancellor's emphasis on the reduction in inflation, can he tell us the expected rate of inflation on a quarterly basis until October next year, and also what estimate has been made of the rate of unemployment in the same period?

Mr. Major: I shall do that in the Autumn Statement —as is traditional—at some stage in November; the precise date is as yet unclear.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my right hon. Friend accept that many of us were disappointed by the rather churlish response of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith)—for whom many of us have considerable regard —when my right hon. Friend has done precisely what was asked of him only a week ago, by reducing interest rates and joining the ERM? Is this because the Opposition have recognised—it has been brought home to them—that what we must have are the same kind of wage increases, in relation to productivity, as other European countries; and that, if Rover and Ford car workers ask for 13 per cent. when Benz and Volkswagen workers are asking for 3 per cent., there is no way in which that can prove successful, whoever are in office?

Mr. Major: My hon. Friend is smack on the button: I entirely agree. I confess, however, to feeling some sympathy for the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East. It is not easy to try to ride two horses in that circus.

Shootings (Jerusalem)

4.33 pm

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): I seek to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20, to consider an urgent and specific matter which should have immediate attention, namely,

"Britain's relations with the Government of Israel following the massacre at the Al-Aqsa mosque".

Last Monday, 8 October, was the bloodiest day so far in Israel's 23-year occupation of Jerusalem, the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Twenty-one Palestinians were slaughtered and 150 were injured when live ammunition was again used against civilians in the area of the old city which the Jews call the Temple Mount and the Moslems call the Noble Sanctuary; 11 Jewish worshippers were injured by stones in the lower area known as the western wall.

For five days last week, the United Nations laboured mightily—and, in my view, brought forth a mouse. The House should consider urgently whether three assistants from the Secretary General's office, sent as a mission 23 years after Israel's occupation, really constitute a serious response. Certainly, millions will contrast the rapid deployment of a task force to the Gulf following Iraq's invasion of Kuwait with the fact that, 23 years after Israel's invasion of the west bank and the Gaza strip, and after nearly three years of intifada, during which more than 800 Palestinians have been killed, the Secretary General is sending three assistants.

Should you, Mr. Speaker, grant it, the debate could and should illuminate this by considering the words of the former United States Assistant Defence Secretary, Laurence Korb, who said that the Gulf task force was obviously about oil because,

"if Kuwait grew carrots, we wouldn't give a damn."

Well, the Palestinians may not grow many carrots, but they certainly grow olives and citrus fruit, and it seems that the world, or at least the bit represented in the Security Council of the United Nations, does not give a damn.

Yesterday, The Observer reported Palestinian doctors who treated survivors as saying that medical evidence showed that the police had fired wildly; and Doctor Mustapha Bargouti of the Al Makassed hospital, whom I had the honour of meeting in Jerusalem about 18 months ago, spoke of "indiscriminate shooting and in one case we found 14 bullets in one man".

Of 120 people treated at his hospital, 32 were still being treated, including a four-year-old with a rubber bullet in his brain. What security risk was posed by a four-year-old seven days ago in the Noble Sanctuary to result in a rubber bullet in his brain?

I end with a call for a debate. There was no excuse for the slaughter. The middle east needs an end to these slaughters and to the occupation. As a socialist, I think that we need a federal solution that guarantees rights to a homeland for Palestinians and the state of Israel. Israel must come out of the occupied territories and these slaughters must end.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purposes of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"Britain's relations with the Government of Israel following the massacre at the Al-Aqsa mosque."

I have listened with care to the matter that the hon. Gentleman has raised. As he knows, I have to decide whether to give his application precedence over the business set down for today or tomorrow. I hope that at some stage it will be possible to debate these important matters, but I have to say that the matter that he has raised today does not meet the requirements of the Standing Order and I therefore cannot submit his application to the House.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Ordered,

That the draft Hovercraft (Application of Enactments) (Amendment) Order 1990 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Boswell.]

Financial Services and the Single European Market

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn—[Mr. Boswell.]

[Relevant documents: The fifth report from the Trade and Industry Committee (House of Commons Paper No. 256 of Session 1988/89) on Financial Services and the Single European Market and the Government Reply contained in the Committee's second special report (House of Commons Paper No. 598 of Session 1988/89).

European Community documents Nos. 4454/89 on guarantees issued by credit institutions or insurance undertakings, 6208/90 on "Capital Adequacy of Investment Firms and Credit Institutions", and the unnumbered explanatory memorandum submitted by the Department of Trade and Industry on 13 July on investment services.]

4.37 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Peter Lilley): I welcome this opportunity to debate the development of the single financial area in Europe. Before I begin, I wish to apologise to the hon. Members for Gateshead, East (Ms. Quin) and for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam) if there has been a failure of communication on my part, although it has the happy result, from my point of view, that I have the opportunity to debate with them. I suspect that we shall find that, although we may have occasional disagreements over measures, we shall have a large measure of agreement on our final objectives.

I begin by paying tribute to the work of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, whose excellent report forms the prelude to this debate. The Government agree with the bulk of the Committee's findings, as we made clear in our response. Like the Committee, we believe that the creation of a single European financial area should open up opportunities for one of Britain's most important industries. Indeed, the British Government have been the foremost exponent and supporter of the single market programme as a whole and of the single financial area in particular.

The single market is a natural extension of the policies of competition, deregulation and free markets which we have implemented domestically, and the single market programme was largely the brainchild of the British Commissioner Lord Cockfield. The unique and original feature of the single market programme was the idea of mutual recognition. Essentially, once a business or process has been authorised and is supervised in one country, all other member states agree to recognise that the business is duly regulated. It will therefore be allowed to do business or to set up branches in their states without undergoing further authorisation. This paradigm is particularly applicable in the financial services industry, as we shall see.

Implementing the single market in financial services is of special importance to the United Kingdom. Financial services are an area in which the United Kingdom has a relative advantage; that is clear from the Cecchini report, which shows that in many aspects of financial services United Kingdom industries' costs are lowest and their financial products are the most competitive.

The importance of the financial services industry to the United Kingdom's economy is shown by the number of people that it employs—some 2·7 million as against 1·6 million only 10 years ago. I refer advisedly to the United Kingdom financial services and not just those of the City of London, because the United Kingdom also contains Scotland, which is our second most important financial centre. The financial services industry is already the largest industry in Scotland, having increased employment by 40 per cent. since 1979. Its contribution to Scottish GDP has grown at the rate of 6·3 per cent. per annum compound. The City of London is one of Britain's most important economic assets. It has the world's largest foreign exchange market, more cross-border equity transactions are carried out in London than in any other world market centre, and the Lloyd's insurance market is unique.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): It is now generally recognised throughout the City that the exchange rate mechanism statement and the base rate cut were leaked. Evidence of that is to be found in the FTSE 100 index, which went up 16 points, from 2,035 to 2,051, in the 90 minutes before the Chancellor's statement. We are told that the City is properly regulated. Will there be a leak inquiry and will the Minister ask the stock exchange surveillance department for a report on what happened during those one and a half hours so that there can be the fullest possible inquiry? May we have an assurance that this matter will not be brushed under the carpet, because many dealers and speculators in the market made millions of pounds in that 90 minutes as a result of having price-sensitive information.

Mr. Lilley: The hon. Gentleman has an unattractive habit of assuming that any allegation is automatically true. Allegations are examined by the authorities that we have established. I shall deal with that later.

All these businesses in the United Kingdom produce a total net income for the balance of payments of more than £6·5 billion per annum and the Government continue to create the conditions for further success. Taxes on business and on individuals have been brought down to more internationally competitive levels and the Chancellor's forthcoming abolition of stamp duty and the change of basis for the taxation of futures and options represent two further breakthroughs for our financial markets.

The strength of the British industry has been accumulated over generations, but it has been based particularly on two factors—its relative openness to competition and the rest of the world and its relatively high standards of integrity and reliability for which the London market is renowned. The Government have been particularly keen to reinforce both strengths. Hence, on the competitive side, the abolition of exchange controls and the removal of restrictive practices prior to big bang. Both these changes intensified domestic competition, encouraged more international players to base themselves in Britain, and consolidated London as the great world financial centre in this time zone.

Raising the standards of probity in financial markets and seeing that these higher standards were properly enforced has been a Government priority since our inception. In 1980, we brought in the first legislation against insider dealing. In 1981 we appointed Professor Gower to review the whole body of law on financial services and investor protection. His report led to the Financial Services Act 1986.

In 1988 we set up the Serious Fraud Office, with its special powers under the Criminal Justice Act 1987, and we reorganised my Department's investigatory and prosecution functions by creating a new investigations division.

The Companies Act 1989 improved international co-operation with the establishment of memoranda of understanding with the USA and Japan in the securities area and the provision of new powers to assist overseas regulators. This is a real record of achievement and contrasts with that of the previous Government, who made no improvements whatever to the regulatory environment. We have strengthened the framework to tackle abuse and dishonesty in the City and other financial markets. The fact that a number of offences and alleged offences have been brought to light in recent years is not evidence that City standards have declined; it is proof that higher standards are being more vigorously enforced. Moreover, some of the more disturbing events took place under the old regime, and would have been more easily detected and therefore deterred under present arrangements.

In creating the main part of the regulatory framework —the Financial Services Act—it was important to strike a balance between the needs to ensure effective investor protection and to avoid a system so onerous and rigid that it would damage businesses and stifle innovation. With the later fine tuning introduced in the Companies Act 1989, we are getting the balance right.

Our system is based firmly in statute, but it also incorporates a significant degree of practitioner involvement. This gives flexibility and the scope for regulation to be sensitive to market needs. It is no accident that much of the regulatory reform at present going on in other EC member states is based on a similar approach. Having put the structure in place, we now look to the regulators and practitioners to make it work. They must do that in as cost-effective and flexible a way as possible, consistent with providing real protection to investors.

Our first priority has been to ensure that our own domestic arrangements are soundly based, but in negotiating the directives that open up the single financial area—the SFA—we have had similar objectives. The keystone to creating an SFA in Europe was the capital liberalisation directive. It came into force on 1 July 1990, by which time exchange controls were abolished in all the main EC countries.

An invaluable aspect of the capital liberalisation directive is that it requires member states to abolish restrictions on foreign exchange transactions not just between member states but erga omnes—that is, with the world as a whole.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): Very good.

Mr. Lilley: I had to look it up.

Following that, the second banking directive was adopted in December 1989. It will take effect on 1 January 1993. It incorporates the mutual recognition principle, and we hope that it will be the paradigm for all directives in this sector.

Essentially, banks and building societies will be given a passport to sell their services across borders and to establish branches, authorised and supervised by the monetary authorities in their home state.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): Everyone recognises the importance and the fast progress that has been made in negotiating and agreeing these directives. Does my right hon. Friend agree that, important as the directives are, it is equally important that they be observed in the same way in each country? It is one thing to have a single passport or a level playing field, but it is quite another to translate that into the same degree of observance in each member state. Although there is commonality in the trade in agricultural products, other countries frequently flout the rules.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Lamb in France.

Mr. Nelson: Lamb in France is an example. What guarantees or sureties are there that not only will the directives be enforced but that they will be interpreted in the same way in each country?

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend makes a good point. The United Kingdom is always in the forefront in implementing directives once they have been agreed, even though we may have difficulties with them when they are being negotiated. We are also in the forefront in enforcing them properly, objectively and effectively. We expect to see similar practices followed by our partners in the Community and, of course, they are subject to the European Court of Justice if they fail to do so.

As I have said, the second banking directive will give banks a passport to offer investment services as well as normal banking services, but specialist investment service companies that are not part of banking groups are not covered by that directive.

The investment services directive is intended to entitle them, too, to a single passport. On the continent, most investment advisers are parts of large banking groups and only the United Kingdom has a sizeable number of specialist investment firms outside banking. Hence this directive is particularly important to the United Kingdom.

One of our key objectives has been to ensure that the second banking directive and the investment services directives come into force simultaneously. Any delay in the investment services directive would put our independent investment services firms at a disadvantage to competitors that are part of big banking groups. Happily, negotiations on this directive are proceeding apace, and the United Kingdom welcomes the goal of the Italian presidency to reach a common position among member states by the end of this year.

However, the House will understand that agreeing this directive is a negotiating process and we still have some very important work to do to achieve the right provisions. Some of these provisions, such as those affecting the position of the professions and independent financial advisers, depend on the outcome of the capital adequacy directive. I should like to see them given a passport under the investment services directive.

The position of appointed representatives is another area where we have not yet reached agreement. Under United Kingdom law, appointed representatives of investment firms do not need to be separately authorised. The directive, as currently drafted, would require them to be authorised and I know that this is causing the industry some concern. However, I hope that we shall be able to resolve that point satisfactorily.

The concomitant of the second banking directive and the investment services directive is the capital adequacy directive, which ensures that all financial services supervisors enforce certain minimum standards of capital adequacy to prevent regulatory arbitrage. However, it is important that the final capital adequacy directive should relate capital requirements for each type of business to the risks that firms actually accept. That means not overburdening existing firms or closing the market to new firms. Equally, I do not want such a level of reserves that business is lost from the whole Community.

The third measure—the proposed regulation on guarantees—is also a market-opening measure, but it is not yet one that we can support. It would oblige public bodies to accept guarantees offered by any credit institution or insurance company authorised in the European Community. The Government appreciate the intention behind the draft regulation—which I understand to be to prohibit discrimination on the ground of nationality—but we believe that it is unnecessary, because discrimination on the ground of nationality is already prohibited by the treaty of Rome.

As drafted, the regulation is seriously flawed and unworkable. It would require a public body to accept any guarantee offered, irrespective of the financial standing of the institution offering the guarantee. It would have to be accepted, regardless of whether the guarantee was unreasonably large in relation to the size of the institution offering it; regardless of its terms; and regardless of the merits of competing prospective offers, which would have to be ignored. Those concerns have been put to the Commission, which, we believe, recognises some force in them. It is reconsidering the terms of the regulation and we await further proposals.

The Select Committee expressed particular concern about the lack of progress in the liberalisation of insurance. While some progress has been made, the Government fully share the Committee's concern. There has been freedom since the 1970s for establishments to set up branches and subsidiaries in the Community, but that freedom has been subject to regulation by the host state. Some host states have used that supervisory role to control tariffs and the terms of the policies that may be sold. The result has been to protect home markets from price competition and from the innovation in which the United Kingdom industry excels.

The Cecchini report noted a wide disparity of prices for insurance throughout the Community which could not be explained by differing risks. Freedom of services is especially important for the British insurance industry. Last year, the insurance sector contributed almost £3 billion in invisible earnings—about half of the total of all financial institutions. It employs 340,000 people in the United Kingdom, a quarter of them in Scotland and the north of England.

The second non-life insurance directive, which came into force this year, provided genuine liberalisation of the market for large commercial and industrial risks, but outside that area the picture is not bright, at least in the short term. We are far from a position in which every European consumer has a free choice in purchasing any insurance policy that he wants from an authorised insurance company. That denial of freedom of choice is said to be justified on consumer protection grounds, but sometimes it appears to be more like producer protection.

However, at the end of last year, Sir Leon Brittan announced that the Commission intended to adopt for the insurance market the principle of the single licence, or single European passport, which has already been introduced for other financial service sectors. That approach is embodied in the Commission's proposal for the non-life insurance framework directive. It was formally presented to the Council by Sir Leon Brittan on 17 September, and it will shortly be undergoing the usual scrutiny procedures of the House.

The single licence will enable insurers to provide all types of non-life insurance throughout the EC. They will be able to establish local branches in other member states and transact business across frontiers, subject to the authorisation of and prudential supervision by the authorities of their home state alone. Control of British insurers' prices, tariffs and policies by other member states will end and there will be genuine freedom of choice. That is good news for European consumers and also for British industry.

Mr. Stan Crowther (Rotherham): Does the Secretary of State agree that that happy state of affairs will not happen by 1993?

Mr. Lilley: I agree that it is unlikely to be implemented by then, but I hope that agreement can be reached on the directives.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): My right hon. Friend rightly stressed the importance of all the directives to the financial services industry, but even more important is the impact on the wider Community—the investors and the businesses that want to take advantage of the single market. One of the great problems in Britain is the considerable delay in clearing payments between one country and another. I understand that a discussion paper published by the Commission, that was recently given to my right hon. Friend, dealt with possible methods of speeding up payments. That would be of great benefit to small businesses and investors in this country. What is my right hon. Friend's attitude to that discussion paper?

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend has made a good point about an important aspect of business across frontiers. We shall consider the discussion paper, but it would be wrong to give an off-the-cuff response.

British industry has welcomed our approach to liberalisation, and it is for it to take advantage of the new opportunities in prospect. The Commission is due to bring forward, by the end of the year, a parallel proposal for the life assurance framework directive. That will extend the single licence principle to the life assurance sector. We welcome the Commission's declared intention to give the highest priority to achieving its early adoption. It is essential that insurance is treated on a par with other financial services.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Is my right hon. Friend seized of the point that time is of the essence in reciprocity? While German banks can sell German life insurance in Britain, but British life insurance companies cannot sell their policies in France, there is unequal competition.

On the question of fraud, will my right hon. Friend comment on the recommendation in paragraph 82 that actions for damages should be justiciable in the country in which the person who suffers lives? People with modest means have access to legal aid for an action in this country, but they cannot sue a Greek insurance company in Greece with British legal aid.

Mr. Lilley: I agree that it is important that we reach agreement as soon as possible. The Commission is now seeking to do that, and we are giving every support. Of course, for as long as we fail to have the directive in place, the position described by my hon. Friend will pertain. In general, British insurance companies have the edge over foreign competitors, so it is they who want access to foreign markets, rather than the reverse. I think that I accept my hon. Friend's point on justiciability, but I want to consider it further. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary may give him an answer when he replies to the debate.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The Secretary of State said that British insurance firms have the edge, and I do not doubt that that is true. Is not that also precisely why —quite frankly, this is anecdotal—a number of Scottish firms are worried about doing business in Europe? They believe that barriers are being put up by people who know that we have the edge. That is especially true with medical insurance. Has the right hon. Gentleman received any representations from medical insurers?

Mr. Lilley: I have. I have visited Scotland twice in the past fortnight and that point was made on each occasion. The Scottish institutions are at the forefront of the industry, and if they have any specific evidence of obstacles being put in their way, I hope that they will bring it to the Government's attention. We will use it as further evidence of the need for progress.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Germans are saying that they do not understand the concept of insurance broking, and therefore would have to pass special legislation before Germany could achieve the same standards as Britain? Does he agree that that is largely an excuse for delay? Will he do everything possible to ensure that the Germans do not use that bogus reason for delaying progress?

Mr. Lilley: It is true that insurance broking is not as developed in Germany as it is in this country, which is one reason why our insurance industry could benefit from the liberalisation of the Germany market. I agree that there should not be any artificial restrictions, and the absence of legislation should not be taken as an absence of permission to trade under Common Market rules. We would be hostile to any such legal interpretation.

For the Government, an important aspect of the debate will be the contributions from many hon. Members who have expertise and interest in this subject.

Progress with the single financial area is moving in the right direction, and we have avoided the dangers and pitfalls that might have presented themselves. We avoided also the over-rigorous harmonisation of sectors, which could have meant that idiosyncratic institutions and those perculiar to the United Kingdom—such as discount houses, gilt-edged market makers, and so on—would have suffered. We obtained proper permission to allow them to continue operating.

We also avoided the Fortress Europe approach and placing too much emphasis on reciprocity provisions with others outside Europe. We have ensured that the main emphasis is on mutual recognition of supervision by different member states, so that we are in the business of deregulating and of freeing up the market rather than otherwise.

The greatest changes will be those that result from the psychological changes that the directives bring about. I mean by that a greater willingness by producers and consumers alike to think beyond their own national borders. It is very much up to our industry to take advantage now of the opportunities that have already been opened up, to prepare for those that have yet to present themselves, and to respond to the change in the psychological climate. It will be immensely to the advantage of the industry and to this country if that is done.

5 pm

Ms. Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): I welcome the new Secretary of State of Trade and Industry and congratulate him on his appointment. This week, we read in our newspapers that only 2 per cent. of the public knew who he was.

Mr. Lilley: That is a higher proportion than the percentage of the general public with whom I am familiar.

Ms. Mowlam: I am sure that that is so, but that is the Secretary of State's problem, not the public's. The right hon. Gentleman is the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, and the public are not.

If only 2 per cent. of the public know anything about the Secretary of State, one must hope that he will double that figure by the time of the next general election. If so, he will be progressing as fast as inflation under the present Government.

The Secretary of State's speech was marked by a great deal of complacency. He said that regulation is in place and working, but has he forgotten Barlow Clowes, House of Fraser, Dunsdale Securities, Blue Arrow, Polly Peck, Guinness, and British and Commonwealth?

The right hon. Gentleman said also that he hoped that a "psychological change" would flow from the directives, and that the City would wake up to that change. However, as the many questions from all parts of the House show, the insurance industry does not need a psychological change. It is worried about the built-in structural differences that pose difficulties to British insurance companies. It does not need a psychological change, and for the right hon. Gentleman to suggest that one should be the main focus of the directives is very worrying.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): Does the hon. Lady appreciate that the Barlow Clowes scandal and the others to which she referred occurred under the previous regulatory regime, before the existing financial services structure was put in place and before the single market regime came into effect?

Ms. Mowlam: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman acknowledges that the same degree of complacency was evident before the new legislation's implementation in 1986. There is no substance to the point that he makes. The Blue Arrow case is to go before the courts this week, and in that instance the compliance officers were operating as a consequence of the Financial Services Act 1986. Other cases that have arisen since then include British and Commonwealth and Polly Peck. I accept that the Guinness and Barlow Clowes scandals, together with others, were perpetrated before that legislation, but of the six or seven instances that I cited, the majority have occurred since the Act was implemented.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Perhaps I may add to my hon. Friend's list the case that I raised before. I refer to the leaking of price-sensitive information relating to the cut in the base rate a week last Friday. It is known by City dealers that a firm named Barclays de Zoete Wedd and another named Salomon Brothers were both active in the market in the one and a half hours before the Chancellor's statement. People are asking questions about those companies' actions, and if only to clear their reputation, if that is possible, the Government should order an inquiry into how that price-sensitive information got into the hands of people in the City.

Is it true that a senior Minister had dinner the evening before with a director of a major City bank, when the imminent cut in the interest rate was discussed? I only want to know the truth. Did that happen, or did it not?

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South): Answer.

Ms. Mowlam: I thank my hon. Friend for raising that point.

Mr. Bruce: Answer.

Ms. Mowlam: I will answer, if the hon. Gentleman will permit me. I am sure that the Secretary of State listened carefully to my hon. Friend's remarks, and I hope that he will fully cover them when he winds up the debate.

As the House knows, we welcome the move towards a single market. At the same time, we accept the widely held view that the pace of change will be slow as a result of the many aspects that the Secretary of State mentioned, including derogation, different regulatory systems, and cultural and linguistic barriers.

Mr. Batiste: The hon. Lady welcomes the creation of a single market, but does she accept that the introduction of credit restrictions in the United Kingdom would severely weaken our banks and financial institutions at the very time that they need to perform at their best? Will she completely dissociate the Labour party from the introduction of any system of credit control?

Ms. Mowlam: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware that the proposals contained in our three-pronged approach to the country's economic problems are no different in respect of credit controls from those of the French and Germans, so clearly that will not be a problem in the single market.

It would be helpful if the Government would take into account and recognise the contribution by the City and the financial services sector to the British economy, and that it is in the interests of all British people that Government policies—including those of the next Labour Government—help to maintain the financial services industry's quality and vitality.

Contrary to the assertions by the Secretary of State last week, the Labour party is happy to be an ally of the City, provided that the City is happy to be an ally of the British people. The aims and values that the Labour party conference openly embraced state that we welcome the open market wherever its free operation achieves the end of providing real choice for the consumer. The difference between our attitude and that often displayed by the Government is that they and the Tory party have become hypnotised by their own obsessions with the single market and have forgotten its ultimate purpose. The open market has become for the Government an end in itself. For us, it is the means to an end. Only at the point at which the single market fails to deliver that end will we intervene.

That view does not detract from our concerns about the failure of long-term investment in British industry—but no doubt a debate on the implications of taking the short-term approach will take place on another occasion. From the principle that I have stated flow our two main objectives—to ensure a positive enabling approach to UK financial services in Europe, and to maintain a firm commitment to investor protection for consumers of financial services in the UK.

From the negotiations leading to the big bang, to the introduction of the Financial Services Act 1986, one Minister after another has tried to convince the industry that the Government have been doing a good job. As has already been pointed out, the new Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is the ninth in as many years. I am sure that the new Secretary of State believes, like his predecessors, that he can do an even better job and that only a few changes are required to correct the minor errors that remain.

The reality is very different. Over the past year, I have spent a considerable amount of time listening to people in the financial community voicing their growing resentment of the failure of strategies executed or supported by the Department of Trade and Industry over the past 10 years. Examples include the selection of the wrong market maker system in SEAQ to the virtually complete re-writing of the FSA rules and structure, where the Government blundered along without direction.

The same is true of the Government's dealings in respect of Europe. Despite their recent trumpeting about co-ordinating international bodies, which the right hon. Gentleman repeated today, successive Ministers failed to rationalise the dissemination of information in the real business of enforcement. Ministers have gone to the United States and to Japan, and have returned only with agreements that had already been reached between the regulatory bodies of those countries and of this country.

How can the City have faith in a Government who pay minimal attention in the directive on undertakings for collective investment in transferable securities to the problems confronting our unit trust industry, which the Secretary of State failed to mention, because of the unfair advantage enjoyed by our competitors who have, as the Germans do, tied distribution channels, so making access for our industry more difficult and problematic?

Secondly, as the Minister mentioned, there are the difficulties in the insurance industry, which faces structural problems. Banks in Germany and France make it difficult for competitors to get into the market, as they are an addition, and it worries them greatly. Then there are the problems of greater vulnerability to takeovers in the industry when faced with French and German conglomerates.

Thirdly, there is the question of the future for our intermediaries when they are faced with the high capital adequacy levels demanded in the capital adequacy directive that the Minister referred to. Labour wants the London market to remain the lead financial centre in Europe. It is quite clearly a national asset of considerable value.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms. Mowlam: Yes, but it is the last time.

Mr. Hanley: I am grateful, and I declare any interest which might be published in The Observer colour magazine.

Will the hon. Lady make it absolutely clear whether her party's major policy is that of direct intervention by the state, or whether she will still uphold the Government's policy, which is basically self-regulation under supervision from the state?

Ms. Mowlam: I have answered that in principle, and I shall answer it in detail in a minute.

The London market is of essential importance to this country and we want it to continue. The difficulty—this was evident from the Secretary of State's remarks on the insurance industry—and what the Secretary of State does not seem to realise, is that, when other representatives in the EC talk about level playing fields, they send 12 players to the negotiations. The Government send our team without even a goalie. That is the sort of problem we face in negotiations in Europe. If the Government do not do what the French Government are doing for Paris and what the Germans are doing for Frankfurt, however hard the City competes for business in the single market its prospects will be scuppered.

Our greatest concern must be the Government's cavalier attitude towards consumers' interests. The Government were primarily motivated to promote wider share ownership as a cheap way of trying to popularise privatisations. Having created those investors for their own convenience, the Government must now have a responsibility for their interests.

What have the Government done to avoid the situation in which the number of brokers prepared to deal with private clients has plummeted? There has been no mention of that today. The minimum size of deals now accepted by some brokers is as high as £50,000 or £100,000.

If the investment services directive, to which the Secretary of State referred, is accepted as it now stands, investors who put their money into other European firms may not be entitled to the same sort of protection for their money as investors in British firms. In the years ahead, we could well be hearing of another Barlow Clowes, and even if it was a Barlow Clowes with a French, Spanish or Italian accent, the outcome for British investors will be exactly the same.

The major area where the Government have failed to protect the British people in the open market—it is amazing that the Minister got through his speech without even mentioning it in passing—is by ignoring the need for a consumers directive to be implemented at the same time as other directives in 1993. When I mention the interests of the British people, I mean the British people, not some small group of people dealing in an obscure market. I mean the 41 million people who have building society or bank accounts, the 24 million people with car insurance and the 18 million with life assurance. They need to know what rights and protections they have if they purchase services from other European countries. At present, the Government will fail to tell them.

Let us turn briefly to what the City is saying. Today, the Minister described why he thinks that the Government should be proud of their record on regulation and investor protection. The Government have introduced a cycle of regulation followed by deregulation. Let us look back to the curtailment of powers of business investors to take civil actions when firms breach self-regulatory organisations' rules, which was once described—the Secretary of State grins—as the cornerstone of the Financial Services Act 1986. That is one of the many U-turns which the Government have implemented and the industry has had to survive.

There is no doubt that a quality product, produced in this country, needs defending and that its standards need to be maintained. If self-regulation cannot enhance and maintain that quality, the Government should act as quality controller.

The structure of regulation of financial services in this country requires amendment. It seems that everyone except the Government agrees with that. On this side of the House, we are not interested in change for change's sake. Quite clearly, the present structure is young and needs a period of stability to bed down, but several major weaknesses have been exposed in the existing system which need changing, both in the duplication of regulatory agencies and in the detection of fraud. What the Government and the Secretary of State have failed to acknowledge today is that, unless these problems are dealt with, the integrity of the present regulatory regime will be undermined.

We are not arguing for more regulation: we want more effective and precise regulation. If one talks and listens to people in the City, one realises that that is the problem that they and the investors are facing.

Sir Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar) rose——

Ms. Mowlam: I am sorry, but I have given way too often, and many hon. Members wish to speak.

Consumers are heavily dependent on other people's skill and integrity when buying a financial service. Therefore, it is as well, in some senses, that the Government are not offering financial services. Investors are bombarded by cross-selling between banks and building societies, and are exposed to the highly dubious practice of cold calling. We need to know what has happened to the attempt to agree even minimal harmonisation of regulatory rules across host nations so that consumer protection is maintained.

In its place, we have conduct of business rules, which, as the Secretary of State mentioned earlier, are designed to protect the consumer. The Secretary of State failed to tell the House that these rules can be challenged by non-British firms in the courts on the basis of whether or not they serve the "general good". If that happens and the case is taken to court, it could take a number of years. The person who suffers in the interim is the British investor. In the meantime, EC firms will come here and our firms will suffer for lack of a competitive advantage.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs (Mr. John Redwood): Could the hon. Lady clarify for us which regulatory bodies the Opposition would abolish, and which ones they would set up and strengthen?

Ms. Mowlam: I was not referring specifically to financial bodies. I made two points very clearly. First, under the present system of regulation, there are a number of regulatory bodies, and they need streamlining—talk to anyone in the City and they will confirm that. As the Minister well knows, the Association of Futures Brokers and Dealers and the Securities Association are in negotiations, and other negotiations have been considered and will be considered, so streamlining is already under way.

Secondly, I referred to the regulation of serious fraud. About a dozen bodies deal with that. The Select Committee—not the report that we are discussing today, so this is not really relevant, but I shall answer the Minister's question—stated quite clearly that, in company investigations, a centralised computer-based system was needed. The Minister is so concerned about what we shall do with those regulatory bodies, but it will be equally interesting if he can answer whether that centralised database will be provided. The regulatory bodies need that degree of communication.

It would also help, if the right hon. Gentleman is interested in answering, if he told us how he advises Japanese and United States regulatory bodies when they come to this country. I have been to the States and talked to such bodies. With the present Government's regulatory structure, it is impossible for such bodies to know whether they should talk to the Serious Fraud Office, the Department of Trade and Industry, TSA or the Securities and Investments Board. Clearly, under our present system, that is a problem which we would address. It will be interesting to see if the Minister has any suggestions to make about what he would do.

Sir Robert McCrindle rose——

Ms. Mowlam: I am sorry, but I gave way to the Minister as a matter of courtesy and I shall not give way any more.

The point that I was making about business rules, which is central to consumers in this country, is that we have a set of rules that can be taken to the courts and as a result the protection that we consider essential for our consumers could be rejected on the grounds of general good. That is not just my worry. The British Bankers Association, which made a submission for this debate, is particularly worried about that point, not just for consumers, but for the competitive disadvantage to British industry.

The Minister knows, but failed to tell the House today, that in reality, without a consumers' directive but with the list of directives that he gave us, we shall get a harmonising down in consumer protection to the lowest common denominator of the European countries. When the Labour party comes to power, it will fight hard for a consumers directive. In the interim, the least that the Government can do is ensure that clients' assets are not available to the liquidator in the event of an investment firm becoming insolvent. Clearly that is not a problem here, but because of some structural conditions in other countries, it will present difficulties in harmonisation.

The Government should further ensure that all EC firms must disclose the nature of their compensation scheme by telling investors at the point of sale exactly what scheme applies, so what compensation they are entitled to. The minimum that the Government should achieve is that compensation schemes throughout Europe meet strict criteria, such as the index-linking of any limits on compensation and cheap, easy access to such claims.

The problems of cross-frontier dealing create considerable difficulties for British consumers. In 1987, there was a case before the European Court of a British person living in Spain dealing with a Swiss insurance company about a problem with his car in Italy. It was not clear under which country's law that particular consumer should make his complaint. Such a problem is a legal nightmare for the individual. It is enough to make any British consumer break out in a cold sweat. They now face the prospect of recurrent cosmopolitan nightmares under the present regulations without that directive.

Consumers will not be alone in suffering from sleepless nights if the future of London as the lead financial centre is called into question. The House is well aware of the City's present clear advantages: in-depth experience, a range of specialist markets and greater liquidity than elsewhere. They need to be supplemented with Government assistance and encouragement not only to improve infrastructure and to supply trained and qualified staff, but to integrate technological infrastructures and to extend communications, such as the countrywide broad-band network.

Without those changes, the City will struggle to keep its competitive edge. The Labour party is pledged to give that support. The disengagement of Department of Trade and Industry Ministers is pervasive, yet the task is so central that it is left to the chair of TSA, Stanislov Yassukovich, to suggest that City of London corporation should set up a research unit to fund the problems of infrastructure in the City of London. If the Department of enterprise illustrated half the enterprise that it expects of others and dealt with that problem, the City would not face its present difficulties.

The Government in their response not just to Europe but to the City may go down in history as so complacent —perfectly illustrated by the Secretary of State's speech today—that the map of the square mile must undergo a humiliating boundary review as we reach the next century.

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on his first speech in his new post from the Dispatch Box. Whatever the stupidity of the 2 per cent., he is admired by 100 per cent. of Conservative Members, who believe that he is the man for the job.

I declare a formal interest in the debate. I doubt whether any hon. Member with outside interests is not affected by the developments as we move increasingly fast towards 1992. I hope that the business managers on both sides will note my regret that Back-Bench Members are to be given only 70 or 80 minutes to debate this important subject. The benefit of that to those present is that my speech will be severely truncated. It is important that more time should be given to these important issues.

I am not so much concerned that it has taken 16 months for this matter to come to the Floor of the House. When a Select Committee report is published, it is good to give the House and those outside who are interested in it time to review what is going on. It may be uncharacteristic for a Select Committee member to do so, but I thank the Department of Trade and Industry for the efficiency with which it has made available in time for this debate several papers which we requested. We trust that that is a foretaste of how it will assist us in future. Today's papers state that the Confederation of British Industry will investigate the DTI. After that, the light cavalry of the Select Committee may investigate the CBI. We are grateful to the DTI for its response.

In my short speech today I shall touch on three items: the Export Credits Guarantee Department, which is causing considerable concern inside and outside the European Community, in terms of our competitiveness compared with other Government-sponsored organisations within the EC; the regulatory organisations which were touched on by the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam); and banking. I shall leave insurance to my elders and betters.

The report and this debate seek fair and equal access for firms to EC and worldwide markets.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: At the same time.

Mr. Warren: My hon. Friend is always at my right hand with the apposite words.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will recognise that, in all discussions and negotiations in the EC, we must not merely focus on what Brussels says. British companies must operate across the world. The threat from Tokyo and New York to the acknowledged supremacy of London is constant and growing. My right hon. Friend and his colleagues are well aware that, within the EC, Frankfurt is breathing increasingly hotly down our neck, with Paris and Amsterdam not far behind keeping the pressure on us.

We must see ourselves not just within the EC. We must recognise that disparities in competition must be measured on a worldwide scale. We may understand that, but I am not sure whether Mr. Delors and his merry troop see further than the gates of Brussels. I hope that the Government will bring it to their attention that we seek to operate within the world market, as should the whole EC.

One of the benefits of giving a report time to settle is that various authorities have a chance of telling us how they see the developments to which we have drawn attention. There is absolutely no question but that the lack of a proper working regime for the ECGD worries British exporters more than anything else. There is unquestionable evidence that the ECGD premiums are higher than those charged to our competitors by their national credit insurers. The Select Committee and those in industry are worried that the portfolio management system as it is proposed will not enable us to remain competitive with other nation states.

The Government—even a non-interventionist Government—must recognise that they are in partnership with all those who seek to export. They cannot escape that liability. Unless they campaign within the EC for reductions by organisations, such as Hermes and COFACE, in their methods of operation in parallel with our own, in seeking to provide more private enterprise, we shall destroy it.

Hon. Members have referred to regulatory bodies. When my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs intervened to ask the hon. Lady which bodies she would like to get rid of, I wondered whether I could stand up and say anything about that. I have a shopping list and I shall run quickly through it.

There are six financial service regulators, nine professional bodies, seven recognised investment exchanges, two clearing houses, the Bank of England and a partridge in a pear tree. We have 24 separate regulatory bodies. When my hon. Friend the Minister replies to the debate it would be worth looking at that and seeing whether, after some years of working, the Banking Act 1987 and the Financial Services Act 1986 can be improved. The Government must maintain a competitive stance in parallel with the efforts of our exporters of visible and invisible goods.

The Securities and Investments Board is doing quite a good job but if we look at some of the other organisations it is extraordinary to find the number of staff they have in relation to the number of firms they serve. I shall throw a few acronyms around and hope that hon. Members will be able to translate them immediately in order to save time. The AFBD—Association of Futures Brokers and Dealers—has one member of staff for eight member firms. However, FIMBRA—the Financial Intermediaries, Managers and Brokers Regulatory Organisation—has one member of staff for 400 member firms. LAUTRO—the Life Assurance and Unit Trust Regulatory Organisation—has one member of staff for 10 member firms. IMRO—the Investment Management Regulatory Organisation—has one member of staff for 130 member firms and TSA—the Securities Association—has one member of staff for five member firms. There is something wrong that so many regulatory bodies are needed. Something should be done to try to sift them down, because for the financial service regulators alone, there are 800 staff costing 46 million.

On rare occasions, Select Committee members are invited to sumptuous dinners in the City. We are not regarded as highly as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his colleagues, but on those occasions we are told that one of the penalties of the Financial Services Act which is now becoming apparent is that it is costing more to compete and that therefore we are not achieving the sort of service that my right hon. Friend and his colleagues intended in order to make the country and the City more competitive.

Mr. Nelson: This is an important point, about which some of us have written to my hon. Friend in his capacity as Chairman of the Select Committee, and I hope that he will answer me. My hon. Friend mentioned the cost that falls on many firms. Part of that cost is that they pay subscriptions to the Securities and Investments Board to keep it running. Although my hon. Friend has said that the SIB is doing a good job, many firms feel aggrieved that there is little accountability for the way the money is spent or the administration of that body. The Select Committee on Trade and Industry has done an excellent job in producing the report. Why does it not ensure that the SIB is brought before it annually for proper scrutiny and press for a debate at least every year on the annual report of that body?

Mr. Warren: I have taken note of my hon. Friend's letter and I have brought it to the Committee's attention. We have a busy schedule, but my hon. Friend has reinforced his concern and we shall consider it as we come to our new programme in the month ahead.

Britain has over 330 banks of various types and they are almost unanimous, as are many other organisations, in that they are pleased with the responsiveness of the Department of Trade and Industry and the Government to representations made to them. However, they are concerned that the dialogue should go on and on and that it should not be simply an occasional meeting. There must be a continual flow of information.

If the trade associations are to function properly, they must get good and efficient feedback to their members. The banks feel that there are still considerable problems in investment services, capital adequacy directives and others. If time permitted, I would have gone into detail. I shall not do so now, except to say that I hope to have an opportunity to write to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about the concerns.

The Government are pursuing the negotiations towards 1992. As my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) is repeatedly pointing out, 1992 first becomes effective in 1993, and other hon. Members have pointed out that it will become effective much later than that as some of the German insurance companies are brought to heel and become as competitive as we are. I hope that the Government will recognise that the negotiations must look at the world context, which I mentioned at the beginning of my speech. In the negotiations proceeding with the European economic space, which the Select Committee has recently investigated, I hope that it will be seen that the new dimension provides partnerships which will be of interest to this country in the furtherance of its objectives in the EC.

In terms of the Government as a partner, it must be said that the criticism that often flows from the Select Committee is that it must be more efficient in terms of its regulations and negotiations. This is about ordinary people—the customer, the person with the bank account and those who invest in the privatisations that occur nicely and regularly. Above all, it is about the need for the Government to ensure that quality is available for all customers at home and those from across the world who want to invest.

5.35 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I congratulate the Secretary of State on his promotion. When the lights in the Chamber suddenly brightened alarmingly, I thought that it was a belated attempt to give him the star billing that he achieved at the Conservative party conference. However, as it happened during the speech of the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam) I thought that perhaps Peter Mandelson had made his way into the building and that sweet music would shortly follow. Fortunately, all has been restored to normal, which is better for the rest of us who may not be improved by the shining of brighter lights.

I congratulate the Chairman of the Select Committee, the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren), on the excellent report, massive though it is. It said that we should join the exchange rate mechanism as soon as possible. It was published on 12 July 1989. Between that date and now there have been some competitive exchange rates at which we could have joined. I hope that the hon. Gentleman's recommendations are implemented more quickly in future.

We welcome the single market in all aspects, financial services and others, and seek to bring it to reality as soon as possible. In general, I support and approve of what the Government are doing in that respect. However, the Government are wrong in their rhetoric. They have not really helped the British public understand what this is all about. Despite all the publicity produced by the Department of Trade and Industry, so much of what Ministers and Back Benchers say is about meddling Brussels bureaucrats daring to interfere in how we organise things in Britain.

In reality, much of it is about trying to harmonise standards so that no one country's products are disadvantaged in the market of another. Sometimes, that works against our immediate interest. However, the Government should not constantly deride, attack and ridicule that process. If they do so, people will never understand that, as with French lamb, in insurance services it is in Britain's interests that there is proper harmonisation and uniform enforcement of rules so that we have access to markets in other countries.

The test we should apply to harmonisation is whether it advances the interests of the single market. Of course it does not always do so, and we can criticise it on those grounds. Putting VAT on the acquisition of lifeboat equipment by the Royal National Lifeboat Institution would do nothing to improve the single market; nor does general VAT harmonisation seem to be necessary to the achievement of a single market. Some harmonisation of standards is required to ensure that our products are not put at a disadvantage by the imposition of different and, in some cases, artificial restrictions by other member countries. No doubt they will think the same about us from time to time.

I want to remind the Government about several areas of concern, some of which are in their minds already. The first is the position of independent advisers, including sole traders. That includes many FIMBRA members. They are the subject of the new regulations system, but their position is different from that in other member countries. Independent financial advisers have had a hard time of late in several respects, not least of which is that the rules of disclosure that apply to them have been more demanding than those applied to building societies where tied assurance arrangements are becoming widespread.

People are taking on insurance commitments without realising the financial advantages that have accrued to the people who sold them, even though it is sometimes a body as respectable as a building society. Against that background, independent financial advisers, who quite properly are subject to a developed system of regulation, need some assurance that their interests are being looked after and that their opportunities to trade will continue.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Should we not quickly make further progress to ensure proper, clear disclosure of insurance brokers' commissions on the premiums of underwriting insurance companies' policies?

Mr. Beith: I agree absolutely. Whether it be brokers, building societies or any other bodies, disclosure is essential if a customer is to know what is going on, not least a customer who has started on the road to obtaining a mortgage but starts to realise some way down that road the financial transactions that lie behind the insurance that is being offered.

The second point that I want to draw to the Government's attention is the position of the insurance industry in general, and I was glad that the Secretary of State referred to it. The insurance industry provides substantial regional employment in England and key employment in Scotland. In Edinburgh, increasingly in Glasgow and even in places such as Stirling, the insurance industry is a big employer. In the regional capitals of England such as Liverpool, Bristol and Norwich——

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): Manchester.

Mr. Beith: Yes, but central Manchester is no longer the centre that it was because companies have moved further out into the leafy suburbs. Nevertheless, the insurance industry is an important regional employer and it is at specific disadvantages trading in Europe, of which the Minister is well aware and which must be removed if there is to be a genuine single market.

I have a worry about the passport system for all the various categories of financial trader, whether it be an insurance company, a security company or anything else. Certification in a company's own country being valid elsewhere is the right way to make rapid progress, but I should not like us to move towards a flag of convenience pattern, whereby companies are invited to move to a country of less stringent regulation, thus obtaining the passport to trade anywhere and yet be subject to less effective controls. The passport system must be accompanied by steadily growing uniformity of standard and regulation. We do not want a Liberia or Panama of the insurance or security industry world, whereby a country is attractive for a company to base its operations because regulation is less stringent and the consumer less well protected.

There is a further concern to which the Minister referred—ensuring that securities companies are able to trade and are not subject to unfair competition from the security operations owned by banks in other member countries. This revolves around getting the simultaneous approval of several directives. I was not clear whether, by suggesting that this is "proceeding apace", the Minister is confident that from day one of the financial single market there will be fair competition. We must ensure fair competition, and companies are seeking to do so, but we should like some assurance that it will be achieved.

A further concern is the takeover and merger differences between this country and other countries. British companies are severely subject to the threat of takeover and merger—a threat which is not present in some other member countries. That represents a significant distortion of the market, and we must address it. It is difficult, because in some respects the pressure for takeovers aned mergers in this country is oppressive, although it can also be argued that it is one means of promoting management efficiency, and its absence in some other member countries allows inefficiency to flourish. We must ensure that the extent of exposure to takeover, which is characteristic of British companies, does not place them at a disadvantage in the competitive market.

That raises some of the wider issues about how industry is financed and how financial institutions operate, because there are further differences between practice here and in other European countries. It is a common cry of industry in this country that a more long-term view is taken by German financial institutions than British ones and that their attitude to borrowing is different. The single market is an opportunity for us to enter that debate and to see whether we can change some of the short-termism that Ministers have criticised, while opening up financial markets. That is one aspect from which we may be able to learn from other countries in Europe.

The last point that I wish to make concerns the position of the City of London in the system. Competition is brewing between London, Paris and Frankfurt. The decision to enter the exchange rate mechanism helps to secure the position that London has already earned because of the scale of transactions and the free market in London. It is my firm view that that position would be better enhanced if Britain were clearly committed to the single currency and to European monetary union in more than the nominal sense in which the Prime Minister accepts that concept. London will lose out badly without that commitment.

I think that it was a Deutsche bank adviser who said that the ideal European currency would be a currency with a French name, managed according to German principles from a central bank based in London. That is exactly what I want to see—a currency based in London, but managed with the attitudes to price stability and prudence that have characterised the Bundesbank for many years since the war. It is time that the Government, who are supposed to be in favour of combating inflation, took that principle on board. If we are, in the words of the Leader of the House, in the ticket office or the back carriage of the train, we impede London's opportunities to be the financial capital of Europe, which in so many respects it so obviously deserves to be.

5.45 pm

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): I shall do my best to be brief. That is normally a precursor to a very long speech, but it is a very long report from the Select Committee on Trade and Industry.

After months of modest meals and hard work, the Select Committee reached 20 conclusions and 37 recommendations. In retrospect, perhaps we involved ourselves in a scatter-gun approach, and it might have been better if we had brought those things together, but the fact that the Committee reached 20 conclusions and 37 recommendations shows the mind-bending complexity of the problem that we are considering. I should not dream of taking hon. Members from one to 20 or one to 37, but I shall emphasise those matters that seem of importance.

If we are using Latin tags, the Minister may recall the simplistic philosphical observation cogito ergo sum, which for his benefit means: I think, therefore I am. That cannot be applied to every hon. Member of this assembly. I have just invented something that might be appropriate to the Brussels directorate—directamus ergo existo. If I remember the Latin word for table, tablamus, it could be tablamus ergo existo, which clearly is not true. The fact that there is a directive or something is tabled does not necessarily mean that it exists in the real world, and certainly not in the financial world.

May I deal with the point made by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith)? The Committee did not say that we should join the ERM as a matter of urgency. It said:

> "United Kingdom membership of the ERM or the use of a common currency would help to promote a single market in financial services but the absence of either" is not a major barrier to such a single market. We are 50 per cent. of the way there, although I suspect for different reasons.

Mr. Beith: The Committee said in a recommendation printed in heavy type that Britain should "join the Exchange Rate Mechanism of the EMS as soon as possible at a competitive exchange rate."

Mr. Porter: We are halfway there; 50 per cent. is not bad and I shall agree on that basis.

The Select Committee said that the policy of the Department of Trade and Industry of raising awareness of the single market has been timely and essential. It is important to avoid giving the impression that the single market in financial services will be complete or even approaching completion by 1 January 1993. That point has been made by the Chairman of the Select Committee and other hon. Members, but I repeat and emphasise it. No doubt 1993 has many attributes, but it will not happen in 1993.

I am sorry that the Government have been accused of complacency, although I must say that there has been an element of that. I am sorry, too, that the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam) went to the lengths of making a party attack on the Government, as our report was written on an all-party basis. Nevertheless, there was something in what the hon. Lady said and it deserves consideration by the Government. They may be well advised to apply the phrase that I heard in a seaside place last week—"Good enough, but not really good enough yet," or words to that effect.

Mr. Lilley: "Good, but not good enough."

Mr. Porter: That is it. Perhaps my right hon. Friend was listening more carefully than me because he had to.

We concluded that the single market will offer wider choice and potentially lower costs for consumers throughout the Community, but that such results may not be fully apparent by 1993. That is absolutely true. We should not pretend to the outside world that suddenly, on that day in 1993, all will be well; it will not.

I should like to emphasise a point to which hon. Members have already alluded: the slowness of the programme for achieving a single market in insurance seriously undermines the credibility of the single market programme in financial services generally. I know that, since the Committee reached that conclusion last year, a proposed directive has been tabled in relation to non-life insurance. That proposed directive, designed to widen a consumer market worth hundred of billions of ecu a year,

"seems certain to arouse fierce resistance in such countries as Belgium and West Germany."

That is a quotation from The Sunday Times, so it must be right.

It is all too true that fierce resistance will be aroused in such countries and even though the proposed directive has been tabled, it will not necessarily be implemented in the foreseeable future. The only country that would benefit if the proposals were implemented in the next year would be the United Kingdom. There is no doubt that Germany, Belgium and other countries will resist their implementation vigorously. I urge the Government to oppose that resistance and to win.

People have already talked about Frankfurt and Paris as potential competitors for the City of London. I do not take such talk all that seriously. I do not think that Paris will be in the same league, although Frankfurt could be. I still believe that the single market, as and when it arrives, will not be a problem but an enormous opportunity for the City of London. Its history, traditions and expertise will ensure that.

Hon. Members have referred to the question whether there should be a change in the regulatory structure created by the Financial Services Act 1986. I do not know; I receive contradictory comments and advice about it, although a particularly vigorous and authoritative source tells me that the structure is not working well from anyone's perspective and that it needs radical reform. Although the hon. Member for Redcar was asked about that matter, she did not come up with a suggestion, and I am not making a suggestion either: what I shall outline is a suggestion made by someone else.

The two-tier structure of the Securities and Investments Board and the self-regulatory organisations is redundant. The Financial Intermediaries, Managers and Brokers Regulatory Organisation, the Life Assurance and Unit Trust Regulatory Organisation and the Investment Management Regulatory Organisation should be abolished and their role subsumed entirely within the SIB. The Securities Association has a better case for survival. A centralised system would be more efficient, effective and consistent, and I am pleased to note that even the building societies are now calling for a common system of regulation for banks and building societies. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will address his considerable intellect to those suggestions. He might even find an answer to the question.

This is a complex problem, but the sooner we get on with it, the sooner we shall achieve a single market. At the moment, progress is too slow and we are being held back in various matters by those who wish to protect their national interest even though they may spout the rhetoric of the new Europe. I agree with the Government that we are the ones who get on with implementing directives. But let us not fool ourselves into thinking that those in the other capitals of Europe are as enthusiastic as they say they are in public. It is certainly not what they say in private.

Mr. Stan Crowther (Rotherham): It is a rare pleasure to find the Government accepting so many of the recommendations in a report of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry. They have accepted so many that I am beginning to wonder where we went wrong.

I support the view expressed by the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren) that the time allowed for the debate is too short. This is an extremely important subject and we all recognise the very important role in the economy that the financial services industry plays. Not all of us are quite convinced that the extent to which some people in the industry are rewarded is entirely justified. Ministers constantly complain about demands for what they regard as excessive pay increases in manufacturing. They would do well to take into account the fact that, according to The Daily Telegraph at least, salaries in the stock exchange rose on average by 49 per cent. last year. Perhaps Ministers would care to comment on that.

I propose to refer to one aspect of the report—the part that deals with takeovers and mergers. I express my unreserved support for the Committee's recommendations especially that dealing with the vulnerability of United Kingdom companies. However, I do not agree with the view held by some of my colleagues on the Committee, and certainly by the Government and the Commission, that takeovers and mergers are marvellous in principle and that all barriers should be removed as soon as possible. There has not been much evidence in recent years that bigger is necessarily better. One field in which the creation of bigger and bigger firms, many of them now conglomerates, is positively unhealthy is accountancy. A mere handful of very large firms now audit the accounts of the great majority of large companies throughout the western world. That cannot be a healthy state of affairs. It is a dangerous tendency and any further mergers among accountancy companies should be examined most carefully.

The fact that the firms have increased their size enormously in recent years by developing and expanding in management and tax consultancy activities must make the danger of a serious conflict of interest considerable —especially in view of the Law Lords' ruling not so long ago that auditors have no duty of care to individual shareholders or potential investors. Given that ruling, and given that an accountancy firm may be doing the auditing as well as offering management consultancy services, we are getting into dangerous waters.

It is high time that auditors were not merely allowed but legally required to report to the appropriate authorities anything suspicious that they find in the books of any company whose accounts they are auditing, even if they hope to do business with that company in another capacity —as management consultants or tax consultants, or in the provision of any other service that they may offer. If it were made a requirement to report to the appropriate authority anything that aroused the auditors' suspicions —a Community-wide and, it is to be hoped, a worldwide requirement—the public would be afforded some protection against what seems to me to be the relentless advance of international financial crime.

It is an interesting coincidence that two of the Select Committee's recent reports have a considerable bearing on the matter that we are discussing tonight. Not long ago, we examined in great depth the information technology industry and more recently we looked at the growing problem of company fraud. During our inquiry into the detection and prosecution of people who engage in various forms of financial crime, many of us became more and more alarmed at the apparent ease with which substantial frauds and thefts can be committed with a very good chance of being unpunished. The scale of that crime is literally immeasurable. No one knows how much of it goes on, but we took sufficient evidence to convince many of the Committee members that there is an alarming level of such crime.

One little indicator of the level of that crime is that the Serious Fraud Office is not interested in anything less than £1 million. That may be the Serious Fraud Office's definition of serious, but many of my constituents would regard a fraud involving one tenth of that sum as very serious. Perhaps that gives us a guide to the scale of the problem in the City today.

I share the concern expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam) that the Secretary of State appears to be in some danger of sinking into the same puddle of bland complacency from which his predecessor was quite unable to escape. No matter how many opportunities we gave him to escape that complacency, we could never persuade him to do so. I hope that the new Secretary of State will not take the same view.

I am not suggesting for a moment that financial crime is new. It has been going on for centuries. However, a new dimension has been added by the fantastic development of information technology. Billions of pounds can now be moved around the world at the drop of a hat or, more precisely, by pressing a button. That makes the matter far more serious. I get the impression that the agencies responsible for regulating the financial services and detecting crime are fighting a losing battle in trying to keep up with developments. There is clearly a need for much closer contact—and I believe constant contact—and co-operation among the various agencies throughout the world which are responsible for crime detection. In the Select Committee we received little evidence that that kind of co-operation is happening on the scale required.

Modern information technology is clearly as available to the forces of law and order as it is to the crime syndicates. However, the criminals seem to be winning at the moment. On the rare occasions when people are caught and hauled before the courts, if they are convicted the penalties tend to be derisory in this country, although perhaps not elsewhere. They are derisory here especially if the criminal concerned happens to make a contribution to a suitable charity.

Mr. Hoyle: Or political party.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): The Conservative party.

Mr. Crowther: I would hardly dare to mention the Conservative party in that connection.

If we ever have a single market in financial services—I do not know whether we shall and the Select Committee warned that it will not happen as quickly as some people think—I should certainly welcome it in principle. Properly regulated, properly monitored and properly policed, it could be advantageous to consumers whether they are investors or pension fund beneficiaries. A single market could be very beneficial if it is properly run and regulated. However, I am afraid that lowering the barriers will make it easier for criminally minded people to pursue their frauds on a much wider scale. There is a danger that we may be creating not so much a single market in financial services as a single market in financial crime. That point needs far more attention in future that it has had in the past.

Sir Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): Like other contributors to this debate, I propose to encapsulate my remarks in a short speech. I want to draw attention to two matters of concern: the unit trust movement, which I believe has not been referred to so far in this debate and secondly, and perhaps more importantly the effects of the capital adequacy directive on financial intermediaries.

I begin from the premise that, if 1992 is to provide opportunities for the United Kingdom in Europe, I suspect that it is common ground on both sides of the House that we should be seeking a level playing field between different types of investment in this country and also with regard to the differing tax regimes in relation to financial products in the United Kingdom and elsewhere. If such a level playing field can be created, I contend that the British financial services industry can compete.

[Sir Robert McCrindle]

At the moment, the tax regime for unit trusts operates very much against British companies. United Kingdom unit trusts are unique in paying corporation tax on their income. According to my information, no European fund suffers an equivalent tax. United Kingdom unit trusts should be allowed to distribute to European investors an amount equal to the tax credit to which United Kingdom resident investors are entitled, so as to place United Kingdom unit trusts on a more competitive footing.

If we achieve that level playing field, we can expect the industry to rise to the challenge. It would be ironic if we in the United Kingdom, the pioneers of the whole concept of unit trusts, were to be left behind as the single market approached, not because of some lack of efficiency on our part and not even because of an imposition by the European Commission but, dare I say to my hon. Friend the Minister, because of a tax regime dictated by the United Kingdom Treasury. If we could have the general support of the Minister when he replies for a movement towards that more level playing field, he and the Government would not be disappointed in the response from the unit trust industry in the United Kingdom.

I want now to consider the effect of the capital adequacy directive on small to medium financial intermediaries. Perhaps I should, not for the first time, declare an interest as an adviser to the British Insurance and Investment Brokers Association, many of whose members fall within the A2 category of membership of the Financial Intermediaries, Managers and Brokers Regulatory Organisation—that is, those who are broadly speaking not authorised to hold money but who may advise and effect financial arrangements.

Part of the problem stems from the lack of understanding by our European partners of the concept of independent financial intermediaries, and particularly of small independent financial intermediaries. The case was mentioned earlier of their failure to understand the importance of insurance brokers in this country, and the House will be aware that many insurance brokers are indeed small to medium financial advisers as well.

If that is the reason for the difficulty as the capital adequacy directive confronts us, and if continental insurance fails to grasp the fact that, in this country, one does not have to be a large, very well capitalised institution before one can perform a perfectly respectable service, I hope that our Ministers and officials, as they debate the capital adequacy directive, will draw to the attention of our opposite numbers the fact that they are comparing apples and oranges and asking as what type of apples we should prefer.

I would like to see the A2 category FIMBRA member included within the scope of the investment services directive and thus have the European passport to which reference has been made, but be exempted from an inappropriate level of capital under article 3 of the capital adequacy directive.

The Financial Services Act 1986, to which much reference has already been made—I served on the Standing Committee some years ago with my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson)—has received widespread criticism. Whatever the rights or wrongs of that criticism, there is no doubt that it has taken its toll on intermediaries in this country. Because of the difficulties of continuing their independent role, many of them have chosen to go on tied to insurance companies, just at a time when there is a great need for independent financial advice.

Perhaps I should make it clear that we must make sure that the EC directives which are threatening—I do not put it too strongly—the continued existence of those financial intermediaries which remain do not place additional and unnecessary burdens on the independent financial intermediary, just as I hope that EC directives will give an opportunity for fair competition among intermediaries within Europe.

Reference was made in passing to the disclosure of insurance commissions. In an ideal world, there is no defence against failure to disclose commissions. My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) and the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) failed to note that—to go back to the level playing field again—if it is expected that independent financial intermediaries, amidst all the other impositions of the Financial Services Act, are duty bound to disclose their commissions, so too in some shape or form should be those who are either part of the sales force of an insurance company or have become tied intermediaries.

Mr. Beith indicated assent.

Sir Robert McCrindle: I am glad to see the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed indicating assent. What is sauce for the goose must be sauce for the gander.

In his vendetta against the independent financial intermediary, as he comes back time and again to single them out because they do not declare their commissions in the way in which he would like, Sir Gordon Borrie has overlooked that fundamental point. One of the messages from this debate as we move towards the single market of 1992 is that the independent intermediary has already been substantially pilloried by the regime of the Financial Services Act. I do not say that as a reason to scrap the whole thing. It is too easy and too glib to say that, without thinking carefully of what we would put in its place.

I firmly believe that the financial intermediary must be seen as an extremely important part of the financial life of this country. Therefore, if an imposition is to be placed upon him, it should be no more and no less than the imposition that is placed on his competitors.

The EC's definition of liquid assets in relation to capital adequacy seems to be unduly restrictive. It will be difficult enough for some small operations to show capital required, and that is assuming that the United Kingdom gets its way in the discussions on the directive. It will be very difficult indeed if we go on with the restrictive definition of liquid assets. At the moment, it would be extremely difficult if some assets were not allowed to be classified as liquid.

The Minister is well aware of the important role that is played by unit trusts and independent financial advisers to which I have drawn the attention of the House once again. I ask him, in the negotiations that lie before us, to make sure that the EC of 1992 and beyond liberates our companies and gives us the incentive to benefit from the wider market. Whatever else it might be, it should not and must not be restrictive.

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): One of the unfortunate things about the debate is that a long time has elapsed since the Select Committee produced its original report, and events have moved on. Last Friday, we heard that the country was to join the exchange rate mechanism. That announcement made a substantial difference to many matters that were discussed in the Select Committee's report. Only now that we have entered—according to the Chancellor—a period of stable exchange rates with Germany and France will it be possible to test the Government's supposition that regulatory switching of financial services activity between lighter and heavier regulatory regimes will not take place. That matter is now sharply to be tested.

Similarly, now that we have joined the ERM, we shall see what the City of London is really made of. It will now be possible for investments to be safely carried out on a far larger scale, that is investments in the stock markets of Europe rather than in the stock markets of Britain. The competitive position of the City of London, which was of great concern to the Select Committee when it reported in 1989, is now under much harder scrutiny. We can be far less certain that the Government's optimistic conclusions, outlined in their response to the Select Committee's report, are soundly based.

We also had before us the fast-changing position with regard to the United States and Japan and their role in the City of London. The City of London's strength as a financial market has largely depended on being the vital intermediary between the capital of the United States and Japan and its performance and investment inside Europe. There is now good cause to doubt whether that feature of strength in the City of London will continue. We should closely examine that matter.

We can now also see far more clearly than we could when the Select Committee reported just what the Financial Services Act regulatory regime might bring. Many of the cases that gave us concern when the Select Committee was doing its investigation originated before the passing of the Financial Services Act. We can now see coming forward a whole raft of new cases that were born during the operation of the Financial Services Act regime and still give grounds for continuing concern.

Even as we speak, accountants from Coopers and Lybrand are scouring Europe and parts of the middle east to track down where £200 million of Polly Peck's money might be found. That is a serious matter. We hope that the money is found. However, such matters give grounds for real concern about whether the Government can afford to be complacent about the regulatory regimes that were laid in place at the time of the passing of the Financial Services Act 1986. It cannot be doubted, either, that many practitioners in the City are sceptical about whether the regulatory regime that was laid in place then is at all appropriate for the present situation.

Of course, the focus of the regulatory frameworks of the Financial Services Act regime are on regulatory procedures and authorisation procedures. We can see much more clearly now than we could either in 1989 when the Select Committee reported or in 1985 when the Act was being passed that that is perhaps not the correct point of emphasis. The correct point of emphasis should be the competence of the professional who is engaged in the business, the effective compliance procedures inside the firms that are conducting the business, and proper action against wrongdoing when it can be perceived.

The paper bunker of regulation into which the British financial services industry has been forced will not prove an adequate protection. It is not simply a matter of the scandals and the corruption that are occasionally revealed that is the worrying thing, but the normal routines, the concealment, doubt and uncertainty about what is really going on.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) rightly drew attention to the role of accountants. The financial press has today reported that the Chartered Institute of Management Accountants has now produced a report which is honest enough to admit what has been clear for some time—that one needs a health warning before one looks at company accounts. What one sees in those accounts may not represent all there is, and what one does see may not be there. This is a matter of great concern, and the Government would be unwise to be complacent about the fate of the basic routines of accountancy.

Doubts have been introduced about the quality of British accounts. As a result of the Companies Act 1989, an accountancy regime has been established. The heads of that regime are now admitting that there are profound problems concerning what one sees in company accounts, inflation accounting, the use of good will, the different definitions of mergers and acquisitions, and the way in which that may enable the manipulation of accounts as well as about other things that can be manipulated so that they do not appear on the balance sheet at all. Given that the heads of the accountancy profession have admitted to those problems, the Government cannot simply stick by their response to the Select Committee report, especially as it was produced in another era.

My hon. Friend the Member for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam) was right to say that the problems we have outlined are not the private concern of a club—we can no longer see the City of London as a club in which rules of behaviour are internal to the system rather than subject to public regulation. Such regulation may well require statutory agencies to enforce high standards. My hon. Friend also made a sound point about the creation of small shareholders, but of even greater importance is the fact that we have already socialised the ownership of industry and our services through the insurance industry and occupational pension funds.

Common ownership has been achieved, but the consequences that flow from that, and the extra requirements they make upon the regulatory systems and standards of conduct of those who operate on behalf of those common owners, have not been perceived. The Government must address that. I doubt whether a framework more appropriate to the Sock Shop capitalism of the 1980s is one that we should allow to endure.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): Financial services represent one of the great successes of the United Kingdom economy. The London stock exchange is pre-eminent in Europe, with a market capitalisation of $500 billion compared with $160 billion in Germany and $100 billion in France and Italy. London's pre-eminence is even more noted regarding foreign exchange. The daily turnover of foreign exchange in London is $90 billion, compared with $50 billion in Tokyo and New York. Our financial services are a great success and, in terms of banking, we are part of a truly international market in which we are predominant.

The circumstances surrounding insurance are somewhat different. The OECD countries hold some 94 per cent. of the $500 billion a year premiums in the world; the United States has some 45 per cent. of that market, Japan 14 per cent. and the European Community countries 30 per cent. The 30 per cent. held by EC countries is fragmented. The largest market is in Germany, where there is close protectionism, the third largest is that of France where there is a great deal of state ownership, but the second largest market is that of the United Kingdom, the most open. It is therefore important to approach banking and insurance in different ways.

In banking there is a lot to play for. The Cecchini report suggested that there are £15 billion of benefits to be gained on a one-off basis from joining together the European financial markets. That is equivalent to about 22 billion ecu as we must learn, I suppose, to say.

On a personal level, it is important to realise how much there is to gain from harmonising the European markets. If someone undertook a round trip of the European capitals and changed his spending money in each of those capitals he would return having lost more than half of his spending money as a result of dealing charges and losses on the official exchange rate. There is a great deal to play for, but we must remember that there are some risks and losses.

Reference has been made to the Financial Services Act 1986, which is not only a tight regulation of the financial institutions of the United Kingdom, but an expensive one. There is a risk that less well-regulated banks operating here might be able to operate with less expense and therefore be more competitive than our own institutions. It is important that we agree host nation monitoring—essential minimum harmonisation. Should it be necessary for the United Kingdom to change its regulations to ensure that our financial institutions are not at a disadvantage compared with other European countries, I hope that the Minister will bear in mind the risks and take steps to make the necessary modifications.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: What about the consumer? As it is now, years have gone by without any increase in the compensation limits despite nearly 30 per cent. inflation. Is my hon. Friend suggesting that, with that miserable record of compensation we should lower our level still further if continental countries do so?

Mr. Viggers: My hon Friend is referring to insurance rather than banking and I shall refer to that shortly.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will also bear it in mind that it is important that EC developments are consistent with operations in non-EC countries. That is particularly important for the United Kingdom, which has much insurance business outside the EC. Perhaps I should declare an interest as a member of Lloyd's although I cannot see that it is relevant, but that might save some Opposition Member from asking whether I have declared that interest.

Mr. Hoyle: Speak up.

Mr. Viggers: I beg the House's pardon, but I am gabbling to save time.

We are concerned that the changes in the EC should not be to the detriment of United Kingdom institutions operating outside the Community. An undercapitalised Portuguese bank that sought to open in the United States might find that it was unable to do so because of United States regulations. If there was full, obligatory reciprocity of recognition within the EC, it might follow that a United States bank seeking to open in the United Kingdom could be barred from doing so because of those reciprocity rules. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will bear that important point in mind, as it is of concern to the financial institutions.

There is also concern as a result of the investment services directive. Banks operating in the EC should not only be able to join EC stock exchanges and operate as investment advisers and operators within those exchanges, but they should not be barred from operating as investment advisers and from the execution of investment matters on behalf of clients outside those stock exchanges. In some parts of the EC, it is felt that banks should not be able to join stock exchanges, but in other parts of the Community it is felt that they should operate only within those stock exchanges.

So far we have heard little about shareholders. I am proud to say that the Government have doubled and redoubled the number of individual shareholders in the United Kingdom. The fact remains that the percentage of shares held in the stock exchange by private shareholders has fallen from 60 per cent. in 1960 to only 20 per cent. now.

I for one feel a great sense of disappointment that the number of individual shareholders continues to fall. There are several reasons for that—one is the cost of dealing for individual shareholders. I am concerned about what individual shareholders who have been encouraged by the Government to become shareholders for the first time will do when they try to calculate how much it will cost them to sell their shares and what the implications might be in terms of dealing cost and the inconvenience of having to declare for tax purposes any profit that they make.

I am also concerned that some companies have felt it necessary to set up their own systems to enable their shareholders to sell and buy shares. I believe that Cable and Wireless, British Gas and Reed have done that. That is not a helpful way ahead.

The insurance industry is riddled with complexity and vested interest. There are various standards in different European countries, including in the preparation of accounts and reserves, the handling of claims and legal procedures. There are many vested interests, in some cases assisted by Government. The French Government have a vested interest in the state insurance company's operations in France. The Italian Government require 30 per cent. of insurance premiums to be ceded to the state company, INA. Switzerland, although not in the European Community, provides a monopoly for fire insurance in each canton.

I welcomed Sir Leon Brittan's suggestion in November 1989 that there should be a single passport or licence—home country authorisation. Ideally, we should have harmonisation, but that would be exceptionally difficult. Therefore, the best route seems to be the creation of minimum standards throughout the European Community. Meanwhile, some companies are taking the second best route of cross-border purchases, mergers and acquisitions. That is the second best route because it requires the companies to operate in accordance with the laws of the country in which they made their acquisition. However, it is only the second best route and I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to press ahead as fast as he can with an effective single market as the long-term objective.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): I am pleased to join in this debate, not only as a member of the Select Committee but as president of the Manufacturing, Science and Finance union, a large number of whose members work in financial services. I have been interested in the debate and one point that struck me is that, despite the reassurances given to the Secretary of State—I am sorry that he is not here—by the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren) that the Secretary of State's future was secure, I thought his was a pedestrian and lacklustre speech. When the Secretary of State goes to bed at night and has nightmares about all his predecessors, he may also find himself the victim of short-termism, as the Government call it.

The hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) was right to emphasise the importance of the industry of which we are talking and which makes up 10 per cent. of the gross national product. In 1987, the industry gave a surplus on invisibles of £7·658 billion, which is considerable. I stress that we must not be complacent, because all the signs, including our earlier debate on ERM, point to the fact that Germany—the Bundesbank—is dominating the financial position in the European Community. That is why we must not be complacent or think that what is happening in the City of London, Edinburgh and the regions will be with us for ever. We must wake up to the fact that there will be increased competition and that Germany is growing in importance. If we do not, one day, probably not in the immediate future but certainly early in the next century, we shall wake up to find that, far from the City of London being in the premier exchange position, it will be Frankfurt.

As president of Manufacturing, Science and Finance, I am concerned about what will happen, particularly in the insurance industry. There is no doubt that we can provide life insurance at a third of the price of our European competitors. As has been repeatedly said today, the problem is that we are subject to takeovers in this country in a way that the Germans, French and Italians are not. It is easier to take over the Vatican than an Italian insurance company, which is almost impossible to do.

Takeovers occur all the time in this country because our companies are far more vulnerable than those in other countries. The German Allianz has taken over Cornhill, Signa (American) has taken over Crusader, and the French Axi-Midi has taken over Equity and Law. Another interesting example is that the French state-owned insurance company, UAP, owns 18 per cent. of Sun Life, which has an arrangement with Liberty Life by which they can bid for each other's shares. It will not be too long before Sun Life is taken over by a French state-owned company. I do not know how the Government will react to that.

We must ensure that the financial industry, which matters to us, has a prosperous future. I do not speak from the point of view of the investors in the industry or those who deal in shares in the City of London, but from that of the employees in the industry. We must ensure—because they built up the companies—that those employees have a future. In any of our dealings, we must ensure that we protect their interests.

The Minister was cavalier in jumping up and asking our Front-Bench spokesperson, my hon. Friend the Member for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam) what she would do about the self-regulating bodies. The answer has come from Conservative Members. I do not think that one Conservative Member has stood up to defend such organisations, which are far too bureaucratic and costly, and of which there are too many. There should be rationalisation. I do not think I am alone in the House in believing that the era of self-regulation must come to an end. There must be statutory regulation, with far fewer organisations that are more efficient and less costly.

I hope that the Minister will bear in mind the fact that we should not bear an unnecessary burden when competing against other countries in the European market. I hope that he will also agree that, with our great insurance base, we in this country cannot allow other companies to operate from behind the barriers, which must come down. I hope that he will be fighting our corner to ensure that we maintain not only a great industry, but London as the financial centre. I warn the Minister that time is short.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Yes, time is short—we have three minutes, to be precise—so I shall immediately declare an interest in Bowring (UK) Ltd and Barclays bank, both of which are affected by financial services legislation.

I agree with the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) that there is a need for change in the regulatory system. I favour abolishing the two-tier system, but I cannot develop that argument, because I want to talk about insurance, a matter that has dominated the debate.

Our insurance is the best; it is the most skilled and best regulated in the world. When I was at the Department of Trade and Industry, I believe in the same position as my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs, there was the Vehicle and General insurance scandal, when everyone woke up and decided that it was important to regulate insurance. Now, we probably have one of the best regulated industries there is, particularly after the Lloyd's Act 1982, which I took through the House. That made our industry well respected, but also the subject of considerable envy. It creates £3 billion net earnings and provides 340,000 jobs. The restrictions in the EC have inhibited development and deprived the consumer of a better service.

If we are looking to the single market for the opportunity to break down barriers, we must accept that progress has been slow. On a visit to Brussels, the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) tackled the issues vigorously, but I felt that—apart from Sir Leon Brittan—officials did not have the required sense of urgency.

The latest proposals published for non-life insurance are designed to widen consumer choice and cut premiums; however, it seems likely that there will be all sorts of objections from Germany and Belgium. I hope that the Minister will carefully study the suggestion that the Germans—because they do not understand anything about broking—must pass a great deal of legislation and will use it as a spurious reason for delaying what is a most important reform.

Competition is the name of the game: it is immensely important, and is the main thrust of our policy. However, open competition must be accompanied by good conduct. Here, to some extent, I agree with the hon. Member for Rotherham, although not in party political terms. The overwhelming majority of people working in the City are of the highest integrity—I spent some 20 years of my working life there—but in recent years the square mile has become infested with a small minority of newcomers who —as I have said in the House before—are long on cunning but short on morals.

The old saying in the City was that a man's word was his bond; as I have also said, if a man says that nowadays, one tends to take his bond. Some of the loot from dishonest activities there makes the great train robbery seem like minor pickpocketing. The Lloyd's Act 1982 prevented further incidents like the Peter Cameron-Webb scandal, which did immense harm to Britain's insurance reputation, especially in the United States.

This Government have done probably more than any other to crack down, through legislation, on insurance and company scandals. I give them credit for that. But we must not be just the most efficient providers of financial services in Europe; I want us to be regarded as the most honest and the most honourable.

Ms. Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): This has been an interesting debate. I share the view expressed by many hon. Members on both sides of the House that it is a shame that we have had so little time to deal with the issue, especially given the comprehensive nature of the report of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry.

Not surprisingly, a major thread of the debate has been the concern expressed by hon. Members—again, on both sides of the House—about the unevenness of the playing field likely to be created in the single market in financial services. The Government's assurances at the beginning of the debate struck me as inadequate; I do not believe that they will tackle the problem.

An example is the Government's response to recommendation 7 of the report:

> "We recommend that the Government should address itself to the vulnerability of United Kingdom financial institutions to hostile takeover by a company from elsewhere in the Community."

Their response was:

> "The Government believe that we should press for the removal of barriers rather than erect new ones of our own."

That, surely, is not an adequate response to the problem of the bid-proof nature of many companies in other European countries.

When opening the debate for the Opposition, my hon. Friend the Member for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam) rightly said that the Government were being complacent. I think that they are also being naive if they feel that other countries will automatically accept their view of what the rules of the game should be. It has been interesting to listen to some of today's contributions, especially from Conservative Members. It is clear that many of them agreed with us that the Government were being both complacent and naive.

An example—not related to financial services, but none the less important in the European Community—is state aid. The Government have frequently criticised the level of state aid given by other countries, but recent figures show that other countries have given high and consistent levels of state aid during recent years. All the Government's preaching on that subject has been to no effect. It is not good enough to say that we hope and expect everyone else somehow, magically, to follow our example.

Today—in submissions to me and, no doubt, other hon. Members—the Association of British Insurers said that it was worried about the possible unevenness of the playing field in taxation matters. While I agree that a totally harmonised taxation system is not needed to make the single European market work, the Government must nevertheless be vigilant about the big differences in taxation that may undermine whatever other directives are agreed. Clearly many hon. Members share our concern: I noted particularly the speeches of the hon. Members for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) and for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren), who seemed to express concerns that are dear to our own hearts.

My hon. Friend the Member for Redcar rightly laid stress on consumer protection, and I am glad that her view was reinforced by the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop). I should like the Minister to tell us what consultations have taken place with consumer organisations in the United Kingdom.

In response to the report by the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, the Government said that they accepted the recommendations on consumer involvement. Perhaps they can tell us what organisations they will be meeting and what will be the time scale involved, if we are to ensure that when the single market in financial services is created there will also be proper standards for consumer protection. To date, the signs are that the proper standards will not be in place, and—not surprisingly—many hon. Members have expressed concern about that. It is important that there should be information on redress, and proper levels of compensation below which European Community states should not go.

The consumer-protection budget in the European Community is tiny. I am disappointed that the European Council allocated such a small amount in the budget for 1991: 0·018 per cent. of the total budget, which compares very badly with the amount available for the support of tobacco production, for example. There needs to be a change of priorities—not just by our own Government, but by other Governments examining the European Community consumer budget. I accept, of course, that it is not just money in the budget that will solve the problem; directives, too, will benefit the consumer at the end of the day.

Not surprisingly, the insurance sector has exercised the minds of many contributors to the debate. It is of particular importance, because the United Kingdom insurance sector has a great interest in the opening up of the market in financial services. It is also true—unfortunately—that there has been a worrying decline in our invisible export earnings in recent months, and the share of that decline accounted for by the insurance sector is considerable. All is not well, and the Government should address that point.

Several reasons given by hon. Members tonight show that it will be a long, slow haul to achieve a common market in insurance. We need greater vigilance than seems to have been exercised up to now. For those reasons, I was surprised at the statement by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who said that the European market in financial services was almost complete; if he reads the recent publication by the Department of Trade and Industry he will note the number of directives that are still outstanding, and will mean thorny and difficult negotiations in the European Community in the coming months.

The problems of the Export Credits Guarantee Department are also mentioned in the report. They have not had a great deal of attention during the debate—although, if the Government go ahead with their threat to privatise part of it, no doubt that will be the subject of controversial legislation later on. So far, in the internal market, there is no pressure to privatise the ECGD; the Government seem to be doing so as a result of their own dogma rather than any other imperatives.

It appears that the French state export agency is to be allowed to underwrite risks for foreign exporters: if a French export agency can do that, why cannot our own state export agency? There is no doubt that exporters in Britain are worried about the proposals for the ECGD, as a recent article in this week's Financial Times makes clear.

Some worries have rightly been expressed about the regional implications of the creation of a single market in financial services. My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) referred in an intervention to worries in Scotland, for instance. The Government must give far greater priority to this. There is evidence that the European Commission is studying it, and the Government should too.

Not surprisingly, the Select Committee's report gives considerable space to the problems of transport infrastructure in Britain which affect both the financial centre in London and the other centres outside it. I do not know whether the Minister has seen the recent edition of Lloyd's Log, entitled, "Jams today. . .The threat to the City's financial future". After 11 years of neglect of our transport infrastructure the Government are now trying to catch up and deal with a problem which is largely of their own creation.

The Government have presided over a massive decline in our balance of payments. It is alarming not only that the manufacturing deficit is so great but that the surplus on the service side and on so-called invisibles has deteriorated sharply. While we believe that the single European market will be immensely important to the future of our financial services industry, we do not believe that the Government are doing enough to deal with the problems. It would be good to think that the Secretary of State, new as he is to his job, would take a fresh look at the issues affecting his Department. Unfortunately, it looks as if he is already weighed down with the dogma and short-termist attitudes of his predecessors—attitudes which have disadvantaged both our manufacturing and our service sectors.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs (Mr. John Redwood): The hon. Member for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam) and several other Opposition Members seemed to think that cases of malpractice being unearthed or of criminals being brought to book implied that something was wrong with the system. It is the first time that I have heard the theory that, if the police are successful on detecting crime, that means that they are not doing a good job. Such cases show that we have put in a tougher regulatory framework and that we are pursuing wrongdoers as we should. If only the Labour party had done that before, we should not have had our work cut out to put through the legislation that we have.

The hon. Member for Redcar also said that the Government were making no effort to improve regulatory co-operation with overseas bodies. I have just returned from Washington, where I was pleased to sign with our Japanese and American counterparts the Airlie House declaration. We recognise that financial business is driven by technology and business pressures towards global trading. It is becoming ever more important, therefore, to hammer out common accounting, capital adequacy and other prudential standards on a worldwide basis. The agreement that we have signed is a major advance in that direction.

The document recognises the growing volume of cross-border business in financial markets around the world, and pledges the three major market authorities in London, New York and Tokyo to work more closely together to facilitate further growth in that business.

The agreement enshrines two important principles. The first is mutual recognition backed up by some common standards. When each country is thinking of changing its rules or systems, it will consult the other two to see whether changes can bring practices more into line. The second is co-operation to assist each other in tracking down malpractice and crime. The United Kingdom is well advanced in widening its memorandum of understanding with the United States to exchange information and to carry out investigations on behalf of each other. About one case a week now causes that co-operation to be undertaken.

There will also be close co-operation to monitor the prudential position of major multinational firms. The Government will do everything in their power to ensure that the international regulators talk to one another and track down criminal activity even when it tries to run across borders in search of safety.

The hon. Member for Redcar seemed unaware of the many new dealing services for small shareholders which are now growing up. The Government welcome them and agree with comments made in the House that there should be easy access to good dealing facilities for all who have shareholdings, however modest they may be. Progress is being made in that respect.

The hon. Lady and her colleagues also seemed unclear about what structure of regulation they want. She tells the House that she agrees with the Government that the present system should be given time to settle down—we believe that strongly. More change would mean more disruption, more cost and more elaborate structures. However, the hon. Lady goes on to say that she wants to change the system in a fundamental way but is not prepared to tell the House exactly how. We await her reconsideration of a new structure, when she will have to demonstrate why it would be cheaper and better. Given the way in which institutional changes by the Labour party have gone when it has been in government, it would be surprising if the system turned out cheaper and better as a result of the changes that Labour suggested.

The hon. Lady concluded by saying that, under a Conservative Government, the City would need a boundary review. I agree. I think that the boundaries of the wider City will grow ever wider because of the success of the industry, which has grown in ways that many of my hon. Friends have pointed out in the debate. I look forward to positive and confident 1990s for the City under this Government's tutelage, because we shall work closely with the City to ensure that its businesses can expand and take advantage of all the directives and opportunities that the single market will undoubtedly produce.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren) raised the issue of the number of regulators. I must tell him that we need the current exchanges; they are important bodies and they have a range of functions that facilitate choice and competition. But if self-regulatory organisations wish to merge because they think it in their members' interests to do so—it may, for example, lower the costs or improve the quality of regulation—the Government are delighted. The Government will not insist on it, however, because they recognise the divergent interests and concerns of the different members of the different self-regulatory organisations. These things will work only if done on a voluntary basis.

Many hon. Members should concentrate on the fact that it is not so much the institutional framework as the style of regulation that matters when examining the trade-off between its costs and its benefits. The Government believe that we are coming to the end of a period when a lot of effort had to go into rule-making and institutional change. We are working closely with the Securities and Investments Board, David Walker and others so that, in the new phase, we can concentrate less on prescription and detailed rule-making and more on investigation, compliance and detection, because that is what is needed.

It does not help matters if the regulators are continually thinking of yet new ways to tie up in knots the existing compliant businesses—the broad mass of businesses in the City that are doing a good job. The regulators are and will be judged by their success in tracking down the tiny minority who are guilty of business malpractice or criminal deeds. We are putting our efforts into tracking those people, and we are urging the regulators to do the same——

Ms. Mowlam: Oh yes?

Mr. Redwood: Yes, the Government have put a great many resources into detection and investigation—by setting up the Serious Fraud Office and ensuring that it can pursue the cases that come to light thanks to the tougher climate created as a result of our work.

I promise the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) that if he can bring forward evidence of malpractice in any particular deal we, or more importantly the stock exchange authorities whose job it is to do so, will look at it. If the hon. Gentleman knows anything about insider dealing or other criminal practices, he should refer the evidence to the proper authorities and not cast aspersions in the House unless he can back them up with evidence that the authorities will look at.

Several hon. Members asked about the timing of the directives and whether we can bring the whole single market in financial services together ready for 1 January 1993. The Government intend to do all that they can to see that the negotiations are concluded. The banking directives have been agreed; the investment services directive and the capital adequacy directive could be agreed within the next few months.

One of the important purposes of the debate is to give us guidance on the details that need to be put right, particularly to help independent financial advisers, and to help some larger businesses with matters such as liquid assets. We have listened carefully to what has been said and we shall of course carry these issues forward in our negotiations. If we can get the right deal by the end of the year, we shall sign up to it; if it takes a little longer, so be it, because it is important that our independent financial advisers and our major players in the stock market should have access on the right terms, under which capital requirements are related entirely to the risks being run and they are not burdened with unnecessary capital requirements when they are not carrying undue risk.

I agree with many hon. Members including my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) that on the insurance side, matters are proceeding too slowly. There are doubts about whether the whole of the insurance regime can be up and running by 1 January 1993. However, failure to reach that target will not be for lack of trying by the Government—we are urging our partners to work with us towards a speedy resolution of all outstanding issues on the passport directives. As a result of our efforts, one directive has been tabled and we shall get it to a working party for extensive negotiation.

It is also largely because of our requests that the Commission has promised to bring the other directive for First Reading in the Council of Ministers before the end of the year. The Government will put their full weight behind reaching a fair settlement in this area. As many hon. Members have said, there cannot be a completely open market in financial products if insurance is stymied for lack of the legislative action that we all seek. The hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther)——

It being Seven o'clock, and there being private business set down by THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS, under Standing Order No. 16 (Time for taking private business), further proceeding stood postponed.

Redbridge London Borough Council Bill

(By Order)

Order read for consideration of Lords amendment.

Lords amendment: In page 4, lines 9 to 17, leave out clause 6.

7.1 pm

Mr. Vivian Bendall (Ilford, North): I beg to move, That the amendment be now considered.

Hon. Members may wonder why I rise to speak to the Bill. It is because my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) is with an IPU delegation in Uruguay. He sends his apologies for not being able to be here. I shall say nothing more about the Bill because it has been debated in both Houses and in Committee.

Mr. Michael Neubert (Romford): I am pleased to have this early opportunity to speak, on our first day back after the long summer recess. It is seven and a half years since I spoke from the Back Benches; for a great deal of that time I was a Government Whip and was therefore not able to speak in the Chamber at all, other than to move procedural motions. To my surprise and disappointment, I found that such motions are not the stuff of tomorrow's headlines. After my being consigned to silence for so long, I know that my constituents will be reassured to hear me more often in future and to know that I am alive and well and working on their behalf at Westminster.

When I was at the Ministry of Defence I had the occasional opportunity to speak and to appear on the parliamentary peep show and, through the merciless medium of television, I sometimes appeared in every living room in the land. However, on private business the same Trappist vow of silence descends on Ministers, leaving them inert and mute, even though the business may affect one's own constituents. The disability is that much greater when the title of the Bill does not immediately reveal the reasons for one's presence. Colleagues who saw me sitting silently during earlier debates on the Bill may have assumed that I was overcome by momentary tiredness or that during the long hot summer I was taking advantage of the air conditioning in the Chamber, seeing no connection between me and the Redbridge Bill.

Hon. Members who have taken part in the debates know that the Bill should be called the Romford (Extinguishment of Centuries-old Exclusive Royal Market Franchise) Bill. If that were its title, my interest in it and opposition to it would be apparent to everyone. I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne), the promoter of the Bill, is not here, but I am glad that he was able to persuade his next-door colleague, my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North (Mr. Bendall) to speak on his behalf. We regret his absence, but understand that South American affairs have called him away from the Chamber. Even at this late stage in proceedings on the Bill I am glad to have this opportunity to speak, even if only in relation to clause 6.

I express my warm gratitude to my fellow Members for the London borough of Havering—my hon. Friends the Members for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) and for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor). They ably sustained the heat and burden of battle on many occasions without any direct assistance from the Member for Romford in whose constituency the charter market stands. I felt as guilty as any first world war general, quaffing claret in comfort behind the lines while sending other officers to face the flak at the front.

I am indebted to my Havering colleagues for all that they have done on behalf of my constituents, and theirs, while I sat through the proceedings unable to contribute to the debate. My hon. Friends have distinguished themselves by what they have achieved, because the Bill is now very different from the one that was introduced to the House about two years ago.

We are considering yet another amendment, this time from the Lords. No doubt it responds to the strength of the arguments deployed at an earlier stage and not simply to arguments deployed in the other House alone. My hon. Friends' efforts deserved a wider audience, but it is in the nature of things that there has been limited participation in the debate and, not surprisingly, at times the debate degenerated into a dispute between neighbours, the Members for Redbridge on one side and the three Havering Members on the other. As we all know from our surgeries, disputes between neighbours are sometimes the most intractable issues with which we have to deal.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): My hon. Friend has mentioned several hon. Members. I hope that he will not overlook the noble contribution by our hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe), whose sterling speech highlighted some of the problems with clause 6. No doubt in due course we shall come to those and it would be unfair not to recognise that contribution.

Mr. Neubert: I am glad to record my gratitude to my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe), who, on a memorable evening, contributed to a discussion on clause 6, which comes before us now as a result of the Lords amendment. I am sure that she wishes us well in our opposition to the Bill, because she is one of many hon. Members who have charter markets in their constituencies and who will see them threatened by the Bill.

The original Bill contained just two pages and its substance was contained in only one. It included clause 6 about the transfer of rights, but did not have the last two lines that are now contained in the clause:

"provided that no such transfer or disposal or rights shall take effect without the consent in writing of the council."

After amendment, the Bill now covers the best part of four pages. The major additions to its length are the revised proposals for compensation.

The concern that this question aroused in the Chamber and in Committee underlines the seriousness of the main purpose of the measure, which is to remove an advantage conferred on Romford by royal charter by Henry III in 1247. That royal charter predates our Parliament and it has been a major factor in the prosperity of Romford and the London borough of which it has been part for the past 25 years. It is ironic that, after seven and a half years, I should find myself speaking for the first time in defence of a royal franchise, which has benefited the people of Romford for seven and a half centuries.

I am not a Conservative for nothing; I wish to conserve the best of our traditions and institutions until persuaded that there are good reasons for not doing so. The Bill does not constitute such a reason. The rights to which clause 6 refers are not related to the right to hold an open-air market in the borough of Redbridge. Redbridge is an extensive and highly desirable area of north-east London and is represented in the House by three assiduous and active Members. It is unacceptable for it not to be also adorned by a lively open-air market where customers can enjoy the cut and thrust of the stallholders' repartee while looking for a bargain among the cauliflowers and cucumbers.

It would indeed be unneighbourly of the next-door London borough of Havering to object to and place an obstacle in the way of such a market anywhere in Redbridge. That is not the case. Many residents of Redbridge widen their consumer choice by patronising the market at Romford, which has a long-standing and deserved reputation for good prices and value for money.

The Bill would establish a new market in Ilford, within the six and two thirds miles radius of Romford market, which, for no fewer than 743 years, has been the subject of an exclusive royal franchise. Some have suggested that the whole concept of a charter market with a radius of six and two thirds miles is unbelievably archaic—a description given by an eminent legal luminary. However, it does not lack all sense or relevance to today's trading conditions.

The distance was decided on the basis that that was as far as a man could drive his cattle and back again in a day, allowing sufficient time in between for him to conduct his business and pursue his livelihood. Allowing markets within shorter distances of each other would have undermined the viability of the markets and the individual livelihoods of their traders because it would have diluted the spending power of those attending them. There are no longer any cattle at Romford market, and the straight high road from London, which used to pass through the market, has been bypassed with a ring road. The market is now a pedestrian precinct where shoppers can walk without risk, other than that of occasionally slipping on a cabbage stalk or, for politicians, a banana skin.

The old style of the market is not really that long in the past. I first visited Romford when I was a small boy. My grandmother took me there on the top of a bus, and the market still had cattle and other livestock. Romford was still part of the rural county of Essex; now it is part of metropolitan London, having been swallowed by the metropolis 25 years ago. Cattle were last sold at the market in 1959, only slightly more than 30 years ago, so it is not as archaic as might be thought.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): The location of the proposed market was an important point of debate on Third Reading. Labour Members were concerned that there was no plan identifying its proposed site. Some of us were under the impression that the market would be part of a larger commercial development in the area, rather than a market in the general terms that most of us understand. That matter caused a great deal of concern, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will comment on it.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): I regret that I cannot allow the hon. Member for Romford (Mr. Neubert) to answer that point. As he said at the beginning of his remarks, we are debating a narrow procedural motion, and we must deal with the matter before us.

Mr. Neubert: I hear your guiding words, Madam Deputy Speaker, and, as ever, will seek to observe them. Of course, we are discussing not simply whether we should consider clause 6, but presumably——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We are considering whether we should debate the Lords amendment. It is a narrow procedural motion.

Mr. Neubert: For the reasons that I have already given, I shall seek to argue that we should defer consideration for six months. That will require a certain amount of attention to the wider case, not simply clause 6.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That would require a great deal of ingenuity, but I know that the hon. Gentleman has that. I shall be as tolerant as possible.

7.15 pm

Mr. Neubert: I am indebted to you, Madam Deputy Speaker. I cannot respond to the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien), but I was present during all the previous proceedings, and I recall the occasion that he mentioned.

The rights enshrined in clause 6 relate to the establishment of a market in Ilford, which is in a part of Redbridge that comes within six and two thirds miles of Romford market, a distance thought to be archaic. However, under clause 6, Redbridge council wants not only to establish such a right against the long-standing claim of common law that ensures a safeguard for Romford market, but to transfer that right to others.

It might have been helpful if my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North had explained the background to the Lords amendment. It is not clear to me, or to the advisers from the London borough of Havering, why we are even considering it. We can only speculate, as I intend to do during my speech. The clause states:

"any person entitled or authorised by virtue of this Act to hold a market may transfer or dispose of all or part of his rights to another."

We need to examine not only the justification for whether we should tonight debate clause 6, but whether the privilege obtained by private Acts of Parliament should be for the benefit of others, and whether that is the right way to proceed.

It is a matter of some pain to me that the Bill has proceeded this far only through the support of Conservative colleagues. Members of Parliament have many calls upon their time and it is understandable that they may not always be as familiar as the sponsors with the issues involved in a private Bill. One reason for deferring consideration of clause 6 for another six months is to enable more hon. Members to attend the debate than the relatively few who are here tonight.

I have already mentioned the confusion caused by the title of the Bill, in which the removal of a franchise—a negative outcome—is revealed only upon closer examination. It suggests the positive purpose of establishing a new market. Nothing is more likely to enthuse a modern Conservative than the mention of the word "market", but "franchise" is an equally respectable commercial concept and, in effect, the royal charter granted to Havering all those hundreds of years ago is just that.

What sort of market are we dealing with? Its rights are to be transferred to others under clause 6. It is not just a single site, but part of a wider market economy. The relatively few colleagues who have voted for the Bill to date may think that the rights to which the clause refers extend the free market and increase fair competition, but do they realise that they are conferring rights on the new market similar to those that Romford has enjoyed for so many years? That is hardly progress. If we were to move on to considering the clause, and if we rejected the Lords amendment, as I understand it, that protection could be transferred to a third party—not the local authority or some other representative of public interest, but to anyone who might take over the ownership perhaps, or certainly the operation, of the market. Of course, I read the clause as a layman and without any advice from the promoters.

It is likely and, again, understandable that some of my colleagues may have assumed that because the London borough of Redbridge has repeatedly had the good sense to elect a Conservative majority to its council, any private Bill promoted in its name must, by definition, be a good thing that deserves support without question. I have been a leader of a London borough council—before coming to Westminster, I was mayor of Bromley. I have a high regard for the benefits of Tory local council administration.

However, I would not suggest that on every occasion, and on every issue, a Tory town hall administration is necessarily infallible. Perhaps I may derive some support for at least that assertion from Opposition Members. I hope that the fact that the Bill has been vigorously opposed by other Conservative Members—12 heroes voted against it on Second Reading—will be enough to raise doubts in the minds of other of my right hon. and hon. Friends about the advisability of accepting too readily the Bill's virtues and granting the powers and privileges that it seeks to establish.

Some of those privileges to be found in clause 6 would be capable of being transferred to another party. Although the Bill has received some support in this House, it has never received the support of the full Redbridge council. Before considering whether we should debate the Bill further, there are questions to be raised about the aspect. Opposition to the Bill by Havering council has been not only overwhelming but all-party.

Mr. Squire: My hon. Friend mentioned that 12 of our right hon. and hon. Friends opposed the measure. No doubt he will mention also the germane point that no fewer than 30 colleagues supported an amendment to delete a little piece of clause 6. When one considers that about 100 right hon. and hon. Members were present for that debate, it is obvious that there is scope for a larger number of them to examine clause 6 in its entirety.

Mr. Neubert: I am indebted to my hon. Friend for his intervention. The question whether we should give the Bill further consideration without interruption relates to my point concerning the support that the Bill received before it was promoted. My advice is that, for such a Bill to be promoted in Parliament, it must receive a minimum level of support from the local authority in question, as expressed by a vote in council for the Bill to proceed. My information is that that level of support was exceeded in Redbridge council by only one vote.

Local elections were held in May. It would be interesting to know whether that narrow margin of necessary support for the Bill survived the changes of councillors that occurred in those elections. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North can say whether the council has been consulted about the promotion of the Bill since the May elections. One also wonders whether the council has been consulted about the Lords amendment and the attitude that should be adopted towards it. We have received no advice from the promoters on whether the Bill still has the council's support. We should know the answer to those questions before we consider the deletion or otherwise of clause 6.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. In view of the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Mr. Neubert), perhaps we should seek the guidance of the Chair on whether it would be right to proceed with the Bill if it no longer has the majority support of Redbridge council.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is a matter for debate, and there is no reason why the debate should not continue.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. My understanding is that, if we pass the Bill today, there is no further step the House can take to stop or reverse its progress. If it would be unlawful in procedural terms for the Bill to be promoted without its having the majority support of Redbridge council, surely we should not proceed with it tonight.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House must decide, at the end of this debate, whether or not to proceed with the Bill.

Mr. Neubert: If that is so, perhaps I am wrong in thinking that a council must have the support of its own members for a Bill before it can be promoted. It may be that, having once made the decision to promote a Bill, no further reconsideration is needed in altered circumstances. Nevertheless, it is unusual for a Bill to take two calendar years to get under way. The original Bill was printed on 16 November 1988. It is feasible that the newly elected council does not support the Bill by the majority needed for it to be promoted. That is relevant when we are considering whether we should continue to consider it in this House. We must question whether it has the necessary legal and statutory support from the promoting local authority. I cannot answer my own question on my feet, but we owe it to the House to give that aspect some thought before reaching a decision on the motion.

It may appear at face value that the Bill has received the support of Conservatives both at a local level and to a limited extent in Westminster. The matter is less clear-cut than it appears. Line 13 of clause 6 makes reference to section 50 of the 1984 Act, which in turn refers to the Food Act 1984. That legislation, enacted by a Conservative Government, left intact the rule that a franchise market is protected against any rival market within six and two thirds miles, and that a statutory market is protected within six and two thirds miles of any rival other than another statutory market.

If we reject the motion and move to consideration of clause 6 and it is passed, and if the Bill is passed with or without clause 6, Redbridge will enjoy protection against another market being established in the borough. Such protection is of very real commercial value and would be an important consideration in any arrangement to transfer the rights with which clause 6 deals. As the relevant legislation is so recent, having been enacted only six years ago, it follows that a number of right hon. and hon. Members—at least on these Benches—who supported the Bill in the belief that it would in a small way create a free market would have certainly voted for the 1984 Act that embodies the protection that Redbridge will to a large part enjoy under the Bill. Alternatively, they may argue that in this respect they are being consistent. If so, why do those same Members of Parliament not respect Romford's long-held common law rights? Why favour Redbridge over Romford and at Romford's expense?

On Second Reading, the Bill as then drafted would have given Redbridge protection within the same six and two thirds miles' distance as has been attacked as anachronistic in the case of Romford. Subsequently, the Bill was substantially amended in Committee. The Lords amendment is only the latest in a number of amendments to ensure that the protection was limited to the area of the London borough of Redbridge only, which is less than six and two thirds miles distance from Ilford in the round. Nevertheless, an inconsistency remains—and to vote for the Bill and for the proceedings to continue would be a vote for statutory protection, not for a free market.

The reference in clause 6 to section 50 of the 1984 Act is consistent with clause 5, which states:

"A market established under this Act shall be deemed to have been established by the Council under section 50 of the Act of 1984."

It is not clear why clause 6 was inserted in the Bill and subsequently amended, or why it is now proposed that it should be deleted at this late stage, on the Bill's return from another place. It is not clear either why we are being asked to give further time to its consideration.

What place does such a clause have in such a Bill? It has already been amended, and it is now proposed to delete it from the Bill. I am open to correction, but I have received nothing in my post from the promoters to explain that surprising turnabout.

Mr. Squire: Nor I.

Mr. Neubert: Apparently, my hon. Friend has received no such communication either. At a very late stage the Bill appears back in the House with a proposal that this clause should be deleted.

Mr. Squire: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend has reminded me—I had not fully considered it—that to my knowledge, and obviously to yours, promoters of private Bills are required to notify hon. Members on either side of the House of details of the arguments for the Bill at each stage that the matter is debated in the Chamber. Echoing my hon. Friend's remarks, I have received nothing from the promoters of the Bill about this evening's debate. I wonder whether that is in order, or whether some breach of private Bill procedure has taken place which would negate our proceedings tonight?

7.30 pm

Madam Deputy Speaker: As far as I am aware there has been no breach of private Bill procedure. Of course it is usual for promoters to provide as much information as possible, but I assure the hon. Gentleman and the House that there has been no breach of our procedures in this matter.

Mr. Neubert: I am reassured by what you say, Madam Deputy Speaker. I was questioning why there should be such a clause in the Bill in the first place, so that I should have some inkling of why it should be removed. To answer those questions I sought advice from the borough secretary and solicitor, Mr. Michael Tink, who has been handling Havering's case against the Bill. I refer to his letter of 21 September on this matter, which confirms the lack of information that seems to be common to my colleagues and myself, as far as Havering council is concerned.

Mr. Tink says:

"It may sound odd to say after all the attention given to this Bill that we cannot give a precise account of the reasoning for the amendment which now prompts the return of the Bill to the Commons" and which gives occasion for this procedural motion tonight. He goes on to say that he had "no communication from the promoters but the amendment"

"is for the deletion of the whole of clause 6 of the Bill."

He thinks that that may spring from arguments that he and others made before the Committee in the House of Lords, but he believes that the Committee did not recommend the amendment and that the Third Reading in the Lords was without debate.

The background to the matter was that Redbridge was apparently seeking in the Lords to counter the argument that it is wrong in principle to use piecemeal local legislation for overcoming limitations in the general law —something which my colleagues and other hon. Members believe in very strongly and which we urge upon the Government, represented by the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment tonight. We think that that is a fair argument, and I may return to it later.

Redbridge's case was that local authorities throughout the country operate statutory markets under section 50 of the Food Act 1984, including Havering with the Friday market at Romford.

Redbridge wants to run a market under those powers and wants to site it at Ilford. Powers under the Food Act cannot be used to interfere with common law market rights in the area without consent. The Wednesday and Saturday markets at Romford are common law markets and their protection extends to the Ilford area. Therefore, Redbridge needed the Bill to overcome the effects of those rights and to allow it to use the powers granted by the Food Act without Havering's consent.

Redbridge has never sought Havering's consent. That is relevant to this motion. We might not be here tonight and we might not need to consider the motion if Redbridge had sought Havering's consent. From the outset, Redbridge has acted on the assumption that it would promote a Bill in Parliament rather than seek a licence. That is unfortunate because the Bill embodies the sort of compensation which as a licence fee might—I stress the word "might"—have interested Havering, and the House might have been spared hours spent on private legislation and any future hours we may spend debating clause 6 if we agree to do so tonight, or in debating the motion if we continue to do so.

I shall offer some evidence to the House to support my assertion. It comes from Committee proceedings last year, which show how long this unhappy Bill has been proceeding. I was supplied with some of the relevant Committee proceedings. I suggest that, rather than go on to consider clause 6 and give up further valuable parliamentary time, by not agreeing with the motion we might call upon Redbridge to consider opening negotiations with the London borough of Havering at this late stage, which would avoid the necessity of promoting the Bill. There appears to be no end to it.

Is the licensed approach feasible? I have relevant extracts from Committee. If any members of the Committee are present in the House they may recall that on the first day in Committee Mr. J. Hawkins was giving evidence. He was asked:

"In July 1986 did the Council by its Environmental Health (Urgent Action) Sub-Committee agree that, subject to consideration of a report on the establishment of a market dealing with legal considerations and so on, it was prepared to consider the establishment of a market in the Borough under the powers contained in Section 50 of the Food Act?"

The answer was, "Yes." Later, he was asked:

"Was it resolved that the officers should carry out a further study of the implications of pursuing private legislation and to report back?"

The answer was, "Yes."

The questioning continued:

"On 13 April 1988, did the General Services Committee authorise the officers to proceed with the promotion of Private legislation for the provision of a permanent market site in Ilford and to engage consultants?"

Mr. Hawkins answered:

"They made that recommendation, yes."

I stress the date—13 April 1988—as it is two and a half years since the general services committee of Redbridge council authorised the officers to proceed, which adds weight to my suggestion that it might be time, if the opportunity has not already been taken, for Redbridge council to be consulted again about whether it wishes to proceed. The circumstances may have greatly changed.

Mr. Squire: A major change since then, as my hon. Friend will confirm, is the arrival of the unified business rate, which must have had a major impact in Ilford, knowing the impact that it has had in Romford. Surely that is a factor which the council should have taken into account?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. It may well be a major factor, but it is not relevant to the question before us.

Mr. Neubert: To support my contention that at no time did Redbridge seek consent from Havering, as is allowed under common law and under statute law, I again refer to the Committee report on page 46, when Mr. J. Hawkins is being questioned. He was asked whether, about a week after the meeting of the general services committee to which I referred, there was a

"without prejudice meeting between the director of administration and legal services and the solicitor to the Havering London Borough Council."

The answer was, "Yes."

It was only after all those decisions to promote the Bill had been taken by the council that it finally approached Havering. Presumably it did so out of courtesy and a desire to inform it of the proceedings, but without any intention of negotiating and avoiding the necessity of a private Bill which would use valuable private Bill time in the House.

Hon. Members may think that perhaps it was not feasible for Redbridge to seek such consent. Perhaps Havering's past record went against it. That is certainly not so, because Mr. Tink also gives evidence about Kingston upon Thames, which is another example of a franchise market where such a license was sought and granted. There are hundreds of such markets and there may be other examples. In those circumstances it would be easy for Redbridge to make a similar diplomatic approach to the London borough of Havering, seeking its consent to have such a market within the six and two thirds miles' radius on the grant of a licence and on payment of the licence fee.

Before we consider debating the Bill further, we should understand that there is an example in Kingston upon Thames. On page 38, Michael Tink, giving evidence to a Committee of this House, answered the question:

"Do you know, by way of example, of any other authority that has been prepared to grant a licence on proper terms in relation to its market rights?", with:

"Yes, sir, I do. I have caused inquiries to be made, and I know that the Royal Borough of Kingston upon Thames does grant licences for, I believe, four or five rival markets, one of them in the London Borough of Sutton, one at Wimbledon Stadium. I am told there is another one in Kingston town centre itself, which operates on some sort of licence; one at Kempton Race Course and one at Merton. I believe there was formerly one at Putney which has now ceased."

It is perfectly feasible for Redbridge to negotiate with Havering, without our giving further time to considering the Bill in this House as we approach the end of the Session. I cannot guarantee a favourable outcome, but we should certainly consider that option before debating clause 6 and agreeing to the amendment. If the amendment is rejected, I imagine that the same applies to private legislation as to Government legislation, and that the Bill will have to go back to their Lordships who will have to consider the views of this House. Therefore, even if we reach a decision here tonight, it will not necessarily be the end of the matter.

The licence might be related to compensation. As a result of the decision of the Committee of this House, Redbridge would be required to pay compensation to Havering for the loss of commercial value to its market by the establishment of a market within six and two thirds miles of Romford. That has been put at 10 per cent. of the operating profit of the new market when it is established. I have no idea what sum that might be, but it might be the same as a licence fee negotiated directly between the two councils, without promoting a Bill or creating the precedents which threaten other markets, of which there are several hundreds. Indeed, there is a whole network of such markets.

The question of such a licence was raised. At no time has Redbridge followed that path, although it might well have done. On page 18, the aforementioned Mr. J. Hawkins, a witness for Redbridge, was asked:

"Do you know whether the London Borough of Redbridge has ever applied to Havering for a licence to operate a market within Havering's protected area?"

He answered:

"I am not aware that there has been such an approach."

That confirms that there was not such an approach and that, instead, the House has been asked to spend considerable time examining the Bill with all its shortcomings and defects and despite its lack of popular support. That is the result of Redbridge's unwillingness to negotiate. We are again asked to give time to explore the reasons for deleting clause 6, without having been told those reasons in advance of tonight's debate.

Counsel examined Mr. Hawkins about the licence and asked:

"Can we explore, nevertheless, some of what the basic terms of such a licence might be? Firstly, provision would be made, would it not, for which days of the week the licensed market was to be permitted to operate, do you agree?"

[Mr. Neubert]

The answer was, "Yes."

"Secondly, and importantly, provision would be made for the duration of the relevant licence?"

The answer was, "Yes, it could be." Counsel asked:

"You could have provision for a fixed term, or you could have provision for a term capable of being brought to an end by either side by notice, could you not?"

The answer was, "Yes."

"In either event, the duration would be limited?"

The answer was:

"That is a possible approach, yes."

The examination continued:

"Thirdly, and importantly, there would be the amount of the fee to be paid by the licence-holder?"

The answer was, "There would be, yes", to which counsel asked:

"Which you accept might be geared to the profit made by the licensee in operating his market?"

7.45 pm

That is relevant because it is exactly the conclusion that the Committee reached, which persuaded it to require the promoters to add such an amendment to the Bill. The answer was:

"That could be the approach of the franchise-holder, yes. What the reaction from the person seeking the licence would be, of course, is another matter."

Counsel continued:

"If that were the approach, is there any reason why a percentage should, in your view, be fixed at any particular figure—the percentage of the profit made by the licence operator?"

The answer was:

"If this was the approach that was being accepted on both sides, then yes, there could be negotiation on any figure."

In other words, it was open to Redbridge and Havering to negotiate a licence fee which would enable Ilford to realise its ambition to have such a market, without affecting the 750 years' franchise conferred by Henry III on Romford market. Counsel said:

"Thank you. That was going to be the next point I was going to put to you. It would be the result, would it not, of a bargain between a willing seller and a willing buyer, or to be more precise, a willing licensor and a willing licensee?"

The answer was, "Yes."

I raise that at length at this stage because it is still possible for proceedings on the Bill to be adjourned to enable the neighbouring local authorities to get together and negotiate a reasonable arrangement. It probably would not cost Redbridge more than it would cost in the amendment to the Bill, because it has already agreed to a substantial 10 per cent. of the operating profit of the market going to Havering in compensation. That might be held to be a reasonable amount for Havering to ask as a licence fee. I have no brief to speak for Havering council and I cannot anticipate what its answer would be, but I am sure that it would wish the precedents created in the Bill not to be established, if there were an avoidable way out, such as the negotiation of a licence for a fee.

Counsel continued:

"It is right, is it not, that while such licence continued, the licensor could not be in any position to complain that the licensee's market was causing him any damage, could he?"

The answer was:

"No. Subject to the terms of the licence, I am sure that would be right, yes."

In other words, once Havering had agreed to such an arrangement without the Bill, it could not complain. It would be getting its licence fee. That is what happens between markets in Kingston upon Thames and no doubt elsewhere.

It occurred to Mr. Tink, the borough secretary and solicitor, that clause 6 was not related to any restriction arising from Romford's market rights. He concluded:

"if Clause 6 was necessary at all then it must have been intended to give Redbridge different (and better) powers than those available under the Food Act to any other Local Authority."

Hon. Members might well be surprised if that were the case. Clause 6 would certainly be objectionable, if we were told that Redbridge were underprivileged and Romford sought a great advantage. If it were known that originally Redbridge were promoting a Bill to give itself greater advantage than Romford and countless other charter markets, many hon. Members might have taken a different view from the start.

The amendment seems to vindicate Havering's argument that clause 6 is either unnecessary or contrary to the case being made for the Bill. It is surprising that Havering has had no communication with the promoters on that point.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Am I right in thinking that this question was revealed in Committee and that Havering made the points that my hon. Friend is now making but that those representing Redbridge made no attempt to answer them? Therefore, the House has had no guidance from the promoters of the Bill on why they sought to put the clause in, just as we have had no further guidance on why they now wish to remove it.

Mr. Neubert: In general, that must be so. It is not that there has been insufficient time for them to do so. The Committee considered the Bill in the previous Session of Parliament well before the summer recess last year. Therefore, there has been ample time for an explanation to be given.

Redbridge's parliamentary agents are Sharpe Pritchard, who are well known to hon. Members. Their no doubt expensive services enjoy a high reputation in the House. Proceedings on the Bill have been under way for nearly two years if one dates them from the printing of the Bill on 16 November 1988. Redbridge residents must have been paying a packet all this time. The Bill has been controversial from the start, even if the extinguishing of a royal charter does not, to my regret, count as lèse-majesty. It has undergone substantial amendment, of which the Lords amendment is yet another example.

Proceedings have been protracted and have detained the House for an avoidable length of time. I am now detaining the House for an avoidable length of time and I ask for forbearance and understanding. The proceedings have played a part in putting pressure on the Leader of the House to change the private Bill procedure which will restrict our freedom and the rights of hon. Members to play their traditional role in such proceedings. All that has happened despite the fact that on Third Reading the Bill had a majority of only five. That is a narrow squeak in anybody's estimation.

As I understand it, if we were to disagree with the Lords amendment, it would return to the upper House. The Bill has survived this far only because the Government introduced a carry-over motion from the last Session to this. We are now coming towards the end of the second Session. I do not know whether it is possible for a private

Bill to be carried over a second time. It is my understanding that, if a private Bill does not secure enough support to pass through all its stages in one Session, it would go against the principle of private Bills for it to proceed at all. It would go against that understanding if it were to be carried over yet again. As I have said, there is no doubt that it has played its part in putting pressure on the Government and the Leader of the House to change private Bill procedure and I regret that.

Before the House reaches a decision, I ask again whether it would be wiser for Redbridge to withdraw the Bill. The expense does not stop at Queen Anne's Chambers. Redbridge is also being advised by a well-known firm of public relations consultants. I have no hard words to say against the company concerned. It does an excellent job and has even been shrewd enough on occasion to offer me hospitality at its offices not 100 miles from here.

The only other person I know who lives in that street is my hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones), the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office. Incidentally, he should take a close interest in the Bill, as he is one of the many hon. Members who has a charter market in his constituency which would be threatened by the precedent set by the Bill.

The fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Watford lives in that street suggests the quality of the firm of consultants and I am sure it does not come cheap. It has been said—it has not been denied so far—that the consultants are being paid £50,000 plus £4,000 a month for expenses. Some of that money might, with advantage, have been spent on explaining to hon. Members the reasons for the to-ing and fro-ing on clause 6. We would all benefit from that, including the Chairman of Ways and Means who is responsible for private legislation in the House. He may regret as much as we do that we have no clear understanding of why we are at this unusual stage in private Bill procedure.

This legislation has very little support in the House—it was carried on Third Reading by 48 votes to 43—and I am distressed at the amount it must be costing the community charge payers of Redbridge with each week that passes.

It may be that clause 6 relates to the original clause 3. That clause as printed in the Bill of 16 November 1988, said that the council may > "(1) establish a market within a distance of one mile from the town hall, and

> (2) authorise on such terms, (whether financial or otherwise) as they think fit, the establishment by others of a market within a distance of one mile from the town hall."

The second option might have entailed the transfer of rights as set out in clause 6. However, clause 3(2) has now been removed from the Bill, and, as a result, clause 6 may be redundant. I await an explanation. As I said earlier, I am a layman in these matters. I do not know precisely the reason why the promoters want to remove clause 6 and I cannot deduce from the wording of the clause why it is no longer appropriate. However, Havering made some play of arguing against the clause in their Lordships' House and it may be that this is a concession to those arguments.

It is clear that by the inclusion of clause 6 Redbridge had ambitions beyond what is necessary for a local authority to own and operate a market. That brings me back to my objection in principle to the clause and my main argument for wishing to see my motion carried. They should have an opportunity for second, third or even fourth thoughts.

Throughout the country, there are many markets such as that in Romford. The figure of 284 has been cited, but I am not sure whether that represents the number of markets nationwide or whether it is the number of hon. Members whose constituents have access to such a market. A list has been circulated to some hon. Members by the National Market Traders Federation and it lists 284 hon. Members as having such a charter market. It is disappointing that so few of them seem to be aware of the issues in the Bill which, although it affects my constituency of Romford and is promoted by Redbridge, has implications for charter markets all over the country.

The network of markets has developed over hundreds of years and has provided the basis for local prosperity in many towns, especially mine. Romford is famous for its market. It is not famous for much else. It is not famous for its Member of Parliament and it no longer has a football club. It has an excellent brewery which promotes John Bull bitter, but only within the London Weekend Television area. It may be that some towns in this country have developed and been sustained solely as a result of their having a market. If the market is to have its charter removed by a private Act of Parliament, it may be that not only Romford but many other markets will be threatened and picked off one by one.

My hon. Friend the Minister is very patient to sit through the proceedings. His predecessor said on Second Reading that the House should be given an opportunity to examine the Bill although the Government have not supported it. However, they should have taken more interest in the motion to defer consideration. In fact, I would welcome a contribution from my hon. Friend the Minister on whether we should proceed or whether we should do as the motion suggests and defer consideration for six months.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: On the Government's attitude, the House should take note of what Lord Davidson said in the other place:

> "We have reviewed the whole matter of charter market rights to consider whether they are a restraint on trade. We found this a highly complex matter, which could involve compensation for loss of rights and which might well be expensive . . . As existing franchise rights present little impediment to trade—market trading being such a very small part of UK retail trade—we should leave matters as they stand at present."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 5 April 1990; Vol. 517, c. 1612.]

Although I am sure that the Government do not wish to intervene on the Bill, that sentiment implies that matters should be left as they stood in Romford as well as in the rest of the country.

8 pm

Mr. Neubert: I am ready to agree with my hon. Friend, because with his unerring instinct for what is apt, he has anticipated my next point. The Government came clean in another place about their reasons for not proceeding with such legislation. It is a matter of complexity and compensation, and if the system is thought to be outdated —there is no doubt that in historical terms it is outdated, although it has some relevance to present day conditions —it would be better reformed outright, not by picking off one franchise market at a time by private Act of Parliament. Although they are a radical Administration, the Government have not sought that reform, and I have no doubt that my noble friend Viscount Davidson had his finger on the point.

That confirms the value of such charters and that they should not be taken over and transferred to others, as anticipated in clause 6, without adequate recompense and without it being dealt with evenhandedly.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): Is not it true that many towns have grown around ancient charter markets and that in recent years authorities have put considerable investment into new market facilities? If such a Bill had been proposed at that time, they might not have made that investment.

Mr. Neubert: I am glad to have given way to the hon. Gentleman, who has sustained his interest throughout the long proceedings on this Bill; we have welcomed the value of his advice on more than one occasion. These arrangements are long established and will be upset by a Bill that picks off one market. The economy of Romford, which is prospering and supporting the livelihoods of many people in and around the town, is based on those long-standing arrangements, and simply changing them will have serious repercussions. The Committee that considered the Bill recognised that fact by requiring Redbridge to pay adequate compensation, but I do not know whether it is anything more a mitigating amendment. If we support the Bill, which attacks the long protected rights of a single market, we may condemn ourselves to endless such Bills, which is one of my greatest anxieties.

It cannot be right to proceed in this way and I hope that I have made it clear that the best for all concerned, even at this late stage and notwithstanding the expense incurred, the many hours of debate and discussion and the valued experience and knowledge that have been used to amend the Bill, would be to proceed by negotiation and to avoid putting this precedent on the statute book. It may be argued that there is already a precedent—the agreement reached by the borough of Bexley with Greenwich. It is not for me or other hon. Members to argue the case for Bexley or Greenwich, but, whatever their arguments or interests, they reached an agreement.

The Bill is not the subject of such an agreement—it would not need to be promoted in the House if there were such an agreement—but the result of Redbridge's single-minded determination to promote legislation as a way of achieving its objectives. For that reason, I support the motion to defer consideration because it gives Redbridge a chance to reconsider and to open negotiations with Havering and to explore whether there is another way out that does not require this precedent, which would be highly unfortunate for charter markets throughout the country and for Members of Parliament whose constituents enjoy the benefits of them. I very much hope that the motion will be carried.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I welcome my hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Mr. Neubert) back to the land of the living. As one of his colleagues in Havering, I have very much missed his presence on the Back Benches. I hope that he will not take it amiss when I say that it was a sadness to me that the Government did not dispense with his services a few months earlier, because had they done so I have no doubt that the Bill would not have reached this stage. With my hon. Friend's assistance, which he was debarred from giving, we would have managed to knock this absurd Bill on the head long ago.

Hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Romford, have sat through many nights of discussion on the Bill. We thought that we had exhaustively dealt with all the subjects that could have been brought before us, but it appears that we had not because the amendment radically transforms the nature of the Bill in such a way that it would be wrong for the House to consider it tonight.

No warning was given to Havering council as far as I am aware, and certainly to my hon. Friends or me, that the amendment would be moved. There was no discussion and it was unilaterally decided by Redbridge council to delete this clause lock stock and barrel fromn the Bill. I am not clear—I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North (Mr. Bendall) will intervene and enlighten me—what are the consequences of the clause's removal. I shall read clause 6 as it was——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We are not yet dealing with the amendment to the Bill. The question before us is whether we move on to deal with the amendment.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: That is right, but we cannot decide whether we should debate the amendment without considering the consequences of removing clause 6. I shall refresh the memory of the House and read that clause. It says:

> "Any person entitled or authorised by virtue of this Act to hold a market may transfer or dispose of all or part of his rights to another and that other shall have and may exercise, to the extent authorised by the Council, all or any of the powers that the Council have in relation to markets established by them under Section 50 of the Act of 1984, other than any powers to make byelaws, but shall be subject to all the restrictions, liabilities and obligations in respect thereof to which the Council are subject."

How can the House assess what the result will be of removing the clause from the Bill without considering the amendment? I disclose my ignorance by saying so, but I cannot understand what the position will be if the Bill is passed without clause 6. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North will enlighten me, but if he cannot the House cannot conceivably consider whether the clause should be deleted.

Mr. Neubert: I had hoped, as no doubt my hon. Friend had, that we would have an explanation, not, as appears likely, at the end of the debate but at an early stage. It would have been helpful for an explanation to have been given so that I could have considered it. If we are not to have an explanation until the end of the debate, it will make a farce of it.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Or, indeed, if we are not to have an explanation at all. As you, Madam Deputy Speaker, may have noted, I hesitated before rising, because I wished to give my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North an opportunity to clarify the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Romford. It is most unsatisfactory if those of us who criticise the Bill and who wish the motion to be carried are not to be given the advantage of knowing precisely what we are discussing.

I have scrutinised the rest of the Bill in an attempt to discover what the consequence of omitting clause 6 would be. I see that my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North is talking to some of my hon. Friends. I hope that he will pay attention, because if he does not, he will not be able to answer the questions that I am putting to him. I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to tell us whether the council will authorise the transfer of stalls if there is no clause 6 and on what terms the transfer of rights in each stall will be made. Will the council have a blanket right to allow transfer by whatever means it wishes, or will it have no rights to authorise a transfer at all?

As far as I can see, nothing elsewhere in the Bill either grants or limits the power of transfer. Clause 3 deals with the establishment of the market. Clause 4 deals with the compensation payable in the event of the Bill being enacted and clause 5 merely specifies that section 50 of the 1984 Act shall apply to the Bill.

Mr. O'Brien: I consider this to be a very important matter. I have examined the proceedings in the other place and in Committee. Nowhere was any evidence given to support the case for the removal of the clause. Until the facts are made available to the House, we cannot proceed, and we should therefore support the motion. Does the hon. Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) have any information about the circumstances that gave rise to the tabling of the amendment?

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I have no such information and I think it very unfortunate that I have none. As far as I am aware, no hon. Member—with the possible exception of my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North, has any such information. Indeed, I remain to be convinced that even my hon. Friend has such information. I deeply regret the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) cannot be here, although I understand the reasons. His absence handicaps those of us who seek a proper debate on an important part of the Bill. He is one of the two primary sponsors who have argued in favour of the Bill throughout our long proceedings on it, and it is regrettable that he cannot be here during its final stages.

I invite my my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North to enlighten the House, if he can, on the consequences of removing clause 6. Unfortunately, it seems that my hon. Friend cannot enlighten us, so let me speculate.

It is possible that if the clause is removed, the council will have no power to authorise the transfer of the trading stalls—in which case, I cannot see how it can proceed to set up and maintain a market in Ilford. Another possibility is that the council will have the power to authorise the transfer of the stalls without imposing any conditions on them. If that is so, I should be grateful for information about how that arrangement compares with arrangements for other markets where councils set up stalls.

Do the councils usually have the power to authorise transfer of stalls from one person to another without having any say in the type of business taking place at those stalls, or are restrictions perhaps imposed under section 50 of the 1984 Act? I do not think that it is incumbent on me to give the House the solutions. Those who are promoting the Bill and those who have brought it before us have a duty to tell us the consequences of accepting the amendment. At the moment, every hon. Member in the Chamber—and everyone who has considered the matter —is as much in the dark as I am.

Mr. Neubert: I find it quite intolerable that, even at the third or fourth time of asking, we are to be offered no explanation of the fact that we have been called here to deal with this business tonight—even though it was known before the summer recess that this business would be taken. I have had to spend some time preparing for tonight's debate, in ignorance of the reasons for it but in the confident belief that the sponsor of the Bill would make it plain at the outset why we were being asked to consider the Lords amendment and what the background to it was. It makes a mockery of our proceedings if we are to be given no explanation at all of a matter that is clearly so directly relevant to the Bill.

8.15 pm

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I echo my hon. Friend's sentiments. It is an abuse of the procedures of the House if business is brought before it for which no explanation is offered. There has been no proper resistance to the motion and no proper explanation has been given of why those who tabled it may be mistaken.

While remaining neutral on the fundamental question whether Redbridge should be given the power in the Bill, the Government should certainly not be neutral when it comes to matters affecting the procedures of the House. They should not be neutral about the fact that the sponsors of the Bill have not informed the House of precisely what they are asking it to agree. As the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) said, no explanation was given when the amendment was moved in the other place. Having resisted such an amendment throughout the Committee stage—without giving any reasons for resisting it—the promoter has suddenly decided to adopt such an amendment and to try to force it through both Houses of Parliament without even opening their mouths to defend what they are doing. That is something that the House simply cannot tolerate.

I regret the fact that so few hon. Members are present, although it is not surprising on the first day back after a long summer recess, and especially as the Bill is not perhaps the most important business with which we are likely to be faced in the next fortnight—except to my hon. Friends the Members for Romford and for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) and myself. Our colleagues who are not present would not for one moment tolerate such a procedure and I predict that there will be a roar of fury when hon. Members read Hansard and see what is being done in their name and in their absence and without any explanation from the sponsors.

That is the first reason why I vigorously support the motion, tabled to try to defer discussion of the amendment so that proper consideration can be given to it, so that proper consultation can take place between Romford and Redbridge and so that my hon. Friends and I can be given a full explanation of the consequences of accepting the amendment and of the reasons why it has been tabled.

I touched upon my second reason for supporting the motion in my point of order. I am not clear whether the locus standi of the promoter is still intact. I do not know the procedures and rules of the House in relation to a Bill being proposed without having complied—at the time when it was proposed—with the qualifications laid down in "Erskine May" for the introduction of such a Bill.

Perhaps it is enough—as my hon. Friend the Member for Romford suggested—that the conditions were intact when the Bill was first proposed and perhaps it does not matter what happens thereafter. But perhaps by now—some two and a half years after the introduction of the Bill

[Sir Nicholas Bonsor]

—the qualifications allowing Redbridge to assert its right to introduce the Bill are no longer intact. If that is so, I do not know whether the Bill should be allowed to proceed.

If it should not be allowed to proceed, we should certainly not debate the amendment tonight. The debate should be adjourned and the matter should be considered further, perhaps by the occupant of the Chair, to determine whether the Bill still has proper standing to be considered in this place. That is a question of fundamental importance. There must be similar instances; indeed, I can think of one parallel straight away.

Suppose that a Government Bill is hybrid. As I understand it, a hybrid Bill cannot proceed through the House in the face of objection because it is not properly founded; it can be stopped. If my submission is right, the same rules should apply to this Bill. Unless the promoter can establish that the foundation on which the Bill has come to the Chamber is sound and intact, the Bill must fail. I must admit that I am not clear about what procedure should apply. If my supposition is correct, how can we stop the Bill at any time other than now? I am in your hands, Madam Deputy Speaker, although I am making a speech and not raising a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman raised the matter on a point of order earlier and I assured him then, as I do now, that the Bill is in perfect order, otherwise we would not be debating it tonight.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I accept that and I move my guard, as any good defensive boxer must when he has just been effectively punched.

The fact that the Bill is in order does not mean that the House should consider these matters without having been given prior notice that the change was to be made to the Bill. Even though it is in order for Redbridge to bring forward the Bill, the council may no longer have the requisite support for it, because it might have changed its complexion and many no longer support the Bill. It would be an insult for the new councillors of Redbridge who oppose the Bill and for those councillors who have steadfastly opposed it—I believe that those councillors have always comprised one third of the council—if the House were to proceed with the Bill and allow it to reach the statute book. It would be insulting for the House to do that if the council that brought the Bill to the House no longer wished to proceed with it because it had not yet had an opportunity to change its mind on the issue.

I invite my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North to discuss with the council representatives who are present this evening whether it would be better, and in the interests of the constituents of Redbridge, for the Bill to be deferred so that proper consideration can be given to whether it is still popular in the constituency and the borough, whether it is still wanted and whether, above all, the council would still put the Bill before the House should it take such a decision today instead of relying on a decision taken two and a half years ago.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North will comment on those points. If he does not do so, we must conclude that the Bill is being brought before the House without adequate consideration even by the people living in the borough on whose behalf the Bill is allegedly being promoted.

The final point, which I strongly believe the House should consider when deciding whether we should continue the debate on clause 6, is the fact that we were not told by Redbridge council or by its representatives in the House why clause 6 was included in the first place. Not only are we ignorant of the consequences of removing clause 6: we are equally ignorant of the reasons why it was included. It is important that the House should know whether what Redbridge was seeking in clause 6 were powers in excess of those granted by the Food Act 1984. Redbridge said nothing about that in Committee, despite the fact that counsel for Havering borough and others speaking on behalf of Havering raised that point several times. The point was never answered satisfactorily. Indeed, it was not answered at all.

The House must be ignorant about the purpose behind clause 6 and whether Redbridge was seeking powers well beyond the removal of the rights granted by ancient charter in Romford. The House was going to be used, had clause 6 not been removed, to do something which would have been unique in this country and which would have given Redbridge borough powers that no other borough possesses.

That may be why clause 6 was included in the Bill and perhaps it is being removed because Redbridge borough council has thought better of asking the House for powers that no other council possesses. However, I cannot say often enough or with adequate feeling that the House is not being properly treated or adequately briefed by the Bill's sponsors.

The procedures for private business have worked well for many years. I have served on private Bill Committees and the procedure is comprehensive. However, it is comprehensive only if the good will and good faith of the promoter allows a proper and full examination of the proposals in the Bill. That, dismally, did not occur in this case—although every opportunity was given to the promoter to answer the allegations.

If we had allowed the Bill to pass with clause 6, that could have thrown much ill light on the private Bill procedures. I submit that it would be wrong for us to proceed with the consideration of whether we should continue with clause 6 or allow the Bill to proceed without it. Such consideration cannot happen when we have not received the information that my hon. Friend the Member for Romford and I have been requesting this evening. That information was pressed for vigorously in Committee and the issue has been raised every time this business has come before the House.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North will seize this last opportunity and tell the House the facts that we are longing to know and so justify the stance that his council is putting forward as the reason for our supporting the Bill.

Mr. Pike: Unfortunately for the hon. Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor), I am going to delay the hon. Member for Ilford, North (Mr. Bendall) for a few moments, but I also await the comments of the latter.

We welcome the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) to the Government Front Bench and congratulate him on his appointment. As he comes here in a virgin state as a Minister tonight, untainted by any previous involvement in this Bill, I hope that he will steer the House to a sensible conclusion in this debate and defer consideration for six months. I hope that that would be a sensible way forward at the moment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The motion before the House is whether we consider the Lords amendment. It is not the six months motion.

Mr. Pike: Thank you for correcting me, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am sure that we all understand the situation.

Mr. Neubert: Does the hon. Gentleman take some encouragement from the fact that the new Under-Secretary of State, to whom I extend congratulations, is the hon. Member for Salisbury and has a charter market in his constituency and that he may well therefore be concerned to learn the implications of the Bill for his market? What is more, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State is flanked by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs, who is the hon. Member for Wokingham. He is one of the long list of hon. Members who have markets which benefit their constituents. With such a representation on the Government Front Bench, perhaps greater consideration can be given to the arguments that we have deployed for nearly two years now.

Mr. Pike: The hon. Member for Romford (Mr. Neubert) has rightly made a pertinent point. I have been involved in the debates at every stage of this Bill and I know that concerns have not only centred around the implications for Redbridge and the neighbouring authority, but on the implications for all towns with charter markets.

It was somewhat unfortunate that, although he made his position perfectly clear in previous debates, the hon. Member for Romford (Mr. Neubert) was unable to make a contribution to the proceedings. Tonight he has put forward an extremely good case for why we should not debate the Lords amendment. I congratulate him on that speech. Although I am sorry that he has had to go back to the Government Back Benches, his contribution to the debate has been most welcome, and I shall now concentrate on his final remarks.

8.30 pm

The hon. Member's argument was that we should not debate the Lords amendment because there should be a period in which the local authorities involved should be able to negotiate and consult, to see whether some mutually convenient and acceptable arrangement can be achieved. That is an eminently sensible proposal, which should commend itself to the House. I hope that the House will support that point of view.

We in Burnley have a charter market that dates back about 800 years. We fear that the next thing that we shall see is another Bill relating to another local authority, and then another Bill, and so on. That would be a dangerous precedent. The Burnley market was established by charter on the doorsteps of the church more than 800 years ago, and that pattern has been repeated on many occasions. We have often debated how the distance between markets was established, and so on.

As I said when the hon. Member for Romford kindly gave way to me, the local authority in Burnley has made a major investment in a new indoor and outdoor market. If charter rights had been in jeopardy, there would have been great reservations about that investment. Many other local authorities have made investments to bring their markets up to modern-day standards. If they thought that their charter rights would not be protected, they would not have made that investment: that is our worry.

I recognise that we are not debating the Lords amendment at this stage, but it is right to refer to the context of the debate. We do not know why, having resisted changes at all stages of the proceedings in this House, at this late stage we are presented with a proposal to delete clause 6. You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in your role as Chairman of Ways and Means, know very well that the normal procedure with private Member's Bills is that their promoters give reasons for major changes. It is strange that we are not in a position to know why that debate is to take place tonight, why that clause is to be deleted. It represents a major change to the Bill, and that matter is of concern to us.

It particularly worries me that the hon. Members for Romford and for Upminster, even though their local authority is directly affected, have not received the courtesy of being consulted or informed. Since July, we have known that the Redbridge Bill was the business for Monday 15 October at 7 o'clock. We have known that for a considerable time. That is a discourtesy not only to the House but to hon. Members with neighbouring constituencies that are directly involved, who have expressed reservations at every stage.

Mr. Neubert: Does the hon. Gentleman recall that this business was put down at short notice for consideration on 24 July and was not reached then only because of the weight of debate on the private business which preceded it? But for the fact that it was set down for second business on that day, we would have been in this position all those weeks and months ago. Even now we have no explanation. It is quite extraordinary.

Mr. Pike: The hon. Member for Romford is absolutely right. He would obviously be joined not only by the hon. Member for Upminster and others but by the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire), who has taken a close interest in this Bill. With no disrespect to the hon. Member for Ilford, North, who has made his position clear throughout the proceedings, the principal advocate on most occasions has been the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne), who unfortunately cannot be present tonight. It would be wrong for us to proceed when he is not present to state exactly why the clause should be deleted.

The issues are clear. Hon. Members should refrain from discussing the deletion of clause 6 and allow adequate time for further consultation. That is the sensible course of action to pursue. It would also allow the two authorities involved to get their heads together and perhaps reach an acceptable compromise.

The hon. Member for Upminster questioned whether the people of Redbridge are still as enthusiastic about the Bill as they might have been when it started on its passage a considerable time ago. If we do not proceed tonight, we shall allow time for reflection. It is certainly not my wish to prolong the proceedings, but those two grounds alone constitute extremely good reasons not to debate the Lords amendment tonight. I hope that the House is also of that view and that the matter can be deferred.

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone): I, too, am concerned about the length of notice that hon. Members have received. I add my congratulations to those of my colleagues on both sides of the House to my hon. Friend the Minister, the hon. Member for Salisbury, (Mr. Key). I am delighted to see him in a very well deserved post. Hon. Members look forward to hearing his contributions on many occasions.

My hon. Friend and I do not always agree on everything, but I have immense respect for him, which I know is universally shared, and I am delighted to see him on the Government Front Bench. I should like to talk at even greater length on his promotion, but at this point I should address the main question, which is whether we should debate the amendment or whether we should delay.

I was keen to hear the arguments for why we should debate the amendment. When I saw the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North (Mr. Bendall) on the screen, I ran in at high speed, because I wished to hear his arguments. I was not coming from a great distance, but, by the time I arrived in the Chamber, he had concluded his remarks. Sadly, therefore, I have heard no argument whatever for our debating the amendment now.

As I understand it, notice of the amendment was given from the other place immediately before we adjourned for the summer recess. Now, on the first day back, this amendment is on the Order Paper. Hon. Members cannot possibly have had sufficient time to consider its implications. I am told that no explanatory memorandum has been submitted, despite endless requests, so that we should know exactly what was in the minds of those in the other place when they decided to make the amendment.

Mr. Pike: Did I understand the hon. Lady correctly when she said that the borough of Havering had specifically requested that an explanatory memorandum should be made available?

Miss Widdecombe: I understand from my hon. Friend the Member for Romford that numerous requests have been made for an explanation. I would welcome my hon. Friend's clarification of that.

Mr. Neubert: I am happy to be able to confirm that numerous requests have been made in this Chamber to my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North (Mr. Bendall). All I have been able to do is present evidence to show that the borough secretary and solicitor for the London borough of Havering are as unaware of the background to this most surprising development as we are. Havering borough has been the chief protagonist and petitioner against the Bill in both Houses and one would have thought that that borough at least would have been given the courtesy of some explanation. Certainly the hon. Members representing that borough have had no such explanation, and it follows that my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) is equally underprivileged.

Miss Widdecombe: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for that clarification.

We are here tonight to discuss something for which we have been given no explanation, either verbal or written. We have not had time to consider it properly, because a number of sitting days have not passed. We have not had time for informal discussion of this important amendment. You may remember, Mr. Deputy Speaker, from my earlier contributions that I am in sympathy with deleting that clause, but I would not stretch your patience by dwelling on the reasons for that. Nevertheless, I believe that proper forms must be observed. However technically in order it might be, it seems quite improper that such a major amendment of a clause that occupied hours of debate during earlier consideration of the Bill should be sprung on the House, especially as no proper explanation of it has been given.

The proposed change would affect all those constituencies with markets. I was most interested to hear the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) discuss the market at Burnley. He may recall that I had an acquaintance with Burnley—not as successful as his acquaintance with it—in 1979. I recall that market extremely well and the great contribution that it makes to Burnley life.

I can understand that the hon. Gentleman is concerned that we should not be precipitated into a situation in which a major Bill, which will create precedents, has an important consideration removed from it—the powers of local councils over the disposal of those markets. I am not surprised that the hon. Gentleman considers that that is unacceptable. I too have a market in my constituency and I am surprised that we have not been given further opportunity to consider the effect of deleting the clause.

When the Bill left the House in the summer, the clause was intact. Those local authorities and markets examining the likely effects of the Bill will obviously be studying it in the form in which it last left the House.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: My hon. Friend's argument is even more forceful because of the way in which an earlier attempt to get an explanation from the promoter of why the clause was there was so firmly blocked. Every attempt by those opposed to the Bill to challenge that clause was met with a dead-wall defence. No explanation was given at any stage of why the clause was in the Bill and there has been less than zero information as to why it should be taken out of the Bill. That is a complete volte-face from the position adopted in Committee.

Miss Widdecombe: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. In our earlier proceedings on the Bill, I remember that we had a most unsatisfactory time trying to establish why on earth the restrictions under the Shops Act 1950 would not do, and why such an eccentric blanket provision should be built in to give local councils total control over disposals. Such powers would make it impossible for anyone to take sensible commercial decisions. Nobody would know what rules would govern the disposal of markets or parts of markets at the time that they chose to dispose of them.

I remember that questions were raised about nepotism on councils and about frequent switches of political control of councils. Those questions were never answered. We asked for clarification, but we did not get it. Tonight, the clause has disappeared and it has been amended out of existence. We have asked for an explanation, but we have not received one.

8.45 pm

Mr. Neubert: My hon. Friend mentioned clause 6. It is important to remember that we have not yet amended it out of existence. We are discussing whether we should consider such a thing tonight. Things are even more mysterious than my hon. Friend has portrayed, because clause 6 not only existed in the original Bill, but two lines were added to it in the course of proceedings in the House. Lines 16 and 17 provided:

"No such transfer or disposal of rights"

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I think that the debate now is perhaps anticipating the debate that we may have on the amendment. We should confine the debate to the question whether the Lords amendment should be considered or otherwise.

Mr. Neubert: I understand your argument, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am simply making the point that the proposal as to whether we should consider the amendment tonight arises from an amendment which seems to be in contradistinction to the direction taken by the Committee that amended the clause in our proceedings in this House.

Miss Widdecombe: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend.

I should be grateful for some guidance from you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Although I understand why we should discuss whether the amendment should be heard, surely the parameters of that amendment and how it relates to the things we agreed earlier are important factors when considering whether to hear that amendment tonight. Although I accept that my hon. Friend the Member for Romford is not in order because you say so, Mr. Deputy Speaker, he was raising a most important consideration of which the House should take cognisance when deciding whether to discuss the amendment.

You have referred, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to a debate that we may well have. I sincerely hope that we do not have that debate without proper time for reflection in order to establish why the clause should be wholly amended. My hon. Friend the Member for Romford is right to correct me from suggesting that the clause has already been amended out of existence, but that is the proposal we are discussing. I sincerely hope that we do not have that debate until we have had time to reflect on the effects of that decision. We should not discuss it until we have time to consult our traders, markets and local authorities to tell them that the situation has changed fairly dramatically. It is important to know that the Bill that left this place is no longer what is proposed.

Mr. O'Brien: The hon. Lady has reminded the House three times that, when the Bill left this place, the clause was intact. When the Committee in the other place considered the Bill, the clause was intact, but on Third Reading in the other place it was suggested that the clause should be deleted. No explanation has been given, and if there is no explanation on record in the other place, we are entitled to an explanation before any Division in this House. Perhaps the hon. Lady would like to address that point.

Miss Widdecombe: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman, because he has summarised the matter admirably. He has said what I have tried to say in the course of what has perhaps been a rather long-winded contribution.

Throughout, the clause has been intact. It was challenged at one point, but that challenge was repelled. Therefore, it was reasonable for those considering the practical effects of the Bill to assume that the clause would be an integral part of it. As the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) rightly said, because it has survived scrutiny at all stages so far, it is fairly surprising that it now comes back with a proposal for deletion. What practical effect will that have? It means that those considering the Bill and those who have to live with its consequences have a different animal to examine. It is not sufficient for us to take a hasty decision tonight.

I did not know that the clause had been deleted, so I have not undertaken the proper consultation that I would have done had I known. I think that the same would apply to many other hon. Members with constituencies with markets or local authorities with a special interest in the matter. We are not talking about a minor deletion, which we could have swallowed, although we would still have expected the courtesy of an explanation. We are talking about telling local authorities that they will have no control, other than that already enshrined in legislation governing completely different set-ups such as rows of shops, over the disposal of rights to trade in this fashion.

Just as I bitterly opposed the eccentric blanket provision that councils should simply refuse permission to dispose without a specified set of grounds being included in the Bill, I now believe that the Bill has gone the other way and there is too little protection. Now, councils do not have the ability to refuse disposal if they consider that the consequences would be undesirable for the district under their control. I appreciate that, to a certain extent, to debate that is to debate the merits of the amendment. I believe that it is such a major consideration that it is important that those authorities, markets and traders should all have an input. If the clause is to be deleted and nothing is substituted, or the substitution is inadequate, that creates a different sort of Bill from that which left this place, and we have not had adequate time to consider it.

Mr. Pike: As well as the traders and those who use the markets, would not another factor involve the fact that many councils derive crucial income from their markets? I do not want to enter the argument on whether we have poll tax or rates, but local government funding, however it is raised from local residents, can be affected by the proposal we are debating tonight. If a council's income falls, it must affect local charge payers in one form or another.

Miss Widdecombe: The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) is absolutely right, and has raised yet another major consideration. As I said, we are discussing not a minor clause but something that will have long-term practical consequences for many local authorities, traders and citizens. Therefore, it is incumbent on us to get it right, which we cannot do with the sort of notice or explanation —or lack of explanation—that we have been given. We should not consider the clause tonight, but should have time for proper consultation.

Mr. Neubert: On that very point, is there not an extra dimension that has not yet been mentioned? This Bill, with a clause 6 that was not only not deleted by the Committee but actually added to in Committee and approved on Third Reading, comes back from their Lordships' House with a proposal to delete that self-same clause. I do not want to exaggerate the issues, but there is a possibility of a constitutional clash between the two Houses of Parliament because one is taking an entirely different view from the other. Therefore, should we not have had some explanation for that at the debate's outset?

Miss Widdecombe: Indeed, and the possibility of a clash makes it all the more urgent that we do not consider the amendment passed in another place, with the possibility that we shall refuse it. Surely it is better for us to take due time to consult in all the necessary places and consider the consequences of accepting or rejecting the amendment, talk to interested parties and come to a reasoned view rather than one formed on the spur of the moment—as it must be, since this is the first day back.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): First, I congratulate the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) on his new post, although he will not expect me to wish him to be there too long. I hope that he may be Opposition spokesman before too long, rather than a Minister, but I congratulate him.

There are three reasons why we should not discuss the Lords amendment. First—this does not colour my point of view—the Market Traders Association is in my constituency. Secondly, I have a great deal of feeling and nostalgia for markets in my constituency. Thirdly, although it is a Redbridge Bill, it could affect 246 other constituency areas, which means that we must not consider it lightly but should study it in depth to see where we are going.

When the markets were set up by charter 700 or 800 years ago, the people who gave them were wise, because they realised, even then, that there was only so much money to go round and so much trade to be had; to stop dog eating dog, a charter was created that allowed a market to be built and provided that, within a certain mileage of that central market, others should not be built. It did not make it impossible, but it meant that those involved got together and decided on the arrangements.

A practical illustration involves my own little village, Hoyland, under the Barnsley authority, where there was a charter market. The authority came down heavily and said that there could not be another one, but then reason prevailed and, between the parties, they decided what could be done. However, if we do not allow time for such discussion and negotiation, we are in danger of letting the Bill go through inadequately discussed or thought about and, worse still, with the parties involved not having had the chance to get together and decide whether the House should be used as an instrument to pass a private Member's Bill for one part of a district to usurp another part of that district, bringing full authority to bear with the permission of the House—which is how the House is being used. Before we do that, we should think clearly and deeply about it.

If the Bill goes through, we must consider what we are doing to the 246 constituencies with charter markets.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Why, does it affect them?

Mr. McKay: It could easily affect them, because, once a precedent is created by the Bill, another authority will be able to say, "Wait a minute, they have done it, so we can." If my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) and his authority decided that legislation involving their district should be passed, there would be another market between Wakefield and Barnsley.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. With respect, I suggest that the hon. Gentleman's speech would be more appropriate on Second Reading. At this point, we are considering whether to give consideration to an amendment made in another place. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the Bill received a Second and Third Reading in this House.

9 pm

Mr. McKay: I am hoping that we can prove our point that it would be better not to discuss the Lords amendment tonight, but to let the participants go back and decide for themselves rather than the House deciding for them. If our argument is valid and accepted, we will not need a Second or Third Reading. However, that can be left until later to tidy up any little bits that may return.

While I naturally accept your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I hope that the points that I have made will stop a Second and Third Reading from taking place. I hope that common sense will prevail.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Given that clause 6 has not been explained by the sponsors of the Bill, does that not bear out what the hon. Gentleman is saying? No one has had the opportunity to explore the effect of clause 6, or the effect of removing it. In those circumstances, is it not important that the effect on the other charter markets is explored by the House before we decide even whether to debate the removal of clause 6?

Mr. McKay: Certainly we should have time to explore that. We should not sit back gently and be steamrollered; we are bigger and more important than that. Time should be given for us to have an explanation of what the Bill means.

Mr. Skinner: My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) has been here since 7 o'clock listening to the debate. Is he saying that neither the sponsors of the Bill nor anyone connected with its purpose has explained what is in clause 6? We know from experience that some Bills get through without proper discussion, especially private Bills. Is my hon. Friend saying that, despite all our efforts, we cannot get anyone to get up to explain what is in clause 6 and why the Lords have passed the amendment?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It might be more appropriate to consider the effect of clause 6 and its deletion when we come to debate the Lords amendment. We are debating whether the House should consider that Lords amendment.

Mr. McKay: I can say to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) that we have not had an explanation. If we had, we would probably not be in this position. We would probably have had a better knowledge of the Bill and its effect on other areas and constituencies.

Mr. Neubert: We have proceeded for two hours without explanation from the sponsors for the reasons for the amendment, and we are now being asked whether we should consider it now or in six months' time. I can only assume——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The six-months motion is not before the House; the question is whether the House should consider the Lords amendment. I have just said that we should wait until the debate on the Lords amendment to find out what clause 6 is all about. The hon. Gentleman is ignoring what I have just said.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am exposing my ignorance, and at risk of incurring your displeasure, but I do not understand why the Order Paper specifies

"That the Lords Amendment be considered upon this day six months"——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is not our practice to debate a motion that has not been selected for debate. I repeat that the Question before the House is that the Lords amendment be now considered. I hope that hon. Members will address themselves to that.

Mr. McKay: Our question is why the Lords amendment should be considered. If it were dealt with in that way, it would give more time—time that is needed for explanations, for participation, for us to try to right the mistakes that we will probably make and for us to ensure that, before anything goes out of the House, it has been considered to the best of our ability.

Mr. Skinner: Now we know what we are about. We have had no explanation for two hours, although clearly the Lords passed the amendment. You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, have said that we must speak about the Lords amendment. I ask my hon. Friend the Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien): how many Lords were present when they passed the amendment?

Mr. O'Brien: None.

Mr. Skinner: My hon. Friend, who is well informed on these matters, says, "None." That is a tired old state of affairs, is it not? We have had no explanation about clause 6, and when I asked how many Lords took part in the great debate that introduced the amendment, I was told that the answer was none. Now my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) is trying his level best to discuss that matter, but we are told by the Chair that we must stick to a narrow formula that precludes my hon. Friend from making any comment at all.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Bolsover knows that interventions must be brief.

Mr. McKay: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for explaining the matter in his usual direct and blunt way. The amendment has not been considered in the Lords and we are being asked to rubber-stamp it and forget it—but the House will not forget it.

Mr. O'Brien: As I tried to explain earlier, when the Bill was considered in the other place, it went through Committee in the form in which it left this House, with clause 6 intact. The Bill was given a Third Reading without debate in the House of Lords, and it was then suggested that it should be accepted with the amendment. Never has any reason been given as to why clause 6 should be deleted. That is why my hon. Friend is saying that it should not be considered here tonight, and that is why his appeal is justified.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have just been to the Vote Office, and it seems that Sharpe Pritchard, the parliamentary agent for the Bill, has distributed the wrong copy of the Bill to the House. The copy that we have contains no clause 6, so the amendment, which reads refers to part of clause 4 and part of clause 5.

I ask for your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I should have thought that we should discontinue this sitting at least until Sharpe Pritchard gives us proper copies of the Bill. Then we should start again from the beginning, since we have been discussing something that does not exist.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I may have misheard the hon. Gentleman. Did he refer to a Bill which he has just obtained from the Vote Office?

Mr. Barnes: I collected the Bill from the Vote Office as I came in. It is not the correct Bill because page 4, lines 9 to 17 are not part of clause 6. There is no clause 6 in the Bill; parts of clauses 4 and 5 are being referred to.

Until this has been corrected, the House cannot proceed with this measure. You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may hold a copy which is correct, but hon. Members are in the dark.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman will have seen me taking advice while he was addressing the Chair. I am advised that the Bill that is available in the Vote Office does contain all the clauses—I refer to the House of Commons Bill. The hon. Gentleman may have been supplied with a copy of the House of Lords Bill, in which case there has been a mistake at the Vote Office. But I understand that copies of the House of Commons Bill contain the clause to which he refers.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I also collected from the Vote Office a copy which does not contain the clause. If you like, I shall go to the Vote Office and check whether it has a copy that contains the clause, but the copies that have been given to Members who have asked for them certainly do not contain it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I shall take immediate steps to obtain clarification, and I suggest that, until the House obtains it, we continue the debate.

Mr. Harry Barnes: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I went to the Vote Office twice. When I examined the Bill that I had collected, I wondered what on earth was being discussed, because I could not find the clause in question. I returned to the Vote Office, which told me that Sharpe Pritchard had distributed the wrong copy of the Bill and that someone from the Vote Office had rung up the agent to try to get hold of the correct copy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As I have suggested, perhaps we should continue until I have obtained clarification, when I shall report to the House.

Mr. Skinner: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This seems a bit cock-eyed to me. We have just discovered that we are debating a clause of which Members have no copy. It is high time that you took a decision and suspended the sitting so that you can get in touch with Sharpe Pritchard—it will cost a tidy fortune, I am sure.

I know that it is the first day back after the 10-week holiday, but one would have thought that these well paid parliamentary agents would have produced the Bill on time. As we cannot discuss it, I think that the sitting should be suspended and we should start again another day.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman heard my decision. We shall continue until the matter has been clarified.

Mr. McKay: We now see the importance of what we are discussing. Amendments were introduced on Third Reading in the other place. They were approved without debate and passed to us. Clause 6 is not in the Bill, so it must have been decided that we would rubber-stamp the decision to leave it out. We got hold of a copy of the Bill that does not contain clause 6. It is important to find out whether the sitting should be suspended, but it is more important for every hon. Member to realise what he is voting on.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: There is precious little chance of the House knowing what it is voting on when hon. Members have the wrong copy of the Bill and have not had a word of explanation from the promoter about why the amendment has been tabled or why the clause was there in the first place. Therefore, a proper debate on the matter is impossible. That is why we are moving an amendment to try to defer discussion on the removal of clause 6 until we have had a proper chance to consider the consequences to the Bill.

Mr. McKay: The hon. Gentleman is perfectly correct. Matters get worse as we go on, because we continue to find little wrinkles and caveats. We should opt for a proper debate by deferring the whole matter so that we can get the proper documentation and a proper explanation. Before we take any decision, we must be fully aware of all the facts.

Mr. Harry Barnes: We cannot discuss whether to leave out clause 6 because we do not have that clause in front of us and do not know what is to be left out. If we are obliged to vote on we know not what, we shall have to vote against the measure in order to prevent procedural nonsense. I hope that we are not obliged to decide on a matter that is not in front of us, because that would be acting blindly. Much happens in the House as a result of partial understanding and it is assumed that things are done according to the correct procedures. However, when we sus a matter out and discover the problems, we must correct them so that we do not pass defective legislation.

Mr. Neubert: Perhaps I could clear up some of my own procedural nonsense. I was rightly pulled up and told that we were discussing a motion about whether to consider the Lords amendment. As my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) has said, it was all over in a flash. I thought that we were discussing the motion to defer discussion for six months and that was why I said that I hoped that the motion would be carried. Now I know that the motion is to consider the Lords amendment and I am opposed to that and will vote accordingly.

Mr. Harry Barnes: We should not be asked to vote on the Lords amendment. If we are obliged to do that then we shall go into the No Lobby in order to prevent constitutional and procedural nonsense.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I listened to the first part of the debate and at that stage it was about whether the House should discuss the Lords amendment. I now understand that the Lords amendment is not available and that nobody knows what it is. Does my hon. Friend agree that, if the House proceeds in this way, it will undermine parliamentary democracy because we could be accused of approving something that is secret and about which no hon. Member knows anything?

Mr. Barnes: In fact, the Lords amendment is not missing. I have a copy of it, and it states

We could debate that——

Mr. O'Brien: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I hope that you can guide me. You called my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes), but he does not have the necessary information to enable him to make his speech. It is quite ridiculous that hon. Members should have to address the House when they do not know what they are talking about. That could be rectified by adjourning the debate until the necessary information is available. I appeal to you to ensure that my hon. Friend has the details that he requires to address the House.

9.15 pm

Mr. Skinner: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) is right. If the debate were being televised—as, indeed, it might be—people would think it was another Monty Python sketch. When the amendment came before another place, no one spoke to it. There are 1,100 Members in the other House, but not one opened his mouth to discuss the amendment. They have sent it to the House of Commons to be debated on the first day after the holidays, no doubt thinking that no one would be here.

Here we are, but clause 6 does not even appear in the Bill. Hon. Members are debating clause 6, but no one knows anything about it. It is like that parrot—it is extinct, it is dead, it is late, it was, it is no longer. If we do not keep talking until 10 o'clock, the Tories will bring in their troops. None of them will have listened to the debate, but they will be told by their shop stewards to walk through the Lobby and vote for the motion.

I ask my hon. Friend the Member for Normanton to do his level best to talk about the non-existent clause for as long as possible in the interests of parliamentary democracy. I suppose that this is what they do in the Common Market. It is probably a Common Market system. After all, the debate is about markets——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is this an intervention?

Mr. Skinner: It is a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I ask you to send for Mr. Speaker, the man in the full gear. That will make the sketch complete.

Mr. Harry Barnes rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I call Mr. Bendall.

Mr. Barnes: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was on my feet when the first point of order was raised. I waited for you to respond to the point of order, but you did not. You chose to call another Member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. Gentleman is patient for half a minute, he will realise that, in an indirect manner, I am responding.

Mr. Bendall: Perhaps I can assist the House——

Mr. Neubert: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is this further to the points of order that have already been raised, or is it a speech?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is further to the points of order.

Mr. Bendall: The reason that I did not delve deeply into clause 6 when I opened the debate was that it was not the subject of our debate. However, as the Bill deposited in the Vote Office—which I understand is the Bill that the parliamentary agents were told to deposit—is causing such great concern, I beg to move, That the debate be now adjourned.

Question put and agreed to.

Debate to be resumed on Thursday next.

Financial Services and the Single European Market

Postponed proceeding resumed on the Question, That this House do now adjourn.

9.19 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs (Mr. John Redwood): It was fortunate that I was here during that long interruption in our debate on financial services. It is a pleasure to have time to respond at greater length to the many good points that were made earlier, and to have an opportunity to allow right hon. and hon. Friends who want to intervene to do so.

The hon. Member for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam) asked about compensation. The Government believe that the United Kingdom's compensation arrangements are among the most generous in the world, and are certainly good by comparison with many available on the continent of Europe. I remind the House that the Securities and Investments Board scheme provides 100 per cent. compensation for eligible claims up to £30,000 and 90 per cent. compensation on the following £20,000.

In the case of bank deposits in the United Kingdom, compensation covers three quarters of the first £20,000 of duly protected deposits, and for insurance policy holders, it amounts to 90 per cent. of contract rights, and 100 per cent. if those contracts are compulsory—as is the case with motor insurance. There is no upper limit to those claims. The compensation rate in respect of building societies is 90 per cent. on the first £20,000 on deposit.

The hon. Member for Redcar asked about the arrangements that we intend to make in the wider European market for adequate compensation and consumer protection. Under the present system, companies offering services in the United Kingdom from other countries within the European Community can do so without offering compensation under any approved scheme, and even without full disclosure of the status of the service that they are offering in relation to compensation.

The Government intend to tackle that problem in two phases. First, in the negotiations on the investment services directive and capital adequacy directive, we want written into the rules the provision that compensation arrangements should be clearly disclosed to potential customers in the United Kingdom, so that they will know whether the country from which the service provider comes offers compensation and, if so, the nature of the scheme. That will be a distinct advance in consumer protection compared with the current position.

Secondly, we should like to negotiate with our partners in Europe more common arrangements for minimum levels of compensation across the Community. We have been told by the Commission that it is working on a proposal in this area but obviously that will take time, as there are many obstacles to be overcome. Therefore, those arrangements will not be in place at the same time that the single market in financial services is in place—I trust, by 1 January 1993. However, we shall encourage the Commission to work as fast as possible on this second phase of our policy, because we share the Opposition's concerns and want to tackle the problem first by disclosure and, in due course, by more common arrangements.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Are we to take it from the Minister's remarks that there is resistance from the Commission in that important matter? What is the likely timetable?

Mr. Redwood: I cannot speak for the Commission, although I do not know of any resistance to the general idea. The main problem is that the Commission is naturally giving priority to all the measures that are necessary for the single market in 1992. We are pleased that it is giving considerable priority to the insurance directives, which the House emphasised again tonight, quite rightly, that it wants to see introduced with due speed. I am sure that the Commission will then turn to the question of compensation, and the Government will give it every encouragement and offer whatever support we can in that work.

I was asked whether we offered to consult consumer bodies. Of course we did, and we shall continue to do so. The Consumers Association is regularly consulted and is being most helpful, and the National Consumer Council has also been informed of our work. Some more general questions were raised about the consultations that we are having in respect of the investment services directive and the complementary capital adequacy directive. Again, I invite all those who have not written in to do so, so that we know their views, because the Government wish to proceed with negotiations in Europe based upon the fullest consultation.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): When my hon. Friend is consulting on those directives, can we have an assurance that he will consult practitioners in the industry? For example, is he aware that the unit trust industry is worried that the costs of regulation in the United Kingdom are so high that some unit trusts may decide to set up in Luxembourg where they are lower? In a free market, he runs the risk of over-regulating the United Kingdom market, and encouraging such mobile jobs to go elsewhere, which is of no benefit to this country.

Mr. Redwood: In my earlier remarks I said that we were trying to move on to the next phase of our regulatory progress in this country, when there should be less prescriptive rule-making and expensive, detailed activity by the regulators, and more concentration on compliance. That should answer some of my hon. Friend's questions. As to the desirability of Luxembourg as a place in which to undertake certain types of investment business, I have looked into the question of undertakings for collective investment in transferable securities and into whether it would be more sensible to set them up in Luxembourg rather than in the United Kingdom. The results that I have received show that both on tax grounds and on grounds of regulatory cost, it is by no means clear that Luxembourg is preferable. Several hon. Members raised the question whether we had the right tax regime to encourage and maintain business in this country.

In the case of UCITS, one has to look into both the territory in which the investor is placed and the territory in which the business is conducted. One has to draw up a complicated matrix for different tax arrangements, affecting both the provider of the investment product and its consumer. That matrix shows that in many cases it can be better to set them up in the United Kingdom than in Luxembourg.

Those hon. Members who are worried about any tax implication for British business should of course draw it to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Cash: I should be grateful if the Minister could comment on the position of the independent financial advisers. I should declare an interest, because I have followed their concerns very closely over a period, and indeed was concerned with them when I was on the Committee considering the Financial Services Bill 1986. About 20 million consumers receive advice from the independent financial advisers. It worries us, both in respect of capital adequacy and in relation to over-regulation, that they could be squeezed out as a result of some of the directives that have been coming from Europe. I may have an opportunity to elaborate on this later. May we have an assurance that the Minister has this —I am sure he has—very much in mind and that he will be looking after them? After all, they represent a significant part of the market in this country.

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is quite right. The independent financial adviser is an important intermediary in the British marketplace. A lively market for independent financial advice is something that we wish to preserve and strengthen wherever possible.

The main question relates to the negotiation of the capital adequacy directive. It has been largely a British initiative, which has seen the introduction of different levels of capital requirement related to the risks that businesses are running. We thought that it was quite wrong to have a single passport requirement, with a large sum of money, such as 500,000 ecu. That would be impractical for the independent financial advisers.

We are also keen to ensure that independent financial advisers who so wish can have access to the passport under the investment services directive and can carry out their business in other member states. That requires the introduction of three other levels. We have introduced a system whereby businesses that provide only investment advice and that do not handle clients' moneys are exempted from any capital requirement. Another category, supplying advice and perhaps ensuring that deals are executed on behalf of clients, is subject to a requirement of 50,000 ecu, and businesses that also handle client moneys but that do not deal on their own account are subject to a capital requirement of 100,000 ecu.

That is a huge improvement on the starting position of those negotiations, but the British Government are not yet satisfied. We wish to ensure that there are further advances. We are still arguing over how many people should be subject to the minimum 50,000 ecu capital requirement and we still think that too many are caught. We are discussing details of the calculation of the capital requirement for more sophisticated businesses, particularly the illiquid asset calculation, which is too onerous in the current directive. In that connection, the Commission may agree with us and I look forward to reporting progress in due course to the House on that subject.

The hon. Member for Redcar posed a particular problem over insurance provision involving Switzerland, Italy and Spain, and she hoped that EC action might solve it. Unfortunately, by including Switzerland in her case that would be impossible because the Swiss are not governed by Community rules. Had she chosen three Community countries, that would have been the kind of issue that we would consider as we developed the directive programme covering all types of financial business.

Several hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), asked about barriers to takeovers. They are right that the Government have been exercised by the relative difficulty that many UK companies find in making takeovers on the continent of Europe compared with the relative ease with which European companies can make takeovers here. Progress is being made. The British Government have raised the issue with the Commission, which has responded by agreeing that it is a problem and introducing a work programme to attack some of the legal obstacles through directive proposals, for example in the 13th directive on company law.

Many hon. Members will agree with the Government that the obstacles are often fundamental and more cultural than legal. Often the law codes of the countries concerned permit companies to operate in one of many ways and they do not have to operate as they do. This weekend I was heartened to see in the newspapers comments that attitudes in Germany are changing as a result of the general discussion on barriers to takeovers. Many people in Frankfurt and, indeed, in Paris, where changes are more rapid, are coming to see the force of an open market to challenge existing management and to provide a more active marketplace in which ownership of companies can change hands as well as secondary shares in more limited packages.

We are making progress in the general argument and in tackling the cultural barriers, which are every bit as important as, if not more important than, the legal barriers that we have already identified with the Commission and that may in due course be tackled in some of the directives that we are considering.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) and many other hon. Members agreed with the Government's position that progress on insurance is too slow. He would also agree that speed is picking up a little. The British Government intend to help that along its way. I reassure him that if the opposition comes only from Belgium and Germany—they have been opposing some of these measures—they do not constitute a blocking minority in the Community, so progress can still be made. We must ensure that a blocking minority does not build up against the principle of freedom of provision in insurance. The British Government's strategy is designed to achieve greater unanimity among member states in favour of the proposal, and to prevent a blocking minority against the proposal.

Ms. Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): In the absence of the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) and as I listened to his speech, may I say that he is well aware that two countries do not make a blocking minority in the EC? He was worried, as are we, about the structural differences that are built into the insurance industry. It is the structure, particularly between the banks in Germany and France, which makes it difficult for our insurance industry to compete in what in directive terms may look like an open market, but which in practice is backdoor protectionism. That anxiety was voiced by hon. Members on both sides of the House. It would be useful if the Minister could explain how cultural differences that are slowly waning will prevent our insurance industry from having a fair and open competitive market in Europe in the next couple of years.

Mr. Redwood: That is not the concern that I was addressing. However, I have heard the hon. Lady's point. I believe that our insurance companies in many areas have superior products at extremely attractive prices. That will come out within the single market once there is a legal framework that entitles them to work on a services or a branch basis under the necessary directives. It is with that in mind that the House agrees that we should make due speed in negotiating the directives to give them that chance.

The hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) was worried about the dangers of concentration, particularly in accountancy. The purpose of our competition regime is to prevent damaging or dangerous concentrations. The mergers and competition regime applies to accountancy just as it applies to anything else. Each case is looked at on its merits and the Director General of Fair Trading offers advice to the Secretary of State accordingly.

The hon. Member for Rotherham claimed that fraud is widespread. He cast aspersions on practically the entire City and much of the corporate sector. I say to him and other hon. Members who make such allegations that if they bring us the evidence in these cases, I promise that they will be investigated and, if necessary, brought to court. However, general allegations are far from helpful. They put British business in a bad light when viewed by others from abroad, and, if nothing can follow because there is no evidence, everybody is left feeling dissatisfied that the allegation has been made but there has been no follow-through.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Sir R. McCrindle) made an extremely important contribution. He asked about taxation.

Mr. Dalyell: In the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham, (Mr. Crowther) I should say that he was a member of the Select Committee. I was not a member of that Committee but I understand that it looked at the matter in some depth. Are the Government saying that the Select Committee was ill-informed?

Mr. Redwood: I have nothing to add to what I have already said. If there is evidence of fraud, we need it because we shall pursue it vigorously. If there is no evidence, it is a silly allegation.

I should like to remind my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar that the changes in stamp duty and the taxation of options and futures introduced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in his Budget are welcomed in the City of London because they will help the competitiveness of the City no end. They are examples of the way in which the Government will listen carefully to those who make out a case that our competitiveness is being damaged by our taxation regime and will respond if the Treasury thinks that it is right to do so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar also mentioned the illiquid assets test. I promise the House that we shall pursue that adequately. In our consultation document, we set out a number of areas in which we think that illiquid assets are too stringently defined. We started with a capital adequacy directive that may have required City of London firms to increase their capital by around 40 per cent. or more. As a result of the major changes that have come about largely at the Government's insistence, the capital requirement may be 10 per cent. or so above the current levels. We believe that the current levels are about right. We think that they are safe and prudent and allow people to make some return on their money. If we can get the right result of the illiquid assets test, we may be nearly there on the capital requirement that we seek.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend agree that the question of capital adequacy should be weighed against the question of competence? After all, people can come by money in all sorts of ways, which enable them to support the requirements laid down by law but not to deliver the goods to the customer. Surely it is important—I tried to suggest this with a fated amendment to the Financial Services Bill—that competence is a requirement as well.

Mr. Redwood: Part of our system relies upon assessing the fitness of people to run businesses and, in some cases, to assess their solvency. These are the basic principles needed to run a successful regulatory system.

Most of the other hon. Members made points——

Ms. Mowlam rose——

Mr. Redwood: I should like to leave time for other contributors. Two other hon. Members would like to speak and I think that I should press on.

Most of the other contributors to the debate reiterated points that had been made by others. My hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) was keen to ensure that reciprocity does not damage us. The Government agree with that. He was worried about the position of off-market trading. The Government recognise that difficulty and will strive to protect our interests on that important issue, which will be one of the difficult negotiating points in the next phase of the negotiations on the directive.

The hon. Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) thought that we needed statutory regulation rather than self-regulation. That misconception is shared by some other hon. Members. We have a system, established under statute, of professional regulation backed by practitioners who are involved in the process of regulation. It is not a pure system of self-regulation; it is professional regulation with practitioner involvement to keep people's feet on the ground.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the greatest problems facing the financial services sector is the quality of auditing? Professional regulation does not seem adequate to stop auditors from signing rather duff dockets.

Mr. Redwood: The accountancy profession will shortly come under new arrangements, and the Department will be considering carefully those seeking recognition under the legislation because we are keen to ensure the highest standards of audit. However, I should not wish to associate myself with the attacks made by some Opposition Members on standards of auditing and the way in which the profession is conducted because much of the work that it does is first class and should be recognised as such.

Our system, which is rather similar in many ways to the Securities and Exchange Commission and its SROs, is based on the Securities and Investments Board, established under statute and backed by self-regulatory organisations—professional regulation with practitioners to keep people's feet on the ground. We wish to strengthen those elements because we believe that we need rather more compliance and detection work and rather less rule-making.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): The financial services industry has a doughty champion in my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, who has had the good fortune of an extended opportunity to answer in some depth the important debate that we have had today.

I am pleased that we have been able to continue this debate and to allow further contributions, because it allows Parliament to be seen to be scrutinising carefully the contents of an important report from a Select Committee and to be taking the Government reasonably to task on their policies and views.

Everyone acknowledges that the financial services industry is vital to our economy and that it will be so in the ensuing decade. It accounts for some £7·7 billion of our invisible trade surplus, it employs more than 1 million people and an enormous proportion of our gross national product, some 10 per cent., is generated by it. In recent years it has had to adapt to enormous changes in the marketplace, perhaps above all in technology and in the regime of national and supranational control. Great accolades should be given to British financial services—the banking and investment industries—for the way in which they have responded to these challenges, have surfaced with profit and appear well set to weather the wind of competition in the next few years.

The Select Committee report, albeit lengthy and strewn with many recommendations, was an important study for it to undertake, and I should like to see it be a more permanent feature of the landscape rather than a one-off investigation. I have long felt that our parliamentary processes for scrutinising and considering Government policy on these matters are woefully inadequate. The American system of a congressional banking committee, which allows for scrutiny and a legislative role, is an excellent model, but, because of the demarcation of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee and the Trade and Industry Select Committee, the former scrutinising banking and the latter financial services, we have never had the proper vehicle for considering this important aspect of our economy.

I urge my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren) to consider the possibility of establishing a Sub-Committee of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry whose remit would be to consider and report on the financial services and banking industry throughout the year.

As I said earlier, I believe that there should be a more formalised approach to the consideration of annual reports—particularly those of bodies such as the Securities and Investments Board. We set those bodies up under the Financial Services Act. They have enormously important powers of investigation, prosecution and restitution and it is absolutely right that they should be accountable to the House as well as to the Government of the day. Not only are Government moneys invested in bodies such as the SIB; the integrity of the City as a fair market for investment services is at stake. I believe that the bodies themselves would not wish to be the only judges of their policies and would welcome the opportunity to explain themselves, at least annually, to a Select Committee of the House.

I am pleased to note that one of the Committee's recommendations was that we should become a full member of the exchange rate mechanism. That was a timely recommendation, speedily acted on by the Government. I tabled the original early-day motion calling for immediate membership of the ERM—some 12 years ago, believe it or not—which drew the support of signatories such as the present Chief Whip and a large number of members of the Cabinet, so I was delighted when the event took place, albeit not before time.

I hope that, now that the light has been seen, a constructive attitude will be taken to the much more important negotiations that will take place at the December conference on economic and monetary union. We should not take entrenched views on the commonality of the medium of exchange. No one really minds what colour a bank note is or what faces or names are inscribed on it. The important thing about a bank note is that it should be worth something and that it should maintain its value; its worth should not dive one day and soar the next. It is also important that one should not have to pay an extortionate rate of interest if one wants to borrow to buy a business or a house.

Most people who have adjusted to pounds and pence rather than pounds, shillings and pence will see that they have a distinct self-interest—as our country will see it has a national interest—in having a secure and valuable medium of exchange. For the industries that we are debating, a commonality of medium of exchange would be far preferable to a number of different media of exchange operating within the single market.

Let me give an example. Part of the debate about the entrenched protective position of the German insurance industry has to do with the rules that apply to the way in which assets are held in Germany. From the German perspective, it has not only been necessary but has been a good and right financial judgement that a large part of the assets should be held in deutschmark-denominated liquid currencies as well as in equity currencies. That is because not only the companies concerned but the money-denominated assets held have maintained a very strong value. One can understand why German insurance companies should be loth to accept an outside directive that tells them that they must hold a higher proportion of their assets in the currency-denominated assets of other countries, which may be more vulnerable. With the more rigid system that the ERM provides, or if we moved to a common currency system—the common pound or the common ecu—that problem would disappear because we would have one medium of exchange. That would make the operation of the single market a good deal easier.

Mr. Cash: My hon. Friend should cast his mind back to the middle ages or the 16th century, or perhaps to the Spanish inflation problems of the 17th century or to the gold standard and the problems of the 1920s, as well as considering the current situation. It is only too apparent that it does not matter what the currency is. What matters is the relative strength of the economy, which in turn is the determining factor in the strength of an individual currency. In other words, the strength of an economy, its competitiveness, how much one is saving, the manner in which productivity is operated and the extent to which unit labour costs are involved reflect the genuine strength of an economy. It does not matter a fig whether one refers to an ecu, a pound or a lire.

Mr. Nelson: I concur with my hon. Friend and I do not detract from his analysis. However, the currency that is commonly used in the United Kingdom is used in regions that have different economic performances, just as we live within a European Community with regions with different economic performance. My hon. Friend is right to state that there is a correlation between economic performance and the actual value and the exchange rate value of one's currency over a period of time.

However, we are in no position to be vainglorious. It is not as if the performance of our economy has been outstanding in comparison with other European countries. Why must business men and constituents in my area pay nearly double the rates of interest to be found in other ecu currencies? Why do we have nearly double the rate of inflation of some other European countries? It is not as if we are in an enormously strong position and are worried that somehow the exchange value of the pound will be diluted by joining the other currencies. Far from it. We are the supplicants. We need the disciplines and higher standards of prudential control which I believe membership will bring about. It is extraordinary for some elements of my party and others abroad to suggest that we need tighter financial control and greater prudential requirements and then to refuse to ally us to the mechanisms to enforce that discipline.

With regard to takeovers, I was interested in the Select Committee's recommendations on the Commission's report, which I hope will be published. I should like my hon. Friend the Parliamentary-Under Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs to consider two aspects. The first relates to the takeovers directive which states that a key feature of that directive shall be the fundamental principle that shareholders should be treated equally.

I have always been slightly mystified by that statement as a principal objective of the takeovers directive. My view, as I have explained previously, is that the fundamental principle must be the right and ability of shareholders first and foremost to decide how to dispose of their assets. There must always be compelling reasons if that right is to be taken away from them. That is not a matter of equality between classes of shareholders; it is a right which attaches to all shareholders.

My second point relates to a directive on disclosure requirements. The threshold at which disclosures have to be announced on a European level is 10 per cent., while it is 5 per cent. in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Redwood: No, it is 3 per cent.

Mr. Nelson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for correcting me.

I assume that that position will continue and we shall continue to operate a stricter and more open system of disclosure. However, if we are playing on a level playing field and we are not giving other companies an undue right to be exempted from takeovers and for minority stakes to be built up elsewhere in the European Community when they are a matter of disclosure here, I hope that we shall press for some changes in that regard.

I want to make several points about the single passport which is the ability to obtain authorisation as a bank or investment company in one European country and to offer those services throughout the Community. We must remember that our interests involve investor protection. We are not about trying to grease the wheels of the financial services industry. We are here principally to protect and enhance the rights of investors and companies to raise money. In doing that we must consider the best financial deal on the market. We want to see competition in the banking and financial services industry and the best competition need not necessarily come from within the European Community. It might come from Japanese or American companies.

Therefore, there is the matter of extending the passport to countries such as Japan and the United States. I should not like to feel that, in creating the single market, we were erecting barriers against Japanese or United States financial services and banking industries. Some right hon. and hon. Members may say, "That is not necessary, because they are in a strong competitive situation anyway." However, we can tie some access to the European single market with reciprocity, which is sorely needed and would overcome criticisms that we are just creating a customs union, a tariff barrier and a preference for companies within the European Community.

I was struck by what the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam) said about consumer interests. As far as I am aware there is no specific directive on consumer interests. As I understood her speech, in addition to implementing the directives and arriving at 1993, she would like a greater international and public awareness of their protections, their opportunities and the safeguards that are being extended to them. I wholeheartedly agree with that. The hon. Lady's intentions were sound, but whether they should be the subject of a recommendation or a directive, I know not. The principal responsibility should rest with self-regulatory organisations. After all, it is in their interests to promote use of the markets of which their members are subscribers.

Ms. Mowlam: A consumers directive has been knocking around the Commission for some time. Its initial stages of negotiations will start in December 1991. The point I was making is that that means that it will not be in place when the other directives on investment services, capital adequacy and secondary banking are implemented in 1993. They are not being given the same importance, weight and balance as the other directives that we discussed earlier.

Mr. Nelson: I am obliged to the hon. Lady. Nevertheless, I have been supporting her comments and she might agree with what I say.

There are two other small points. One is about the directive on payment systems. I believe that there is a recommendation rather than a directive on payment systems. I should like to see that upgraded to a directive. Whether we like it or not, the credit card industry is a medium of exchange and payment which is here to stay. Credit card fraud is a multi-million pound business with professional crime involved, people being ripped off on a massive scale, and numerous new entrants to the market coming forward to tie loyalty to their business by issuing a card. We must regard much more seriously credit card fraud and professional operators. The Government should look much more carefully at that matter.

The other point relates to the winding-up directive. Although it may seem a little negative to consider such matters, I believe that winding up has an equally important part to play in the protection of investors as sponsoring the burgeoning of new industries. I should like to feel that winding up was instigated at the appropriate moments, that there were common rules and that it was given the importance that should be attached to it.

The Securities and Investments Board, in its role in the financial services industry in this country, deserves a word of support and commendation. Its chairman and members have worked extremely hard to provide orderly markets and communications with the SROs which they scrutinise. It is interesting that, under section 105 of the Financial Services Act relating to investigation powers, in the years since the Act has been in operation there have been 40 investigations and action has been taken in 21 cases by the self-regulatory organisation or by winding up. In five cases there has been restitution and in eight cases there have been criminal prosecutions on matters of fraud or conduct of business. In addition, there have been 330 cases of alleged unauthorised operation of businesses which can amount to a criminal offence. Fifty-seven of those have been resolved. There have been eight prosecutions and two civil injunctions, and 27 cases have been withdrawn. Many other cases have been resolved.

Many hon. Members who have called for the sweeping away of the system set up under the Financial Services Act and its narrowing down into a smaller number of bodies should respect the fact that a great deal of hard work has been done day by day to identify and follow up cases of alleged fraud.

Let those who call for the sweeping away or amalgamation of self-regulatory organisations remember that, if that were to happen, there would be a real danger of our moving towards even more centralist control. After all, if the SIB were to absorb all the self-regulating organisations we would end up to something more akin to a Securities and Exchange Commission.

For all those reasons, I believe that the existing structure set up under the Financial Services Act 1976, uncomfortable as it may have been in its inception, has worked to the advantage of the City and will continue to work to the advantage of our economy.

I welcome the response of the Government today and the contribution that the report of the Select Committee has made, but it must not end here; the scrutiny must continue.

9.59 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I think that I must be very brief—I think it is time for me to sit down.

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

PROCEDURE

Motion made,

That this House agrees with the recommendations contained in the First Report of the Select Committee on Procedure of this Session (House of Commons Paper No. 379).—[Mr. Wood.]

Hon. Members: Object.

QUESTIONS TO MEMBERS, ETC.

Motion made,

That with effect from the beginning of the next Session of Parliament Standing Order No. 17 (Questions to Members) and Standing Order No. 18 (Notices of motions, amendments and questions) be repealed and the following Standing Orders be made—

Time for taking questions

(1)—Questions shall be taken on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, after private business has been disposed of.

(2) No question shall be taken after half-past three o'clock, except questions which have not appeared on the paper but which are in Mr. Speaker's opinion of an urgent character and relate either to matters of public importance or to the arrangement of business.

(3) Any questions tabled for written answer on a day on which the House does not sit by reason of the continuance of a previous sitting shall be deemed to be questions for written answer on the next sitting day and shall appear on the Order Paper for that day.

Notices of questions, motions and amendments

(2) A notice of a question, or of an amendment to a motion standing on the Order Paper for which no day has been fixed or of the addition of a name in support of such a motion or amendment, which is given after half-past ten o'clock in the evening shall be treated for all purposes as if it were a notice handed in after the rising of the House.

(3) A Member shall indicate on the notice of any question whether it is for oral, written or priority written answer.

(4) Where a Member has indicated that a question is for priority written answer the Minister shall cause an answer to be given to the Member on the date for which notice has been given, provided that the requirement of notice shall be the same for such questions as that prescribed in this order for questions for oral answer.

(5) Notice of a question for oral answer may not be given on a day earlier than ten sitting days before the day for answer, provided that, where that earliest day would otherwise fall on a Friday, the earliest day on which such notice may be given will instead be the previous sitting day.

(6) Notice of any question for oral answer must appear at latest on the notice paper circulated two days (excluding Saturday and Sunday) before that on which an answer is desired.

(7) When it is proposed that the House shall adjourn for a period of less than four days, any day during that period (other than a Saturday or Sunday) shall be counted as a sitting day for the purpose of calculating the period in paragraph (5) of this order.

(8) When notice shall have been given of a Motion for the adjournment of the House for more than three days Mr. Speaker may cause to have printed and circulated with the Vote a memorandum superseding the provisions of paragraphs (5) and (6) of this order and instead setting out the earliest day on which notice of questions for oral answer may be given for each of the first ten sitting days after that adjournment, provided that each such day shall as far as practicable fall on the same day of the week as that on which the question is to be answered and shall not be fewer than fourteen days before the day for answer; and also setting out the latest day for notice of questions for oral answer on each of the first two sitting days following that adjournment provided that each such day shall not be fewer than two days (excluding Saturday and Sunday) before the day for answer. —[Mr. Wood.]

Hon. Members: Object.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Ordered,

That Mr. Peter Lilley be discharged from the Committee of Public Accounts and Mr. Francis Maude be added to the Committee.—[Mr. Wood.]

Haemophiliacs (Aids)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Wood.]

10 pm

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): I cannot promise to be as brief as my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash). I should like to thank Mr. Speaker for exercising his discretion so that that we can have a wide debate rather than a narrow one this evening.

As the House will be aware, we have had a number of Adjournment debates on the vexed subject of compensation for those haemophiliacs who have contracted the AIDS virus. The House may ask why we are having yet another. There are two reasons. First, as my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) has said, this problem will not go away. Secondly, developments during the summer recess have underlined the need for yet another debate.

I should like to remind my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister who is to reply to the debate of the words of Boswell in 1773:

> "A lawyer has no business with the justice or injustice of the cause he undertakes. The justice or injustice of the cause is to be decided by the judge."

Certainly Mr. Justice Ognall has expressed his views clearly as to what should happen in this case. I believe that my right hon. and learned Friend should look once again at the judge's recommendation in that case.

I should like to remind the House of the sequence of events that have led to this problem. In 1974, the Medical Research Council, concerned at the possible spread of hepatitis from infected blood recommended that the United Kingdom should become self-sufficient in blood products. In 1975, the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), as Minister for Health, promised that we would become self-sufficient in two to three years. It is a chilling indictment of what happened in the 1970s that, if that promise had been met, some of the 1,200 individuals who became infected with the HIV virus would not have been infected. Individuals who have died might otherwise have lived.

If we look at the history of the warnings given, we learn that the first death of a haemophiliac infected by AIDS took place in Florida in January 1982. In July 1982, Dr. Bruce Evatt, the director of disease control in Atlanta, published his first warning. In 1983, there was a further warning in The Lancet. In April 1985, national health service heat-treated factor 8 became available, 10 years after the pledge given by the right hon. Member for Devonport.

The result of all that was a human tragedy. Some 1,215 haemophiliacs—one in four—became infected with the HIV virus; 210 have developed full-blown AIDS, of whom 150 have died. One of the greatest tragedies of all is that two dozen wives and girl friends have been infected by individuals who did not know that they had the HIV virus.

Those statistics cannot convey one iota of the depth of the human problems involved. It is a great irony that factor 8, which was designed to improve the quality of life for haemophiliacs, has granted many a suspended sentence of death. Many haemophiliacs have battled to overcome the consequences and difficulties of their illness. Some hon. Members will have seen that, only three weeks ago, Dr. John Herdman, a relative of one of my constituents, with a PhD in physics, was snatched away at the tender age of 28. No one could fail to be moved by the description in The Sunday Times stating that three years ago he was an active young man who went swimming every day. Now, because of the medical difficulties, he has died, and we have lost a brilliant life.

When I was a university lecturer, one of my most brilliant students was a haemophiliac. Throughout the course, he could not attend one lecture because he lived in Dunoon and could not make the boat and train journey to Glasgow. Despite the fact that he did not attend one lecture and had only two tutorials a term, he came second out of 200. That said a lot for his determination; and it may also have said a little about the quality of the lectures he did not attend and something about the impact of the distractions of the students union on academic performance.

We are faced with the problem of a man seeing his brother die and not being able to say, "There but for the grace of God go I," but knowing that his brother's physical suffering is a dress rehearsal for his own illness and death in perhaps weeks, perhaps months. We face the problem of a widow who is dependent on her sons for financial support, knows that they are both HIV-positive and realises that she will have to attend both their funerals and her financial support will disappear.

It involves the problems of a sister—haemophilia is one of the strange, unique diseases carried by ladies but directly affecting only men—who sees her brother suffer and says, as one has said, that she is witnessing the destruction of all the men of her generation in her family. Haemophiliacs must attend the funerals of victims, not knowing whose funeral will be next. We all attend family funerals, but for some haemophiliacs, doing so has become a way of life, if one can talk about a way of life under such circumstances.

AIDS is a particularly vicious disease, and the physical pain is only part of the problem. The difficulty facing its victims is not merely physical because, in the public mind, AIDS is associated with sexual promiscuity and drug addiction. It is a disease whose mysteries are clouded in prejudice throughout society; that has compounded the problems facing its blameless victims.

Even in Britain, famed as a tolerant and fair-minded society, the very word AIDS is likely to generate prejudice in at least some minds. That has compounded the problems of the father who says that he cannot accept that his son has died of AIDS. It has compounded the problem of the victim who, having told his employer that he has AIDS, loses his job. It has compounded the problem because the friendships enjoyed by the victims have all too often turned out to be skin deep. When people mention that they have AIDS, their friends tend to move away rather than come closer, as they should do.

The victims of the disease do not seek compensation for themselves but for their families. The problem was summed up for me in a few short sentences: "The victim has had to give up work. He knows that he is dying. He only wants peace of mind. He wants to know that his family will be all right." What the victims seek is to die with dignity, secure in the knowledge that their relatives will be cared for and their wives and children will not face a lifetime of penury and penny pinching. Perhaps they want that last family holiday together.

Physical hardship can be alleviated by medicine, but peace of mind cannot be guaranteed by someone's saying, "Let us have a court case to be determined next March, April or June." If we wait for a court case to be determined then, a number of the victims will not be around to see the verdict. Posthumous justice will not grant them peace of mind; it may help their relatives, but it will not help them.

The full majesty of the law is clearly suitable for the vast majority of cases, but I do not believe that it is always a happy vehicle for cases in which speed is of the essence. I do not think that we are in a happy position when litigants are legally aided and the defendant—the Crown—is also relying on the taxpayer to pay the costs. A certain amount of public money will be spent, and it will not bring the law into good repute. I ask my right hon. and learned Friend to examine the matter again.

In 1964, my right hon. and learned Friend and I fought our first general election. The slogan under which we fought was "Prosperity with a Purpose". The reason why Lord Home chose that as a slogan was that he was not following a course of sheer naked materialism, but rather underlining the simple, basic fact that he sought to create greater prosperity—not as an end in itself, but as a means to a far nobler end: the relief of hardship in our society.

There is no conflict between a belief in the social market economy and a social conscience; indeed, only if we have a social market economy can we afford a social conscience. I believe that the challenge to the Secretary of State is a simple one, and I appeal to him as a practical man to come to the House and re-examine the issue.

We are told that it would create a precedent if we paid compensation on a larger scale to the haemophiliacs tomorrow or next week; but are we really being asked to say that, if a further example of this were to hit us, no compensation would be paid? Would we say to another group in our society that they must go to the law? Of course not. I do not believe that the collective conscience of the nation would allow any future Government to walk down the other side of the road like a Pharisee.

Clearly the Secretary of State has been advised that he can satisfy the courts of the land, but I ask him to consider making a short statement to the House. I suggest that the statement should read as follows. He should say that this is an inherited problem, caused by decisions made long before he became Secretary of State or before the Government were returned in 1979; that, as Secretary of State, he cannot be held responsible for decisions made in 1976 and 1977. He should say that the Government provided the resources to permit the heat treatment of blood products so that a similar disaster would never befall the nation. However, I would also like him to say that he will reconsider his decision—reiterated today—about the wisdom of fighting the case through the courts.

I would also like the Secretary of State to show a willingness to enter into discussions with representatives of the Haemophilia Society. The chairman of that society is a constituent of mine who is a respected vicar, and I believe that any agreement that he reached would be honoured by the vast bulk of his members.

Finally, I should like the Secretary of State to say whether he is willing to reconsider whether £20,000 should be the limit for individual compensation. Is that an adequate figure to compensate for the physical difficulties, the emotional traumas, the financial suffering and the loss of life involvd in this case? I fear that if there is no early solution to this problem many people will raise the issue time and time again. The last time I spoke in an Adjournment debate the only Members present were waiting for a lift to Hampstead; the fact that there are several hon. Members here tonight shows that there is disquiet, and I hope that the Minister——

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Hear, hear.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): My hon. Friend will be aware that many hon. Members who are not here tonight warmly support what he has said and want further action from the Government.

Mr. Marshall: I thank my hon. Friend for that short, pertinent and welcome observation, and I thank the hon. Member—I shall not be so indiscreet as to mention his name—who said, "Hear, hear," from a sedentary position.

I thank the House for the way in which this debate has been received.

10.15 pm

Mr. Hugo Summerson (Walthamstow) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Does the hon. Gentleman have the consent of the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) and of the Minister?

Hon. Members: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Summerson: I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) and the Minister for giving me one minute in which to speak.

I cannot understand the Government's obduracy over this matter. I can understand the legal frame of mind that shrinks from anything that implies liability, but the lawyers who fear liability should turn their minds to finding a way that would permit payments without imputing liability. If the will exists, the words will be found.

I have at least one HIV-infected haemophiliac in my constituency. His story wrings the heart. He and the others are suffering grievously through no fault of their own. They need a generous and just sum to enable them to live out the rest of their lives in some comfort and dignity. I should like to add my voice to that of my hon. Friend and appeal to Ministers—including my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State—to take whatever action is necessary to ensure that that comes about.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) has used the opportunity of this first Adjournment debate of the autumn term to draw attention to an issue of undoubted public concern. I shall begin by trying to sketch out what I see as the common ground between him, the Haemophilia Society and Ministers. I am struck by the extent of the common ground between us on this subject.

First, it is clearly common ground that this story represents a terrible human tragedy, made more poignant by the fact that its cause was that people came to the NHS to receive treatment intended to enhance their lives and it ended up shortening them. There is sometimes a tendency for Ministers to reply to debates of this sort by citing statistics and legalistic arguments, and I shall have something to say about the Government's legal position in a few moments, but I begin by reminding the House of the facts.

We are talking about 1,200 men and women who sought care from the NHS and received a lethal dose. We are talking about people who relied on the expertise of health professionals and—although they could not have known this at the time—found it wanting. We are talking about 1,200 families of people who were already sick and who looked to the NHS for hope and found it cruelly snuffed out.

Of course my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State and I feel a profound sympathy for the people caught up in this tragedy. He and I want to help, and of course we both feel these basic human emotions. However, those emotions do not add up to a policy.

As I have discovered in the last six months, it is part of the lot of a Health Minister to witness a wide variety of human devastation. If my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South doubts that, I invite him to come with me on some of my visits to national health service installations, where I see people whose lives have been permanently scarred by spinal injuries or mental handicap that may have been caused at the moment of birth. A visit to the patients in any children's hospital is also enlightening. One learns quickly that a Health Minister cannot right all wrongs, because that object is not achievable. All that we can do is to offer the best health care within the resources that are available.

My hon. Friend asked us to look again at the judge's statement on which he placed some weight. Much of what Mr. Justice Ognall said in that statement gives rise to no disagreement from the Government. He said:

"The plight of the plaintiffs—or many of them—is a special one:

(a) All of them suffer from or live in the shadow of a fatal condition for which there is presently no known cure."

That is obviously true. The judge said:

"Many have already died, and in the nature of things many more will die without knowing the outcome of this litigation. It seems to me, at least, that this factor should be treated as cardinally important."

As I shall show, the Government have already acted on that understanding. The judge said:

"It is common ground that all plaintiffs are entirely blameless . . . I believe that the legal profession has a duty to do its best to see that the legal system does not become a scapegoat in the eyes of the public for what I fear may be perceived as the unjust and inhumane denial of any significant measure of compensation to the plaintiffs. 'The law must take its course' is not an attractive principle in the context of this case."

I agree with all those quotations. The judge's argument is based on the proposition that the Government have a moral obligation to the victims in this case. The Government accept that moral obligation and that is why funds have been made available, first in 1987 and again last year, to the Macfarlane Trust. Those funds were made available well ahead of this litigation and made possible a minimum payment of £20,000 to each person affected and assistance to families in need. We gave an undertaking, repeated many times, that the Government will review that assistance to ensure that it is adequate to meet the case. The total already amounts to £34 million.

Mr. John Marshall: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Dorrell: Only once.

Mr. Marshall: I know that my hon. Friend will give way only once. Will he underline his statement that the Government are willing to reconsider the amount of assistance? That is very important.

Mr. Dorrell: As I have already said, the Government have repeatedly said that they will keep under constant review the payments made to the Macfarlane Trust and the fund attached to it to ensure that they match the case. Our track record demonstrates that in practice we have done that.

The judge argued that there is a moral obligation and, outside the context of their case, the plaintiffs also argue that case. The Government accept that obligation and acted on it well in advance of the litigation, and that reflects the sense of urgency that has been argued in support of the case. Once again, that argument gives rise to no disagreement. The disagreement between the parties is not over the principle of moral obligation, because all are agreed on that. Apart from the court case, the disagreement is over the level of compensation that will discharge the moral obligation.

We must acknowledge that here we are in difficult country and that legal practice simply does not help. The courts can help us with the amount of compensation that is payable in cases where a person is proved to have been negligent. In this case, the Government and all the defendants in the action deny negligence and we are left with the question about the level of compensation that will discharge the moral obligation.

That raises the more fundamental question—and one that is not capable of being settled by a law court: What is the value of life? The court asks not that question, but what is the amount of compensation necessary to put a plaintiff in the position in which he would have been before the damage caused by negligence. That is not the question in this case and it is not relevant when considering a moral obligation. The only disagreement is the level of payments necessary to discharge that moral obligation—a matter that, in the nature of things, can be only a matter of judgment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South referred to the thalidomide case. That was a different case, because the payments were made in settlement of a negligence action. They were explicitly and closely linked to the scale of damages payable where negligence is proved. That would not be right in this case, because it is the defendant's view that there was no negligence. Against that background, it would be wrong to link payments made in discharge of a moral obligation to payments that would have been made in the event of a successful negligence action.

It is also argued that there should be no-fault compensation. People say, "Why inquire about fault? There is an injured party, so why not just pay damages?" That raises two points. First, even those who support the principle of no-fault compensation do not support the suggestion that, in the event of compensation being paid in cases where no fault is proved, that compensation should reflect the damages that would have been paid if negligence were proved. No one has argued that that would be the proper quantum for damages. Secondly, the whole issue of no-fault compensation was extensively examined by a royal commission—the Pearson committee in 1978—and rejected. Its advice has been accepted by Governments of both parties.

I strongly believe that this is a sad case. The moral obligation exists and has been acknowledged by the Government. The argument is not one of principle against a moral obligation. However, there remains another disagreement, and it is the subject of the action before Mr. Justice Ognall. Some 1,000 victims and their families are suing the Government and other defendants for negligence. They are perfectly entitled to do so, and I make no complaint about it.

It would be unwise to comment on the detail of the action. However, I wish to comment in general terms about why I am in no doubt that the action should be resisted. As I have already stressed, it is based not on a moral responsibility—that is not in dispute—but on alleged negligence by the Department of Health, the national health service and others. That is a quite different proposition. Each case is individual and the Government cannot simply admit negligence where they believe that none exists.

I have studied the background. I am not a lawyer, but as a layman I do not believe that, in common sense, the negligence claim stands up, not least because it has not been shown what more attractive alternative action was available at the time. What more attractive alternative decision would have been sensible on the basis of the evidence then available? When reviewing the papers, time and again I asked myself whether, on the information available at the time, I would have acted differently. Time and again, I could only answer, "No." Ultimately, it is for the court to decide whether there has been a case of negligence. If the individual plaintiffs believe that negligence exists, it is not for a politician to interfere. However, I have seen no evidence of that and therefore I believe that it is right to resist the claim of negligence, while acknowledging the moral obligation—as we do.

I see a sad story of people trying to help and, unwittingly, making matters worse. I see clearly a case in which the Government have tried to discharge—and, indeed, have discharged—a moral obligation to act. I cannot accept that that moral obligation is affected by an independent belief by some victims that they have a claim in negligence.

HEALTH

Nurses' Pay

1. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he last met representatives of the Royal College of Nursing to discuss nurses' pay.

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I last met representatives of the Royal College of Nursing formally on 1 February when I informed them of the Government's decision on the 1990 review body reports.

Mr. Jones: Does the Secretary of State agree that there is a lack of confidence in the clinical grading appeals procedure and that matters will get worse, because there are fewer members of the slimline health authorities to hear and determine appeals? If NHS trusts are set up, there is even the prospect that the appeals procedure and clinical grading will disappear altogether in NHS hospitals. What does the Secretary of State propose to do, first, to speed up the appeals procedure and, secondly, to restore confidence in the system and thus morale in the profession?

Mr. Clarke: The situation on grading appeals is something of a disgrace and it is entirely the fault of the nursing trade unions. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Yes, it is. When we first drew up the new grading arrangements, I put it to the nurses' trade union leaders that the existing appeals system would not work when dealing with all the appeals, because each individual case is dealt with as though it were a magistrates court hearing—one by one. I invited them to take part with me in discussions about streamlining the appeals procedure, but they refused. They preferred the existing Whitley council procedures. I hope that they will reflect upon that and that they will come back and have some sensible discussions about a proper appeals procedure. I have always suspected that some of the trade unions, at least, prefer the nurses to be left with a sense of grievance which they can play upon rather than tackle the problem of getting the gradings right.

Mr. John Greenway: May I advise my right hon. and learned Friend that last Saturday my wife went back to Hammersmith hospital for the 25th anniversary reunion of the nurses who, with her, went to that hospital in 1965? During that visit they were amazed to discover that there were twice as many nurses on the wards and that many patients were sent home for the weekend due to the improvement in clinical techniques and methods. Does not that demonstrate not only that there are more nurses but that when the Government's reforms are in place—[HON. MEMBERS: "Get on with it!"]—and these appeals are out of the way there will be every opportunity for the nursing profession to establish itself much more, which will enable nurses to feel that they have a much greater relationship with the hospital where they work?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend's wife may have had the misfortune to work in the national health service during the years when a Labour Government allowed nurses' pay to fall 21 per cent. behind inflation. It is now 40 per cent. ahead of inflation since we came to office. The profesesion is becoming well paid and much better staffed. The grading system gives nurses a much better career structure, as all nurses would recognise. It is high time that we got rid of the anomalous appeals system so as to enable the grading structure to work. Nursing is now a better-staffed and better-paid profession, with a better career structure than ever before. Nurses will get a great deal out of our improved and reformed national health service.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I request hon. Members to ask brief supplementary questions. Then we shall get further down the Order Paper.

Community Care

2. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received regarding funding arrangements for the Government's community care proposals.

12. Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made on the implementation of the community care proposals contained in the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990.

15. Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received from local authorities regarding the Government's proposed changes in the organisation of community care.

16. Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received from organisations on the new arrangements for community care; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Health (Mrs. Virginia Bottomley): We have received many representations on all aspects of our community care proposals. Those views informed the Government's decision on the phasing of community care and the local authority settlement announced by my right hon. Friend. the Secretary of State for the Environment on 19 July. The implementation of our proposals is continuing to the timetable outlined by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State in his statement to the House on 18 July.

Mr. Illsley: Is the Minister aware that many poll-tax-capped authorities such as mine in Barnsley are in considerable chaos following the collapse of the Government's proposals for community care? They are having to make cuts of up to £1 milliion and will face further cuts. Has the Minister discussed that in detail with the Department of the Environment to ensure that there will be adequate funding for those authorities next year?

Mrs. Bottomley: There is no reason for the hon. Gentleman to blame the difficulties of his local authority on the decision to phase the implementation of the full community care proposals. It is clear that his local authority, and many others, will be able to develop their plans further and improve the management of their services. The fact that his authority has been charge-capped suggests that it could well invest some time in ensuring that it has the cost-effective and efficient services for the community once the policy is fully implemented.

Mr. O'Brien: I remind the Minister of the letter that I sent her colleague the Secretary of State on 25 September and the acknowledgement that I received on 28 September. Attached to that was a letter from my constituent, Mrs. June Cadman, who cares for 70 mentally handicapped people, in which she explained the hardship faced by the people in her charge. The letter also contained an appeal for assistance for Leeds city council and Wakefield city council social services department.

Because of the poll tax and the standard spending assessments, it is impossible for local authorities to help private homes. When will the Minister do something to help those people, to sustain those in need of care and attention and to help carers? May we have some assistance, please?

Mrs. Bottomley: There is a project under way in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, involving the regional health authority, the housing department and the local authority, for the relocation of mentally handicapped people in the community. I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend will reply to the hon. Gentleman's letter shortly. There is much to be done in the provision of care for mentally handicapped people and I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman is as concerned as we are to ensure that services for this needy group improve.

Mr. Norman Hogg: As the Government did not think that community care in Scotland was worth a statement last July, when they announced the two-year delay, what advice is the Minister giving her right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, as there is much difficulty among local authorities in Scotland which are strapped for cash because of Government cuts and the inefficiency of the poll tax? A two-year delay in implementing community care looks extremely optimistic.

Mrs. Bottomley: I urge the hon. Gentleman to speak swiftly to my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Scottish Office, who announced on 26 September the full plans for implementation in Scotland. It would be presumptuous of me as an English Minister to make further comment on plans for north of the border.

Mr. Andrew Welsh: Where is the caring face of a Government who delay implementation of community care and starve the system of money for vulnerable groups such as elderly and disabled people? What is the Minister doing to bridge the financial gap between social security benefits and the costs of community care, or between revenue support grant and the costs of community care for local authorities? If the Minister tries to implement this scheme on the cheap she will simply create a recipe for social disaster.

Mrs. Bottomley: Personal social services spending has increased by 47 per cent. in the past 10 years. That is a substantial increase, quite apart from the extra money available through the social security system. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security has made it clear that he is considering closely the income support questions. This year's settlement for local government would be regarded by my hon. Friends as generous and even Opposition Members would regard it as fair.

Mrs. Currie: Is my hon. Friend aware that in Derbyshire the postponement of the community care reforms was met with a great sense of relief, because Derbyshire county council was nowhere near ready and implementation too soon would have put many people's lives and welfare at risk? Is she further aware that the first action of Derbyshire county council in response to poll tax capping was not to cut its administration, its local government newspaper or its publicity, but to cut entirely the grant to the Derbyshire coalition of disabled people?

Mrs. Bottomley: That is yet another item in the catalogue of appalling decisions made by Derbyshire county council, which I understand has increased its staff by 8,000 since the Labour party took control. It is clear that many local authorities need those two years. The Select Committee on Social Services made it clear that there is a pressing timetable to implement the changes by next April and I have no doubt that health authorities, voluntary organisations, the private sector and local authorities will need to spend that time training and thinking through the management and cost-effectiveness of their proposals for care in the community.

Mr. Thurnham: When considering funding, will my hon. Friend bear in mind the far greater cost-effectiveness of the voluntary sector in providing community care, especially for the mentally handicapped?

Mrs. Bottomley: Once again, my hon. Friend leads me to comment on the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) about Derbyshire. Local authorities whose first decision is to cut support for the voluntary sector are thoroughly misguided. The voluntary sector has an excellent tradition of providing care in the community. That is why, for example, we especially identified the voluntary sector to support drug and alcohol misusers in the new specific grant announced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State in July.

Mr. Bowis: Is my hon. Friend now able to put at rest the genuine worries about funding of those running halfway houses for people coming out of alcohol and drug detoxification units? Without that service, it is difficult for such people to find their way back into a real life in the community.

Mrs. Bottomley: My hon. Friend rightly identifies that especially needy group, who are costly in terms of services and who most certainly need a development of provision. He will know that there has been careful discussion with those organisations, which resulted in the specific grant announced in July. We believe that it will be possible for their valuable services to grow and to develop.

Mr. Robin Cook: As these will be the last health questions before the uprating statement, can the Minister tell us what hope there is for all those residents on income support who now find that they cannot pay what their private home charges? What does she have to say to those elderly people who have had their personal allowances confiscated, who cannot buy toothpaste or newspapers and who cannot pay for stamps, and who still cannot pay the weekly cost of their home? How can she defend the double standard by which those on income support are put in the shared bedrooms with the poorer services? As it was the Government's decision to delay the community care programme for two years, what do Ministers intend to do for all those elderly and disabled residents who cannot wait until 1993 to pay this week's bill and are likely to be turned out if they try?

Mrs. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman knows full well that matters of uprating are for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security. However, it remains the case that local authorities will continue to make plans for care in the community. We remain committed to a mixed economy of care. It is important that local authorities, voluntary organisations and the private sector provide for the frail and the vulnerable. The hon. Gentleman always speaks as though resources were no object. One has only to consider—I hope that the poor and the vulnerable will do this—the record of the Labour party when in government. There has been a substantial increase in resources. I can make no further announcements without anticipating the comments of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security.

Children Act 1989

3. Mr. Bell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made on the implementation of the Children Act 1989.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We are consulting on the regulations guidance and rules of court necessary to implement the Act on 14 October 1991—363 days away. A comprehensive training and dissemination programme is under way.

Mr. Bell: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply. As the Children Act 1989 came about partly as a result of events in Cleveland, does the Minister agree there are now proper multidisciplinary procedures in Cleveland for the handling of alleged child sexual abuse cases? Is not it a fact that the Cleveland child abuse crisis is at an end? Given the situation in Cleveland, is not it a pity that other authorities are acting as if we had never passed a Children Act through this Parliament? Would not it be helpful if we could advance the date of implementation from October 1991?

Mrs. Bottomley: I fear that it is not possible to advance the date from October 1991. The training programme, involving social workers, court staff and many others, will clearly be taxing for them to implement by that timetable. However, I can confirm that the social services inspectorate's report on Cleveland, which was published on 7 June this year, made it clear that good progress has been made, especially in the area of inter-agency working. It is essential that the lessons are learnt time and again that effective child protection means effective and trusting communication between local authorities, police departments, education departments and health departments. Cleveland has made great strides forward and I hope that many other local authorities will learn those lessons and ensure that they have the same working practices.

Mr. Holt: Will my hon. Friend take it from me that, far from having gone away, the spectre of Cleveland has raised its head again this week? One of the two doctors at the heart of the whole affair, Dr. Wyatt, is now being systematically helped by his cohorts of two or three years ago in his efforts to get his job back in its previous form —which involved diagnosing children as sexually abused and thereby causing much distress to children, parents and grandparents in my constituency and throughout Cleveland. Will my hon. Friend make every effort now, today, to see that this attempt is knocked on the head straight away?

Mrs. Bottomley: I well understand the concern that my hon. Friend has expressed. I can assure him that steps have already been taken by the health authority to resolve the matter. None of us can underestimate the seriousness of the situation that arose in Cleveland, but I believe that the lessons have been learnt. The important point is that the information should be disseminated to ensure that other local authorities across the country learn those lessons—to protect children and, above all, to respect the role of parents.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Does the Minister accept that there will be profound disappointment at the fact that, following Royal Assent, an Act which arose from a great deal of consensus on both sides of the House is to take two years to implement? As the Government have declined to accept the views of the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work, precisely what proposals do they have for essential training and what progress have they made in their commitment to family courts?

Mrs. Bottomley: I believe that it is rather naive to think that the Children Act could be implemented in its full complexity any faster than is proposed. For example, 80 sets of regulations have to be produced. We are just producing the 20th issue of draft guidance, out of a collection of 30. It is a major task, involving local authorities, voluntary organisations, the police, health authorities and many others. We have a full training programme under way and £10 million worth of resources, in a ring-fenced sum, have been committed to ensure that that training takes place.

We are talking not only about the detailed implementation of the Act but about the updating of "Working Together", the seminal document which advises all those involved of the vital importance of proper and effective communication. So often in child abuse cases, it is communication that goes wrong.

The hon. Gentleman will know that great progress is being made in the integration of the law concerning various aspects of the family—not only children. I recently announced a review of adoption law and we are also discussing divorce law. We believe that such developments will lead progressively to the creation of the conditions necessary for the establishment of a full family court.

Mr. Sims: My hon. Friend is correct that the Children Act is an extremely complex piece of legislation, and it is probably one of the most important to emerge from Parliament this decade. I am sure that she is aware that practitioners in the field are enthusiastic about the provisions as they learn about them, but is she also aware that there is genuine concern that there may be insufficient resources to implement the proposals correctly? Can she give an assurance that resources will be available?

Mrs. Bottomley: We are committed to ensuring that the Children Act is fully and effectively implemented. None of us can tolerate the existence of child neglect and abuse in our modern society. We have fewer children in care, but there are many children on the at-risk register. It is incumbent on us all—whether as politicians in local or central government or as members of the community—to protect those children. We have a major training programme, and the other resource aspects are the subject of regular discussions between the Department and the local authority organisations. I cannot give any further information about the personal social services allocation until after the autumn statement next month.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are making rather slow progress this afternoon. [HON. MEMBERS: "It is the Minister's fault."] I am anxious to get on.

Social Work

4. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps are taken by his Department to monitor the ability of individual local authorities to carry out their statutory social work functions.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department's social services inspectorate keeps the Department informed about the provision of personal social services by individual local authorities.

Mr. Barnes: Does the Department of Health read the reports and take action based on them, because it seems to me that the Department has little idea of what goes on in local government? For example, when the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) asked a question it seemed that she had also written the brief from which the Minister gave her answer, as it did not relate in any way to the problems and needs of Derbyshire. What extra money will be provided for the function and operation of the Children Act? The local authorities concerned have asked for £140 million. Will anything like that sum be available?

Mrs. Bottomley: The information about what happens in Derbyshire comes from our "Key Indicators" document. That valuable document, which we produce annually, gives information about precisely how local authorities are spending their resources. In Derbyshire, one in three people over 75 receives a home help, free of charge. I do not believe that that is targeting resources or looking to value for money. That does not show a sense of responsibility in the provision of services.

With regard to resources for the Children Act, the hon. Gentleman, like others, will have to await the decisions and outcome of the autumn statement when he will discover the precise sums involved. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will encourage Derbyshire social services to use that money cost effectively and to resist the gimmicks so often identified by my hon. Friends.

Mr. Gerald Bowden: In monitoring the social work functions of local authorities, has my hon. Friend the Minister had an opportunity to consider the way in which the London borough of Southwark discharged its duties at Grove Park children's home? If the disclosures in The Sunday Correspondent magazine are correct, is not it evident that children in the so-called care of Southwark are at even greater risk than if they were not in Southwark's care?

Mrs. Bottomley: My hon. Friend has mentioned that home, which is in his constituency, to me before. The outrage and horror of many who saw precisely what was happening at the Grove Park children's home is shared by us all, and I am pleased to say that the home has closed. I have asked the social services inspectorate to report to me urgently on the provision of residential care for the difficult, turbulent bunch of teenagers in the capital cities. The easiest ones to foster are fostered, but residential homes have to cope with an extremely difficult and troublesome group. We look to the social services inspectorate once again to report back on that and I will certainly have urgent discussions with my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) about it.

Sanderson Hospital, Gosforth

5. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he proposes to visit the Sanderson hospital, Gosforth.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): I have no immediate plans to do so.

Mr. Cousins: Does the Minister accept that the Sanderson hospital is the last long-stay hospital for the elderly in Newcastle which does not face closure? It is part of a hospital group—the Royal Victoria infirmary—which is dithering over opt-out and has to make panic cuts to save £400,000 of overspending up to August. The site would make wonderful executive housing, or can the Minister assure us that there is still a place in the NHS for small kindly hospitals which care for patients who cannot easily be packaged or priced?

Mr. Dorrell: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman was advocating the sale of the site for high-value executive houses, but I assure him that it is NHS policy to continue to use the Sanderson hospital for the care of the elderly, for which it currently has a distinguished record.

General Practitioners

6. Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many practices have now expressed an interest in joining the general practitioners' fund-holding scheme; and how many he estimates will meet the eligibility criteria and be ready for fund holding in April 1991.

14. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on progress being made with applications for practice budgets for general practitioners.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Around 350 practices are preparing for fund-holding status from 1 April 1991, and I have been much impressed by the quality and commitment to the scheme of the practices concerned.

Mr. Field: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, while a tiny minority of doctors continue to dispense their own brand of politics, the vast majority are playing an increasingly active part in the delivery of better health care throughout the country? Is it true that on the Isle of Wight a high percentage of doctors have applied to become fund holders?

Mr. Clarke: I am glad to say that on the Isle of Wight three practices have been attracted by the idea of having much more control of how NHS money is spent on the isle. Those three practices cover about 30,000 of the residents, which is about one quarter of the population, so there is a particularly high level of interest on the isle. I also agree with my hon. Friend that the experience of fund holding and of the contract is proving very beneficial. Contrary to all the inventions of last year, the amount of time spent with patients is increasing, the amount of minor surgery is increasing, the amount of time spent on health promotion is increasing and the number of practices carrying out child surveillance is increasing. The number of staff and nurses employed by the practices has increased and they are all earning more money. No doubt the fund-holding practices in the isle intend to add to those achievements if they proceed with their applications.

Mr. Arnold: Is not the approach that we should follow in respect of GPs' practice budgets one of slowly, slowly catchee monkey? Surely the objective is that we should get the finances to where the patients are and give the clout to general practitioners' practices. Would my right hon. and learned Friend care to contrast that with the full-blooded enthusiasm of Opposition Members to continue with a vast centralised bureaucracy?

Mr. Clarke: The pace at which we proceed with fund holding is being determined by the rate at which GPs come forward to volunteer for the scheme. We have 350 practices still actively preparing for next year and many more practices are interested in coming along the year after that. They include some of the people who represented doctors in last year's rows about the scheme and the British Medical Association has now set up a separate group to represent those fund holders, which shows that we are winning converts in quite a lot of places.

I agree with my hon. Friend that the interest of the profession in new developments and what they have achieved from the contract is in stark contrast with the negative positions that have been taken by the Opposition in their sole desire to turn the clock back, if they ever get the chance, to the old bureaucratic and less effective national health service.

Hospital Services, Southend

7. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will pay a visit to Southend-on-Sea to inspect the hospital services.

Mr. Dorrell: I have no immediate plans to do so.

Mr. Taylor: Is the Minister aware that, for many years, our excellent hospitals in Southend have had to cope with being seriously underfunded in comparison with other districts because they happen to be in an overfunded region? As a new system of funding based on capitation is coming in in April, can the Minister assure Southend that that fairer system will result in something being done about consistent underfunding?

Mr. Dorrell: I can confirm that, by national standards, Southend has been underfunded over a long period. It is one of the intentions of the reforms that will come in next April that we achieve a fairer distribution of funding around the country. That will not happen overnight, but it is our clear intention that it should happen over a reasonably short period.

Sir Bernard Braine: Is my hon. Friend aware that it is not an inspection that is needed, nor even an admission that our district has been underfunded for many years past? We want some action.

Mr. Dorrell: My right hon. Friend has an Act on the statute book which sets in place the machinery that will allow funds to flow in the way in which he desires. Action is coming.

Mr. Cohen: When we see it we shall believe it. Is the Minister aware that Southend, like in my area of Waltham Forest, is covered by the North East Thames regional health authority, that that authority has recently slashed its capital programme and that many important developments have been cut as a result? When will the Minister do something about increasing that capital programme for a change?

Mr. Dorrell: Since 1979 the NHS capital programme has increased by 57 per cent. in real terms. I wish that I could believe the hon. Gentleman when he says that he will believe it when he sees it. He has seen it for more than 11 years and apparently still does not believe it.

Patient Care

8. Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what initiatives are being taken to promote a better quality of care for patients.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Better quality of service and care for patients is at the heart of the NHS reforms. Key ways of achieving that will be the devolution of responsibility to local level and agreements between purchasers and providers with clearly specified quality standards.

Mr. Mitchell: Is not my hon. Friend's response an eloquent testimony to this Government's commitment to the National Health Service at a time when an aging population and welcome medical advances mean that there is a great deal to be done? Is not that a contrast to the capital-cutting, hospital building programme-cutting Labour Government who used to be in power?

Mrs. Bottomley: I thank my hon. Friend for his words. In the words of my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine), we believe in action, not words, and in putting quality at the forefront of our plans for the health service. My hon. Friend will know that the scheme in his constituency is one of our national demonstration projects, focusing on quality. The children's out-patient department received £110,000 from the Department last year, once again making sure that the patient and the patient's family are at the forefront of health care.

Mr. Kennedy: Given that the Minister is trying to reduce junior hospital doctors' working hours and to improve patient care in that way—as well as the working environment—what will be the effect on that of the national initiative on the opting out of hospitals as they seek self-governing trust status? Will junior hospital doctors be more or less likely to enjoy better working hours and better working conditions?

Mrs. Bottomley: I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman has referred to our determined effort to tackle once and for all the unacceptable problem of some junior hospital doctors working unacceptable hours—unacceptable to them and to patients. Although considerable progress has already been made, we are determined to see further action in the specialties, hospitals and grades where the difficulty persists. I assure the hon. Gentleman that hospitals that become NHS trusts will, of course, abide by the manpower arrangements that have already been established, not only for junior hospital doctors' working hours, but in order to achieve a balance and to meet the safety net requirements.

Dame Jill Knight: Does my hon. Friend concede that there are differing ideas among different patients about what constitutes quality of care, which often have nothing to do with medical care? Some patients want to be in a room by themselves, to have better food or not to be in a mixed ward. How are the proposals progressing that would allow patients to pay something towards achieving those objectives?

Mrs. Bottomley: I greatly appreciate my hon. Friend's contribution. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State recently announced an initiative to allow patients who wish to do so to pay for the extras that make such a difference to their patient care. I remind the House and my hon. Friends of the national quality exhibition that will take place in Birmingham in a fortnight, which will demonstrate practically the many quality initiatives which, above all, seek to make sure that patients, their wishes, interests and concerns will come first and be given the priority that they deserve.

Ms. Harman: Does the Minister accept that a key factor in achieving quality of care for all patients is ensuring that they get the treatment that they need when they need it? Is not the Minister aware that hospitals throughout the country, such as Westminster, are closing wards to all but emergency admissions because of shortage of money? The Minister says that the Government believe in action, not words when it comes to quality health care, but why do the action and the words mean offering cuts to the Treasury instead of saving services for patients who need them?

Mrs. Bottomley: It is rich for the hon. Lady to refer to action, not words. The Conservative party has increased the number of in-patients, and out-patients, and increased the number of day cases. On all fronts, there has been an improvement in the health service, leading to better patient care. However, we want to ensure that we continue to see perinatal mortality at a record low level, and that we see not only a reduction in the number of women dying from cervical cancer, but an increase in the number of coronary artery bypass grafts and kidney treatments. That is why my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State announced last week a programme of health targets to ensure that we continue to focus our efforts on clear, concrete and practical achievements and continue to build a better health service.

Mr. Cormack: Does my hon. Friend accept that one group of patients has, tragically, received bad care? I am referring to the haemophiliac AIDS victims. Does she further accept that if the Government believe in action, not words, we cannot be satisfied with the response that we have received so far?

Mrs. Bottomley: I understand my hon. Friend's words. He will have heard my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State in last night's debate. The fact is that there was no case of neglect in those cases. However, we accept the great tragedy and that is why such significant resources have been made available to the families, who were so grievously affected, amounting to an average of £28,000 each. However, we cannot expect that every time there is a tragedy in the health service, when there is no professional neglect, there will be instant compensation, because the implications for us all and for all health care would be enormous.

NHS Trusts

9. Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the progress made on public consultation following proposals for the formation of self-governing hospital trusts.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: A total of 66 units have applied to become national health service trusts in the first wave, which will become operational in April 1991. Regional health authorities are currently consulting on applications from potential trusts within their regions. I shall announce my decision on each application after I have had an opportunity to consider the outcome of the public consultation.

Mr. Cummings: The Minister will be aware that Newcastle Royal Victoria infirmary is preparing for self-governing trust status in 1991. Is he further aware that in the run-up to 1991, 50 per cent. of children's surgical beds are to be closed for an indefinite period, thus denying a three-month-old baby in my village the chance of major surgery? Will the Minister confirm that the cash crisis in Newcastle Royal Victoria infirmary and the bed closures are part and parcel of a softening-up exercise to enable the infirmary to opt out easily next year?

Mr. Clarke: Newcastle Royal Victoria infirmary is an extremely successful hospital, which, together with the other hospitals in Newcastle, is expanding the service, and has been doing so rapidly during recent years, thus consuming additional resources. I believe that it is the location of one of the biggest building sites in Newcastle, where the next phase of development is being financed at present. It is most unfortunate that some people in Newcastle, who are surrounded by an expanding and improving service, spend their time trying to make allegations about a part of the service where the health authority has chosen its priorities in order to live within the ever-increasing sum of resources allocated to it. Doctors, nurses and others in Newcastle have expressed an interest in having more control over their own affairs. I am now considering the application in the light of the public consultations.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: My right hon. and learned Friend is fighting hard for additional funds for the national health service in his negotiations with the Treasury, about which I am delighted. Can he assure me that he is fighting for additional funds for the whole of the national health service, not just for hospitals that are prepared to put in a submission for self-governing status?

Mr. Clarke: Of course, I am buoyed up by my hon. Friend's support for my current negotiations, and am glad to have him on my side. The Government's duty is to ensure that funds are available to carry out the policies to which we are committed. We have to equate that with the need to keep down inflation, which we have done successfully in previous years. The past two public spending rounds have increased the cash available to the national health service by 20 per cent.—a better two-year record than any Labour Secretary of State could ever claim or would ever be likely to claim. My hon. Friend will have to wait to see what happens in the third year.

Mr. Robin Cook: Did the Secretary of State see last week's survey in Tory Sutton and Cheam, which found that among 6,000 residents there was a majority against the local application of six to one? As the Secretary of State cannot carry Sutton and Cheam, would he care to name to the House a single poll of the public that has come out in support of his proposals?

Mr. Clarke: Those surveys are usually carried out on the back of extremely misleading propaganda put out by organisations financed by the Labour party and trade unions. I am considering serious applications by those who work in the hospitals and public consultations that address the issues, not the allegations about opting out of the national health service and other nonsense disseminated by the Labour party. The hon. Gentleman must know perfectly well from his personal experience that there is considerable enthusiasm among the staff and those closely involved in many of the applications for self-governing status. I shall judge them all on whether I believe that those attractive plans can be successfully carried forward to improve the service to patients.

Mr. Michael Morris: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the consultation documents are full of information about how the various trusts will provide the capacity to fill up the hospitals, but are less informative about how they will actually achieve that? Will he ensure that any representation that is received and accepted contains a fulsome part showing how the extra resource will be made available?

Mr. Clarke: I am glad that my hon. Friend is studying the application documents, which is more than most people are doing who are organising local straw polls up and down the country. As my hon. Friend will know, the success of any hospitals in the new national health service will depend on the quality of care that they achieve, the quality of service that they give to GPs and patients and their ability to lag referrals. Some of the applications for self-governing status come from the finest hospitals in the country and they are confident that if they are given more chance to run their own affairs, free from the old bureaucracy, they will attract more patients and resources under the new system.

Cholesterol

10. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his proposals for taking action against cholesterol-related problems, in the light of the responses he has had to the document of the departmental working party paper on cholesterol.

Mr. Dorrell: The report from the standing Medical Advisory Committee was widely circulated with an invitation to respond by 31 October. When those responses are received, I shall be in a position to consider what action may be needed.

Mr. Dalyell: Since coronary heart disease kills about 143,000 people in this country, putting us very near the top of the league, over what period will the £25 million announced by Lady Hooper be spent in relation to cholesterol blood-related problems?

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman may have heard my right hon. and learned Friend announce last week that he was intending to set up a portfolio of health targets, and he identified coronary heart disease as a specific target: he wanted a 25 per cent. reduction in premature deaths associated with coronary heart disease by the year 2000. The amount of money that the hon. Gentleman identifies will clearly be used towards the achievement of that objective.

Prime Minister

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Madden: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 16 October.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

Mr. Madden: May I ask the Prime Minister a question of which I gave her office notice earlier today? Will she take this opportunity to condemn Pol Pot and the Khmer Rouge for the mass murder of more than 1 million innocent Cambodians; and will she tell the House what action she and the Government are taking to stop Pol Pot and his allies marching back to power so that they can murder still more millions of innocent Cambodians?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. We have repeatedly made clear our utter abhorrence for the Khmer Rouge and all that it stands for. We have never given support of any kind to the Khmer Rouge. Our aim over many years has been to prevent a return to the atrocities of the Pol Pot years, and, as a permanent member of the United Nations Security Council, we are working to achieve that through a comprehensive political settlement.

Mr. Lester: Does my right hon. Friend agree that those of us who seek to prevent the return of the Khmer Rouge should wholeheartedly support the Supreme National Council which has now been established, comprising both internal and external Khmers, and that we should wholeheartedly support the comprehensive political settlement which, in annex 2, deals with disarmament, with mines, with caches of weapons, with the return of refugees and with free elections? Does she further agree that, as the British Government recognise neither the external Khmers nor the Hun Sen regime as a legitimate Government, we should talk equally to both sides?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I agree with him that we should support the efforts of the five permanent members of the Security Council. This is another example of the five permanent members working very closely together. The Supreme National Council includes Hun Sen, Prince Sihanouk, Sonn San and the Khmer Rouge—those are its components. I agree with what my hon. Friend said.

Mr. Kinnock: On the exchange rate mechanism, does the Prime Minister recall that on 20 September she was adamant, in her own words, that "the Madrid conditions won't be changed and they include getting inflation near to the European average"?

Whatever happened in the following two weeks to make her completely cave in?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman will have heard what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said in his excellent statement. Several conditions were laid out in the Madrid statement. A number of them had been fully achieved; some others were on the way. The most important was progress on the free movement of capital; the next, progress on free trade in financial services; the next, progress on the single market and further progress in competition policy. Monetary conditions here made possible a reduction of 1 per cent. in interest rates. Yes, we could have gone on further and waited until inflation had visibly come down, but so many of the conditions had been met and there was so much speculation about when we were going into the exchange rate mechanism that we took advantage of the excellent opportunity—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. These are very important matters.

The Prime Minister: —of the excellent opportunity of monetary conditions' coming within their limits to end all the speculation about when we should go in and go in, just one year after we had increased interest rates to 15 per cent., just before the Tory party conference.

Mr. Kinnock: If the Prime Minister is so confident about her judgment, why will she not simply come to the House next week and speak in the debate? Is not it now obvious that her own personal position on this issue is utterly impossible to justify, and that she is just plain frit?

The Prime Minister: Unlike the right hon. Gentleman, I have a most excellent Chancellor, an excellent Treasury team and a superb—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

The Prime Minister: —and a superb Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. I shall be here answering questions every Tuesday and Thursday, and I hope that one day the right hon. Gentleman may know how to ask a good one.

Mr. Mans: Does my right hon. Friend agree that a responsible policy on the environment must be both practical and realistic, and that to insist on the reduction of CO_2 emissions around the turn of the century, while at the same time discounting the future use of nuclear power, increasing the use of fossil fuels such as coal and promoting cheaper petrol, makes no sense whatever? Does she agree that that policy is highly environmentally damaging as well?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. If one wants to reduce emissions of carbon dioxide, one of the best ways is to support nuclear power. Recently we have also seen a substantial increase in the price of oil and petrol, without attempting to put it up further. Any promises that are made should be capable of being fulfilled, and the earliest date on carbon dioxide emissions when we can fulfil this promise is the year 2005.

Q2. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 16 October.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Wallace: Does the Prime Minister agree that the honourable and decent way forward in the tragic case of the 1,200 haemophiliacs suffering from the AIDS virus is to offer far more generous compensation than has been the case up to now, rather than continuing to fund ever-increasing fees for lawyers to argue the toss over the matter?

The Prime Minister: The Government have already made available some £34 million to the haemophiliacs who are suffering from this very grievous happening, as an ex gratia payment without prejudice to their taking legal action in the courts. Obviously, we wish to know the legal position before any further payment is considered.

Mr. Alexander: Has my right hon. Friend had time to notice British Rail's 25 per cent. pay offer to its track-laying and signalling staff? Does she agree that pay awards of that order will merely outrage fare-paying passengers, stoke up inflation and put off further the day when we can reduce interest rates still more?

The Prime Minister: If my recollection is correct, certain recommendations about signalling were made after the Clapham accident that must be taken into account when one judges that settlement. I am sure that my hon. Friend would agee that it is absolutely vital that we live up to the safety standards required of us by the report following that terrible accident.

Q3. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 16 October.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Fyfe: Does the right hon. Lady remember saying 15 months ago that lowering United Kingdom inflation was the most important of the Madrid conditions? If that is no longer the case, when and why did she begin to change her mind and decide that the right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson) was right?

The Prime Minister: Had the hon. Lady listened yesterday and earlier this afternoon, she would have heard the Chancellor and I both say that a large number of the conditions had already been met and that there was an opportunity to go into the exchange rate mechanism. We took that decision and it was right. It has been warmly welcomed and I am amazed that Opposition Members are being so small minded about it. Did not they want us to go in?

Sir Jim Spicer: Many hon. Members know the Kuwaiti ambassador, but not many know that three weeks ago his brother-in-law was seized by the Iraqi forces, taken away and tortured for 16 days, and then taken back to his home to be executed in front of his house and family. Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that people who perpetrate such crimes will not escape punishment?

The Prime Minister: We all share the revulsion that has been expressed about that brutal act and we have seen the Amnesty International report about many other brutal acts conducted daily by Saddam Hussein in Kuwait. That makes it clear that we must deal with this man. I agree with my hon. Friend that he must be made answerable for these terrible crimes and must withdraw from Kuwait so that the legitimate Government of Kuwait can be restored. I join my hon. Friend in sending our sympathies to the Kuwaiti Government on this terrible brutality.

Q4. Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 16 October.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Grant: Is the Prime Minister aware of the indignation and outrage felt by Cypriots in my constituency about the Government's two-faced attitude to invasions? Troops have been sent to Saudi Arabia as a result of the invasion of Kuwait, but absolutely nothing has been done about the Turkish invasion of Cyprus. Is the Prime Minister—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. Grant.

Mr. Grant: Is the Prime Minister aware that the international financial bandit Mr. Asil Nadir and his company, Polly Peck, have made their money by stealing property, orange groves and hotels from Greek Cypriots who are living in exile in my constituency? Will she do something—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This House is for putting forward views that hon. Members feel strongly about. We have a right to do that.

Mr. Grant: What will the Prime Minister do to prevent this carpetbagger, Mr. Nadir, from bringing his money, his ill-gotten gains, out of the north of Cyprus into this country in order to bail out his company, Polly Peck?

The Prime Minister: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman has forgotten that the events in Cyprus that led to the Turkish invasion and the toppling of Makarios happened during the lifetime of a Labour Government and the decision not to invoke the guarantee was that of the then Foreign Secretary who is now the noble Lord Callaghan. The hon. Gentleman will be fully aware that we wish to see the state of Cyprus continue bi-zonal and bi-communal and that we fully support the efforts of Mr. Perez de Cuellar, the United Nations Secretary-General, to bring that about. The hon. Gentleman knows full well that the matters that he raised in the latter part of his question are under investigation by the serious fraud squad.

Mr. Aitken: Will my right hon. Friend comment on the recent press interview given by the general commanding the British forces in the Gulf, in which he said that he expected that further British troops who are still under training would be deployed in that area? Does my right hon. Friend agree that while that policy may well be welcome and right, it would be preferable for such anouncements to be made in the first place in Parliament?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is aware that the full armoured brigade is on its way there. I know of no intention to send any further people. Obviously, the brigade goes with its full support staff, including the engineers and the full hospital staff, which is not the 8,000 of the armoured brigade but about 11,000 in all. That is a part of the support for the armoured brigade.

Q6. Mr. Fearn: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 16 October.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Fearn: Is the Prime Minister aware that 39 countries have now ratified the United Nations convention on the rights of the child? When will this country ratify those excellent terms? What are we waiting for?

The Prime Minister: I signed the convention on behalf of the United Kingdom when I was at the United Nations; to ratify it, it would have to come before the House.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Is my right hon. Friend aware that Mr. Tony Wilbraham, a Baghdad hostage and father of my constituents Joanne and Paul, could die as soon as Christmas from advanced lung cancer? Will she do all that she can to secure his early release together with that of his wife, who is standing by him and nursing him, and of other sick hostages who, so far, Saddam Hussein has not had the compassion to release?

The Prime Minister: We have every sympathy with Mr. Wilbraham and his family and also with the others who are suffering from terminal illnesses and being so wickedly detained by Saddam Hussein. It shows the true nature of that person. As my hon. Friend knows, our ambassador is still in Baghdad, and he is making strenuous efforts to ensure that those people are released. We utterly condemn Saddam Hussein for not releasing them.

Questions to Ministers

3.30 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to draw to your attention to, and to seek a statement on, a matter that arose yesterday, and which I believe constitutes a serious abuse of the proper procedures of the House. Yesterday, immediately before Social Security Question Time, I happened to come across a set of abandoned papers, of which I have full copies with me. When I was able to examine them more closely after questions, I discovered that they were photocopies of 14 oral questions tabled to Social Security Ministers for that day, together with the replies that were to be given by Ministers—[Interruption.] I am sorry that the Prime Minister does not wish to know about this breach of procedure by her party.

The answers in the photocopies were, indeed, exactly the answers that were given by Ministers. In addition, there were 16 pages of briefing, in each case headed with the title "Bull points", putting substantial defensive arguments in favour of the Government's case. It is clear that that material was circulated among Government Back Benchers to assist them at Question Time. It is also clear that the drafted ministerial replies could have come only from the Government. The briefing sheets all had code figures, which I know from my experience in government are used by Whitehall officials. It is a clear abuse of the procedures of this House that advice and briefing from civil servants, which are supposed to be tendered privately to Ministers, are then secretly made available to the Government's supporters for partisan use in the Chamber.

In the past, it has been alleged that the Government were packing the Order Paper with favourable planted questions; it now appears that they are packing Question Time with favourable planted answers. I ask for a full inquiry into the matter and that a statement be made by the Secretary of State when that is complete.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman gave me notice during Question Time of his intention to raise that matter. There is no objection to general briefings, and, as the hon. Gentleman said, he knows from his own experience that such briefings are frequently given. However, it is a discourtesy to right hon. and hon. Members who are to ask questions to reveal the proposed answers in advance, and I hope that that practice—if it has occurred—will cease.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): We are used to bogus and hypocritical points of order being raised in this House.

Mr. Speaker: Then I judge that this is not to be one of them.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: I withdraw the word "hypocritical", but more than one Opposition Member has told me that they have been asked to sign questions that they did not even understand—let alone understand the answer. The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) suggests that there is something hypocritical in the Government's actions, but if the Opposition ever came to office—which God forbid—they would do exactly the same things for which they are criticising the Government for doing.

Mr. Speaker: I have already made my own views absolutely clear.

NEW MEMBER

The following Member took and subscribed the Oath:
Edward O'Hara Esq., for Knowsley, South.

BILL PRESENTED

WAR PENSIONS (DISREGARD)

Mrs. Alice Mahon, supported by Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, Ms. Dawn Primarolo, Mr. Harry Barnes, Mr. Bob Cryer, Mr. Dennis Skinner, Mr. George Howarth, Mr. David Hinchliffe, Mr. Harry Cohen, Mr. Bernie Grant and Mr. John Battle, presented a Bill to provide that income from war pensions shall be disregarded for the purpose of assessing entitlement to any benefit payable out of the Social Security Fund or the National Insurance Fund: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Tuesday 23 October and to be printed. [Bill 197.]

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the House, I will put together the three motions relating to statutory instruments.

Ordered,

That the draft Housing (Grants for Fire Escapes in Houses in Multiple Occupation) (Prescribed Percentage) (Scotland) Order 1990 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments &c.

That the draft Parliamentary Constituencies (Scotland) (Miscellaneous Changes) Order 1990 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Local Government Boundaries Commissioner (Northern Ireland) Order 1990 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Patnick.]

Mr. Speaker: Ten-minute Bill. Dawn Primarolo.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are past the time for points of order, but I will hear the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Mullin: I was on my feet previously, Mr. Speaker. When I attempted to table a question for the Secretary of State for Defence, asking whether British service men or any other employees of his Department had been involved in providing military training——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is not in order to read out a disallowed question. The matter to which he refers has not been brought to my attention, and if the hon. Gentleman feels strongly, as evidently he does, perhaps he will come to see me. However, he cannot raise that matter openly in this Chamber.

Mr. Mullin: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. My question was blocked. On the one hand, the Government want us to believe that they are not giving aid to Cambodian resistance fighters, and on the other, they decline to answer questions about that matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have no responsibility for questions being blocked.

Statutory Minimum Wage

3.38 pm

Ms. Dawn Primarolo (Bristol, South): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision for the introduction of a statutory minimum wage; to make provision in respect of related duties and responsibilities of employers and wages councils; and for connected purposes.

Members of Parliament enjoy a statutory minimum wage, and it seems wholly wrong that one should be denied to the most poorly paid members of our society. The Government's so-called economic miracle has proved a mirage, especially for the low-paid in our society.

In Hansard on 17 May 1988, the Prime Minister argued that proof of the success of her economic policies was that

"Everyone in the nation has benefited from the increased prosperity".—[Official Report, 17 May 1988; Vol. 133, c. 801.]

I emphasise her word "everyone". That is the so-called trickle-down theory, but the hallmark of that theory under the Government has been the growth of inequality. The gap between the rich and the poor has increased due to the Government's economic and social policies.

The trickle-down theory originated in America, as so many of the Government's ideas do. John Kenneth Galbraith, an American economist, likened the trickle-down theory to the idea that if one feeds sufficient oats to a horse there will eventually be something for the sparrows. He noted that this theory was more popular with the horse than with the sparrow, which is no surprise. We note that directors awarded themselves pay increases in excess of 33 per cent. last year at the same time that the Government told the low-paid to cut their requests for decent wages.

To give an idea of the scope of low pay, I shall quote from evidence from the south-west region, where my constituency is situated, using Government statistics from the new earnings survey, which shows that the region is riddled with dramatic inequalities between men and women, part-time and full-time workers, non-manual and manual workers. The picture highlights, almost to the point of caricature, the fact that the Government's free market policies bring a divided society where economic affluence for some is paid for by poverty pay for many. It is appalling that people who work long, hard hours, sometimes six or seven days a week, should have to claim benefit to attempt to make ends meet.

Pay inequality has reached record levels. The 1990 new earnings survey shows that, in 1979, the lowest paid 10 per cent. of manual workers earned 68·3 per cent. of average pay. In 1990, the figure has dropped to 63 per cent., and it is lower than at any time since records began in 1886. The gap between the best paid and the lowest paid—pay inequality—is worse in 1990 than it was in 1886.

During the past 10 years, the best paid workers have received real pay increases 16 times greater than those for workers on low pay. The causes of low pay are manifold, but it is clear that, without intervention from Westminster, the south-west, like all other regions, will continue to have widening pay inequality and entrenched low pay.

The single market may well make matters worse by enabling more social dumping, whereby European companies can join relocating United Kingdoms firms to exploit the region's low pay.

A major cause of the poverty experienced by hundreds of thousands of workers and their families, in the south-west and elsewhere in the United Kingdom, are the Government's policies, which encourage the spread of low pay and inequality. The Government's lone opposition to the social charter, the proposed abolition of the wages councils, the threat of benefit suspension for unemployed people who refuse to take low-paid jobs, and encouragement for employers to pay benefit level wages in temporary wage top-up schemes all bear witness to that.

In the south-west, three quarters of a million workers —half those in employment—earn wages below the poverty line of £4·16 per hour; 400,000 workers, of whom eight out of 10 are women, would benefit immediately from the introduction of Labour's plans for a statutory minimum wage of £3·10 per hour.

The majority of workers in the south-west earn less than the Council of Europe's decency threshold of £4·32 an hour. Women are twice as likely to be lower paid than men and part-time workers are two and a half times more likely to earn less than £3 an hour. More and more firms are illegally underpaying their workers, but few are prosecuted, since the wages councils have been marginalised and isolated by the Government. We need to introduce a statutory minumum wage and to strengthen the statutory duties of the wages councils to enforce wages and to protect workers who go to them with complaints of low pay.

These rights must be extended to part-time and home workers, thus following the example of the European Community, which is developing the idea of atypical worker—those who do not work a normal working day. Our equality laws need to be strengthened, and social security benefits must be improved in order to reinforce the work of the wages councils. These proposals are a vital tool in the attack on poverty and inequality. Those who own companies have proved that their strategy is to keep as much as possible for themselves and to pay as little as possible to those they employ, thus hitting women workers the hardest.

A statutory minimum wage should be an essential part of our economic strategy. It would help to counter the trend of short-termism in the United Kingdom, whereby low pay and low productivity are chosen as low-cost alternatives to investment in training and equipment. A statutory minimum wage would lessen the danger of the United Kingdom becoming a low-wage region in Europe, by acting as an incentive to United Kingdom employers to pursue high-wage, high-investment and high-productivity business strategies.

Finally, a statutory minimum wage would alleviate the poverty and misery of hundreds of thousands of families whose labour is exploited by unscrupulous, unreasonable and unfair employers. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Ms. Dawn Primarolo, Mrs. Alice Mahon, Mrs. Audrey Wise, Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, Mr. David Hinchliffe, Mr. Bob Cryer, Ms. Diane Abbott, Mr. Dennis Skinner, Mr. Tony Banks, Mr. Brian Sedgemore and Mrs. Maria Fyfe.

STATUTORY MINIMUM WAGE

Ms. Dawn Primarolo accordingly presented a Bill to make provision for the introduction of a statutory minimum wage; to make provision in respect of related duties and responsibilities of employers and wages councils; and for connected purposes; and the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 19 October and to be printed.—[Bill 198.]

Orders of the Day

Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill [Lords]

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered. Motion made, and Question proposed.

That the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill [Lords], as amended, be considered in the following order, namely, new Clauses relating to Part I, Amendments to Part I, new Schedules relating to Part I, new Clauses relating to Part II, Amendments to Part II, new Schedules relating to Part II, new Clauses relating to Part III, Amendments to Part III, new Schedules relating to Part III, other new Clauses, other Amendments, other new Schedules. —[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

3.48 pm

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): Before we get down to a detailed consideration of the Bill as it now stands, I am bound to express on behalf of my colleagues and some of those on the other side of the House extreme concern about the way in which, even at this late stage, the Bill has been handled by the Government. From start to finish, it has been a shambles.

After the long summer recess, we thought that we were coming back to deal in a reasonably civilised way with what was left of the Bill—a much improved Bill after the changes and the arrangements made in Committee between the Opposition and the Government to remove certain clauses. We thought that we were coming back to consider about 30 new clauses and 150 amendments. I freely accept and welcome the fact that many of the new clauses and amendments were the result of concessions made by the Government to Members on both sides of the Committee. So far, so good.

There was also some new business that the Government wished to introduce, which again was perfectly acceptable to us. However, as recently as Saturday morning, through the medium of the radio, we learned that the Government had decided to introduce into the Bill at this late stage two major and extremely contentious clauses. They are not contentious in the sense that we wish to oppose the spirit that lies behind them, but the new clauses merit a great deal of debate and they would have been debated had they been introduced in Committee. But they were not; and now, literally days before the Bill returned to the House, we were given notice that the Government intended to introduce two new clauses.

I refer in particular to the clauses on children's evidence, live television links and supervised attendance orders. We will not oppose those clauses, but at every stage of the progress of the Bill, the legal process in Scotland has been treated with contempt. If the Government accepted that the clauses could not be dealt with fully in Committee —heaven knows, there were enough hours in Committee to debate many matters—how on earth can they logically justify moving them at this stage and saying, "You will now have to consider these matters with 30 new clauses and 150 amendments"? As the Minister well knows, we have at most a day and a half in which to dispense with that business.

Labour Members will do their best to improve what will go on to the statute book. These are matters of concern, importance and complexity, so it is beyond reason to suppose that we shall deal with the major issue of television evidence from children or the extraordinarily major reform in Scottish criminal proceedings of supervised attendance orders being available for fine defaulters in anything like the detail or seriousness that the subjects demand.

It is right that we register our protest at this stage and advise the people of Scotland that, once again, important legal reform is being dealt with by the Government in this cavalier manner. They are interested not in passing what is right but in getting the legislation on the statute book in any shape or form. We will do our best tonight, but once again the behaviour of the Government is a disgrace.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I can reply quite briefly to the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) and will do so in the same spirit as he approached the subject.

We have a substantial task ahead of us, but I am sure that the House will recognise that the bulk of the amendments were tabled as a result of concessions and commitments given to Back Benchers in Committee. We would be failing in our duty if we did not honour those commitments.

Much of parts I and II of the Bill are complex matters of law, so it is important to take the opportunity on Report to make the drafting as clear and straightforward as possible. We have had to consider carefully the drafting of part II in the light of changes made in Committee. We dropped several clauses in parts III and IV in accordance with the understanding that they would not be reintroduced. Where we have brought forward new issues, the reason has generally been that an issue was raised but not debated in Committee, which was certainly the case in relation to child evidence. The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) was right to raise that matter in Committee, and he made it clear that he would seek to return to it on Report.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow) rose——

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I hope to reply positively to the hon. Gentleman later, when we debate child evidence.

Dr. Godman: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is the Minister speaking on a point of order?

Mr. Speaker: It is not a point of order. This is the consideration motion, which is debateable.

Dr. Godman: I seek an assurance from the Minister in order to save time. Will he confirm that the Government will accept all my new clauses on children giving evidence in criminal proceedings?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I intend to accept the central point on video evidence. That does not include every aspect of new clause 1, but we shall go into the details later. I am grateful that the hon. Gentleman reintroduced the new clause.

The dropping of certain provisions on fines had unforeseen effects which made necessary the introduction of the provision on supervised attendance orders. I should be grateful if Opposition Members could exercise a willing suspension of disbelief until we reach new clause 20. For our part, we are ready to debate any of the points that Opposition Members may consider raise large issues and to explain why we regard the provisions as necessary and desirable in the interests of the Scottish people.

Question put and agreed to.

New Clause 16

DESIGNATED RELIGIOUS BODIES

".—(1) The Secretary of State may from time to time, by order, designate for the purposes of this section such recognised bodies as appear to him—

(a) to have as their principal purpose the promotion of a religious objective;

(b) to have as their principal activity the regular holding of acts of public worship; and

(c) to be bodies which satisfy each of the conditions mentioned in subsection (2) below.

(2) The conditions referred to in subsection (1)(c) above are—

(a) subject to subsection (4) below, that the body has been established in Scotland for not less than 10 years;

(b) that the body can demonstrate to the satisfaction of the Secretary of State that it has a membership of not less than 3,000 persons resident in Scotland who are 16 years of age or more; and

(c) that the internal organisation of the body is such that one or more authorities in Scotland exercise supervisory and disciplinary functions in respect of the component elements of the body and, in particular, that there are imposed on such component elements requirements as to the keeping of accounting records and the auditing of accounts which appear to the Secretary of State to correspond to those required by sections 3 and 4 of this Act.

(3) Where a body is, for the time being, designated under subsection (1) above the following provisions of this Part of this Act shall not apply to the body nor to any component or structural element of the body which is, itself, a recognised body—

section 1(5);
section 3;
section 4, other than subsections (6) to (8) and subsection (12);
section 5(2) and (6);
section 6; and
section 7.

(4) The Secretary of State may determine that the condition mentioned in subsection (2)(a) above shall not be required to be satisfied in the case of a body—

(a) which has been created by the amalgamation of two or more bodies each of which, immediately before the amalgamation, either was designated under this section or appears to the Secretary of State to have been eligible for such designation; or

(b) which has been constituted by persons who have removed themselves from membership of a body which, immediately before such removal, was so designated or appears to the Secretary of State to have been eligible for such designation.".—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I found this the most difficult issue in the Bill. I will try to sum up quickly our point of view on it. New clause 16, in its former guise as new clause 2, was the subject of prolonged debate in Committee. As a result of the concerns of many hon. Members, I agreed to withdraw new clause 2 for further consideration. Having given the matter further thought, I concluded that the new clause should be part of the Bill with only a minor modification to its former form. New clause 16 seeks to provide a measure of exemption from the supervisory and accounting provisions of Part I for religious organisations with a substantial following in Scotland.

Forceful representations were made to the Government that charities for the advancement of religion—Churches—are in some respects a special case. Religious freedom is, of course, a fundamental right of people in this country, and we must be careful that, in establishing a system of supervision, we do not prejudice or appear to prejudice that.

The person concerned with the management and control of a religious charity will frequently be the religious leader of the community. To suspend a religious leader, as the court will be entitled to do for mismanagement of the secular affairs of the religious body, might be viewed as improper interference by the secular authority in spiritual matters. The state is, of course, most anxious not to become involved in any way in the spiritual affairs of the charity.

A most important consideration is that, if we were to provide a blanket exemption for all bodies established for the advancement of religion, many undesirable, cult-like bodies would escape control. Some unscrupulous people might, indeed, deliberately set up charities with spurious religious purposes to escape the controls contained in the Bill. That must be avoided.

A distinction also needs to be drawn between taking action to intervene in a Church's affairs or to enforce compliance, on the one hand, and simply including the Churches within the purview of those provisions concerned with disclosure, accounts and the Lord Advocate's right to investigate, on the other.

Yet a further consideration, and one about which hon. Members who served in Committee were particularly concerned, is that, for obvious reasons, we do not wish to discriminate in favour of one religion over another on grounds of religious doctrine. That is certainly no business of the state.

New clause 16 affords religious organisations capable of meeting certain criteria the opportunity of opting out from the supervisory and investigatory functions of the Lord Advocate and the courts. It enables them to prepare accounts in the manner in which they have in the past, provided that such accounts are generally of a standard similar to those provided for in clauses 3 and 4. It removes the possibility of sanctions being applied for non-compliance, but retains a right for members of the public to seek copies of accounts and the explanatory document.

The provisions are necessarily a compromise, but I believe that they strike a reasonable balance between ensuring that there is internal control within the religious body as regards discipline and the requirement for production of accounts, and preserving a right for the public to be informed, while removing from such bodies anxiety, however misplaced it may seem, about interference by the state.

This is difficult territory, and any solution must be a compromise. The new clause has the support of the Scottish Churches Committee, a body representing all the major Churches in Scotland whose combined membership of people over the age of 16 amounts to 1,600,000. Despite widespread reporting of the Standing Committee's consideration of the original clause and our having since consulted the minor Christian Churches and the non-Christian religions in Scotland, including the Jewish congregations, members of the Islamic and Hindu faiths,

[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton]

Jehovah's Witnesses, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the Religious Society of Friends, the Salvation Army and a wide variety of smaller bodies, I have received no representations to the effect that the provisions are unacceptable. On the other hand, I have received strong representations from the Scottish Churches Committee, the Moderator of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland and various parish ministers to the effect that the new clause should be introduced.

4 pm

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): I wonder whether the Minister could clarify a matter that is causing me some apprehension. It arises from the justification that he has advanced for the clause. Do I understand that one reason for the clause is to ensure that the Lord Advocate does not have to intervene in the affairs of religious charities in the same way as he might have to intervene in the affairs of non-religious charities?

Surely the issue concerns the standard of conduct and the standard of behaviour of a charity, whether it is of religious origin or not. It is most curious to say that the exemption is being introduced for the purpose of ensuring that the Lord Advocate does not apply the same standard to religious charities as, by law, he would be obliged to apply to non-religious charities.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It is necessarily a compromise, and the public would retain the right to be informed. It is important that the larger Churches should be in a position to administer their own affairs and to have a two-tier system of supervision. It is important that they should have the opportunity to administer that system. We have specified the membership figure of 3,000 because an organisation with fewer members might not necessarily be able to form its own supervisory arrangements, and we had to be certain of that point. The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) said that he wanted the smaller Churches to be properly consulted and many more of them will be included under the present new clause.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): We are starting what I think will be a long journey through this evening, and this will not be the most unimportant of our debates. A great deal of interest was expressed in this subject in Committee and a great many arguments were put to the Minister. The Minister is noted for his courtesy in debate, and perhaps we were misled by that. At the end of our mammoth discussion, he said that he would take away new clause 2, as it then was, and would reconsider it in the light of the many points that had been put to him. I suspect that there will be some disappointment that the changes and adjustments have been made on such a migerly basis——

Mr. Menzies Campbell: Eh?

Mr. Dewar: It is a new word. I have just invented it. I am rather good at that. I hope that Hansard will transcribe it accurately, because it represents a nice amalgam of the two words from which it derives.

As I understand it, the only change that the Minister has been able to offer involves bringing the qualifying mark for membership down from 5,000, as it was originally, to 3,000. If one crosses that mark and meets the other obligations and qualifications set out in the new clause, one may get the advantages off the exemptions that are provided.

I have some sympathy with the Minister, because I realise that he was attacked from two totally different directions during our earlier exchanges. A number of people took the view that there was no logical case for the exemption. The hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) and perhaps the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) were among them. The former argued, perhaps in rather extreme terms, that religious bodies were just as prone to wrongdoing as any other body.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): I have always understood that it was an assumption of the Christian Church that we all sin and that the purpose of a church was that we went there to be forgiven. The new clause is based on the assumption that Christians sin less than others. If that is the case, what is the point of the Church?

Mr. Dewar: Indeed. To answer the hon. and learned Gentleman's question with all the seriousness that it deserves, if he examined the Presbyterian doctrine and in particular the doctrine of predestination, he would see that the Church is extremely useful in explaining to people who sin that they can still get to heaven and continue to sin in the meantime. That is a very comforting theological position, which I offer as worthy of study even to an unreconstructed member of the Scottish Episcopalian Church like the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross.

To return to the serious matter under discussion, the Minister had to withstand criticism from the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross, who said that religious bodies are just as prone to wrongdoing as any other body. From that, the Minister argued that we should have no exemption for religious bodies. I did not accept that point of view; many of my colleagues and I were more worried about the fact that the exemption did not seem to be worth very much and the hurdles were such, to borrow a phrase from another setting, that it would be as easy for a religious body to gain the advantages of the exemptions as it would be for a rich man to get through the eye of a needle. Many people who should not be excluded would be excluded. That was our worry and that concern remains.

I do not want to go through all the arguments, but I want to encourage the Minister to comment further on this matter. I am particularly concerned about the worth and practical application of the exemptions. Let us assume that a body has qualified for the exemptions as a religious body. The particularly important points are the accounts records in clause 3 and the annual accounts provisions in clause 4. We are told that a recognised body will not have to conform to those provisions.

That is a quite substantial concession until, as I said in Committee, we consider new clause 16(2)(c), which states that there must be accounting records

"and the auditing of accounts which appear to the Secretary of State to correspond to those required by sections 3 and 4 of this Act."

I do not think that I am being obtuse or difficult when I suggest to the Minister that it is not clear what the exemption is worth. We do not need to accord with clauses

3 and 4 or to run our accounts in compliance with those clauses, so long as the Secretary of State is "satisfied" that our accounts and audits correspond to clauses 3 and 4. That is a little puzzling, and the Minister should comment on it.

Presumably there is a distinction between the two positions. Presumably a Church will be able to say to its auditor—or its board of managers, if it is part of the Church of Scotland—"We can accord to a certain standard which will get past the Secretary of State's scrutiny, but that is a lesser standard than that demanded by sections 3 and 4 of the Act, from which we are exempt."

What is that gap? I agree that that is difficult for the Minister to answer, because it may not be defined. If the Minister defines it too generously, he will be open to attack by the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross, who will say that he is lowering the standards and allowing the sinner to run away with the Church funds, metaphorically—and perhaps literally. On the other hand, if the Minister says that he will make it so tight that at the end of the day it will be just like clauses 3 and 4, as the new clause states, what on earth is the advantage of this new clause and this provision?

The nub of the problem is that we do not know what we are being asked to agree to. Even those of us who have been reasonably diligent and have sat through the many hours of debate and have examined the new clause are none the wiser. That is the kernel of the argument. The Lord Advocate's powers of interdict and suspension under clause 5(2) and (6) and the powers of the Court of Session to manage under clause 6 are comparatively minor matters. At the end of the day, they arise only when some form of defalsification has been flushed out. There is a case for saying that, if that has happened in a charity, in any event those powers should apply.

I ask the Minister to turn his mind to those matters. He warned us that he did not wish in any way to get involved in the spiritual affairs of the nation. His ancestors used to interfere freely in the spiritual affairs of the nation, as I remember from reading 17th-century Scottish history, but I do not want to encourage him in that respect. He started in his usual beguiling way by inviting us all to have a willing suspension of disbelief. My concern is that to accept the new clause or to pretend that we know what it means we must also have a willing suspension of disbelief. I am not very willing in that respect. The Minister must say a good deal more before he can expect hon. Members to nod the measure through.

I am not in the least bit happy. I recognise that the Minister has a powerful argument and that he wrote to many organisations and that none objected. I must take cognisance of that, of course, but many questions, such as the definition of membership, are still unresolved. I fear that a large number of people in perfectly bona fide religious sects operating in Scotland at the moment may find that they are disqualifed from the advantages, ill-defined though they are, of this new clause. The Minister must be a good deal more specific than he has been so far.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I do not want to traverse the ground that was traversed at length in Committee. The new clause comes forward in substantially the same form as was considered by the Committee. I repeat one point that the Minister has not dealt with, and that is that subsection (1)(b) provides that, to qualify a body must "have as their principal activity the regular holding of acts of public worship".

Certain religious bodies undoubtedly have as their principal purpose the promotion of a religious objective but do not necessarily have as their principal activity the regular holding of acts of public worship. Indeed, by their exclusive nature, some bodies do not permit admission to their ceremonies to people other than those who are already members. Therefore, they cannot be regarded as having as their principal activity the regular holding of acts of public worship, because the public do not have an unfettered right of access.

That provision is unnecessarily restrictive. If a body is bona fide of a religious nature and has as its principal purpose a religious objective, why should it be subject to the restriction which this provision necessarily provides, that it must reflect that religious objective in the regular holding of acts of public worship? That point was raised in Committee, and so far in our proceedings the Minister has not considered it.

I also draw to the Minister's attention subsection (2)(b), which reflects an alteration. The figure before the Committee was 5,000, not 3,000. There must be a justification for that change, and no doubt the Minister will tell us what it is.

One of the effects of setting such a relatively high target is that a religious body that is set up with its principal purpose the promotion of a religious objective, even one that has as its principal activity the regular holding of acts of public worship, will not be able to qualify for the exemption that this new clause provides until it can demonstrate that it has a membership of 3,000 or more. That means that, for small bodies that start up, it may be difficult, if not impossible, to reach the threshold, yet they may be bona fide bodies that have as their principal purpose the promotion of religious objectives.

Why has that hurdle been created in that way? What is the justification for inserting a threshold in terms of numbers? The new clause is far from satisfactory. I regret to say, bearing in mind what has already been described as the Minister's beguiling approach, that he has not really taken to heart the effective criticism that was advanced against the new clause in Committee. That is a great pity, because the exemption is something that we should introduce into our law for the benefit of religious bodies. It is a great pity if the exemption, as drafted, makes it difficult for certain bodies, which would otherwise justifiably be entitled to claim that exemption, to bring themselves within the embrace of the provision.

I hope that the Minister will at least consider the matters that I have raised and now tell the House something of the thinking behind the new clause.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): This will be just a short intervention. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will tell us something about the thinking behind the change to 3,000 members, and about which Churches will now be exempted that were not exempted before. That would give us some idea about the discussions and consultations that he has had since the Committee gave the almost unanimous view that the original clause was not satisfactory. I am sure that my hon. Friend has had discussions with various Churches, so perhaps he could let us know which ones made him change his mind.

4.15 pm

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): I am disappointed that the Minister has brought these provisions back to the House, because they have nothing to do with the right to religious freedom. It is confusing the issue—deliberately, in my view—for the Minister to introduce the new clause by making it clear that everyone has the right to exercise religious freedom. There is no debate about that. There is no difference between any of us participating in this debate on the issue of a person's right to exercise religious freedom.

I am not saying that I do not believe the Minister when I say that I am surprised that the Scottish Churches Committee has not written to hon. Members on this issue. Scottish Churches are never slow to write to hon. Members on a range of issues—that is quite right, and I am not criticising them for it—but in this debate we are being led to believe that, although this is an issue on which Scottish Churches feel strongly, and although they knew that we would debate the matter today, they have not taken the trouble to write to the right hon. and hon. Members.

I should like to nail my colours to the mast erected by the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn). Here I part company, to a certain extent, with my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), because I do not accept that Church charities—religious charities—should be treated separately or differently from the Royal National Lifeboat Institution, the boy scouts, the Boys Brigade or any other reputable charity in Scotland.

I have not yet heard any explanation for that exemption or difference in treatment. If the Minister is making an exception, I do not understand why it should apply only to a religious body. Furthermore, I honestly cannot see the difference between a religious body that has 3,000 members and one that has 30 members. They are both religious bodies. The new clause is so artificial that it does not bear discussion in this House. However, as the Minister has tabled it, we must discuss it.

As a member of the Church of Scotland, I know what happens when the Church decides to remove non-communicants from the roll. I suspect—I have no doubt that I shall receive a letter from the Church either rejecting or confirming my comments—that in future, in order to keep the number on the roll above the numerical limit that the Bill seeks to impose, fewer non-communicants will be removed from the register than in the past. I do not believe that that will do religious worship, the Church of Scotland or any other religious organisation any credit.

What saddens me even more—I shall not say "angers me" because I have never found it possible to get angry with the Minister—is that we could have defeated him in Committee and taken the clause out of the Bill. In those circumstances, the Minister would not have dared to bring it back to the House, but we took the Minister at his word when he told us that he was going to take the clause away and have a rethink. But he has brought it back, and the extent of the rethink is a reduction from 5,000 to 3,000 in the level of qualifying membership.

I shall not vote against the new clause, because there are other important aspects of the Bill that my colleagues want to discuss. However, I want to place on record my regret that the Minister has chosen to table the new clause. I would love to hear an explanation of why religious charities should be treated differently from the Royal National Lifeboat Institution, the Boys' Brigade, the boy scouts, the Cancer Research Campaign, the Multiple Sclerosis Society or any other charity with national standing that anyone cares to name. There is no difference, because they all serve a marvellous purpose and should all be treated on the same basis. One of them should not be given privileged treatment, as it is in the new clause.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): I do not often agree with the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing), but he has put his finger accurately on a number of key points that the House must consider. Like him, I was not only disappointed but astonished when my hon. Friend the Minister, with his customary courtesy, told me last night, when I had not yet read the amendments, that the new clause would be on the Notice Paper for the House to consider today. While the Minister said that he would take away the clause and reconsider it, which he has done—the House should be clear about that—my interpretation of the debate, like that of every other member of the Committee, was that the clause would either be withdrawn completely or radically altered.

Let us consider the history of the new clause. The Bill has taken a long time to pass through the two houses, and the provisions were not in the original Bill or in the Bill considered by the other House. To my knowledge, the matter was not raised in the other House, although I could be wrong. It certainly was not raised on Second Reading, but suddenly came to the Committee out of the blue, where it was torn apart by both sides of the Committee. The hon. Member for Falkirk, East was undoubtedly correct to say that, if the original clause had been forced to a Division in Committee, it would have been lost.

Although he has spoken with his customary courtesy, my hon. Friend the Minister must expand his explanation and tell us who are making the representations for the new clause. He has mentioned a committee. Like the hon. Member for Falkirk, East and all Scottish Members, I receive a large number of representations from Churches of all denominations on a wide range of issues. I have not received representations from people arguing for the new clause. My hon. Friend the Minister has referred to the strong representations that he has received, and I have no doubt that the Scottish Office has received strong representations. But if Churches feel so strongly about the matter, why have hon. Members not received strong representations? My hon. Friend the Minister is not at the pearly gates yet and does not answer to the Churches but to the House and to hon. Members.

The Minister has said that there are no objections from the minor churches—I think that that is the correct term —or the non-Christian Churches. I realised that point in Committee, and I am grateful to him for consulting non-Christian churches. Will he tell the House more about what "no objections" means? It could simply mean that a letter is still sitting in somebody's pile somewhere. There is a difference between people positively saying that they are quite content with something, and not responding to it at all.

My fundamental objection to the new clause, even as amended, relates to the point made by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) in Committee. I should prefer there to be no exemptions, but if there are to be exemptions let them be logical and rational. What is the justification for 3,000? This is not a statutory instrument; the House is considering primary legislation which cannot be changed without a new Bill. What happens if a Church passes the threshold or if it becomes a little less popular and drops just below the 3,000 point? Who is to decide? The House should not readily agree to the idea of a numerical threshold anyway.

In passing, it is worth pointing out that, if the new clause had been around in Jerusalem in AD 30, our Lord and his disciples would not have qualified—they would not have met the criteria. There was no way in which they could have formed a designated religious body.

The House is being asked to differentiate between religious bodies on purely arbitrary grounds: the number of years for which they have been established and the number of members that they allegedly have. Dividing Churches into these two categories on the basis of wholly arbitrary criteria is fundamentally wrong.

Mr. Jim Sillars (Glasgow, Govan): Those of us who come in on Report are at a disadvantage compared with hon. Members who took part in the detailed, intimate examination in Committee, but it is interesting to see a consensus developing between the hon. Members for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) and for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart). I go along with them; I see no rational grounds for the new clause. Indeed, the hon. Member for Eastwood took it apart, and if it was taken apart in Committee, the most sensible course of action would be for the Minister to withdraw it this afternoon.

I agree with the hon. Members for Eastwood and for Falkirk, East that there is no sense in trying to exclude all other organisations by including the religious bodies. Let us examine the new clause in the light of the Minister's argument. Religious bodies are designated, but subsections (1)(a) and (b) contains a serious contradiction, which would probably exclude the adherents of Islam. Subsection (1)(a) reads:

"to have as their principal purpose the promotion of a religious objective".

Islam would probably qualify under that, but there is a second condition:

"to have as their principal activity the regular holding of acts of public worship".

It does not necessarily follow that that would include Islam. In fact, arguments could be adduced to show that it excludes Islam, which is very different in its theology and practice from the Christian religion.

Public acts of worship form an important part of the whole ethos of Christianity, but the same is not true of Islam. For example, the adherents of Islam pray five times a day—there is a moving clock as the year progresses. There are no major acts of public worship at 2 am either in Glasgow or in Saudi Arabia. Islam is noted for a fundamental belief that there is a short and direct connection between the adherent and God, whereas in Christianity there are many moderators between the adherent and God. Ministers and priests play a far larger role in the Christian religion than do their counterparts, if such there be, in Islam, particularly among Sunni Muslims.

If I were a follower of Islam, where would I fit in in those circumstances? It may be an unhappy consequence of putting new clause 16 on the statute book that, somewhere along the line in two or three years' time, an Islamic group comes along, there is a proper reading of the statute and they are told that, unlike their Christian brethren along the road, they are excluded from the provisions of what the hon. Member for Eastwood correctly pointed out is not a statutory instrument that can be easily altered but a fundamental Act of Parliament. I think that we are entitled to hear from the Minister whether I am correct in my interpretation of the potential exclusion of Islam from subsection (1)(a) and (b).

I noticed that, in the letter that the Minister sent to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar)—copies of which were received by members of the Committee—he said that he did not receive representations from minority and non-Christian organisations. However, did he specifically raise with the Islamic community in Scotland the problems that might arise under new clause 16?

4.30 pm

Dr. Godman: I wish to express disappointment at the conduct of the Minister, who is usually a generous and courteous Member of the House. He has not played the game with Committee members over the new clause.

As others have said, the new clause might well have suffered defeat as it was originally worded if it had been put to a vote in Committee. The Minister will recall that I expressed serious reservations about its precursor. My concern was that small sects—such as Brethren, which have existed in some of our maritime communities for a considerable time—might well be excluded from the new clause because they had fewer than 3,000 members. Such small religious bodies are increasingly populated by elderly members; as the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) has said, what happens when their numbers fall below 3,000? The figure of 3,000 is the defining criterion in the new clause.

I should like to hear from the Minister whether he or his officials contacted any of those small religious bodies in our maritime communities—and other communities—to obtain their views on such a clause. I repeat that he has not played the game, and my advice to him is, "Take the new clause away".

Where the interests of small and perhaps declining—in terms of numbers—sects are concerned, it is not good enough. The Minister should think again before attempting to bring such a measure to the House.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: I do not want to be contentious on this Bill. I apologise to the Minister if by the slightest chance he feels that I am being duplicitous, but the new clause was not among the many communications that he sent me, with great courtesy and kindness. It therefore came as a surprise to me to discover, at 2.30 pm, that the new clause had got back into the Bill.

I think that the matter is far more serious than has been suggested by any hon. Member who has spoken so far. We have not been slightly annoyed or partially misled; nor do we think that it is not quite right in detail. We have been totally misled, and it is entirely wrong in principle. As those who were not on the Committee will not know, but those who had the fortune—or misfortune—to be on it will, if we had not been misled, without the slightest question the new clause would have been roundly defeated and would never again have seen the light of day. In a spirit of Christian peace and light, we interpreted the Minister's view to be that he would take the animal out of the stable and that it would have its throat cut out of our view. However, it has come back and that is a rotten trick with which to start the debate on Report. I beg the Minister to do the honourable thing and forget it.

It is offensive that the new clause again proceeds upon a false principle that was torn apart by hon. Members in all parts of the House. Either out of deference towards what is called religion, whatever that may be—I do not think that one could get agreement on it—or because of some fear of touching the cloth, we divide Christians into non-sinners or presumed non-sinners and those who work for or collect funds for a charity, who are assumed to be guilty.

We should be clear about some of the exemptions that apply to the so-called religious bodies. To illustrate that, one can do no better than to look at clause 7(1) which says:

"A person who—

(a) has been convicted of an offence involving dishonesty;

(b) is an undischarged bankrupt;

(c) has been removed, under section 6 of this Act, from being concerned in the management or control of any body; or

(d) is subject to a disqualification order under the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986."

That person is allowed to act for a religious charity but not for any other. I can understand the concepts of compassion and forgiveness of sin, but I cannot understand why a Christian who has committed a crime of dishonesty should not be allowed to raise funds for lifeboats whereas a Christian who is an undischarged bankrupt or who has been convicted of a crime of dishonesty is allowed to raise funds for a priest's retirement. The whole concept is not only confused but basically dishonest.

Let us look further into the matter. I do not know why it should be assumed that we do not touch the cloth. I have defended a few priests for the most serious offences. I appeared in a case in which the priest said to Lord Wheatley, who was a Catholic, "I suppose you will not expect me to give evidence that breaks the confidentiality of confession." Lord Wheatley said, "No, and I will not expect you to commit perjury either, by breaking the oath that I have just administered. My advice to you, Father, is to bring your toothbrush tomorrow."

Dr. Godman: I hope that that was not in Greenock.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: There are no lady priests, so this one could not be confined in Greenock.

I understand that we are all equal in the sight of God. This new clause arises from a ridiculous English concept that the established Church is somehow above the law. It has nothing to do with Scotland. Surely the Christian or the religious person would be the first to put his hand before the fire and the first to say, "Search my pockets, take my records, arrest me, prosecute me, do what you will for I know that I am pure," or "I know that I have sinned" —whichever it is.

As I said earlier, even with a membership down to 3,000 —I do not know whether that is at the Lord Chancellor's behest—half the split Free Presbyterian Church does not qualify. It is split into two parts, one of which consists of about 1,200 members. That is the part that thinks that it has the funds, which is a good reason, if ever there was a good reason, why it should not be exempted. I do not know whether the good Samaritan was an atheist. I do not understand why assumptions should be made about his charity if it were discovered that he was, or was not, a faithful Samaritan.

This is a most serious matter. The new clause refers to minor religious bodies, whatever a religious body might be. I should have thought that the fervency of those who collect for lifeboat charities—for those in peril on the sea —would make them a religious body. I should have thought that the fervency of those who collect for the Save the Children Fund would make them a religious body. First, the clause is meaningless; secondly, it is hypocritical; thirdly, it is alien to the law of Scotland; and fourthly, it is an affront and wrong to exempt certain people from the activities of the Lord Advocate—when charities have to be subjected to such—on the presumption of holiness.

I remember a case in Glasgow when the head of the criminal investigation department declined to arrest a priest because he was of the cloth. That priest turned his back until he reached Ireland, where he successfully resisted his extradition to Britain on the ground that the explosives in his possession made his a political crime—yet in the witness box in Glasgow he had given evidence in support of my client and claimed that he had no knowledge of those explosives.

We should not imagine that the human beings who profess a religious belief—whatever that is—and can persuade 2,999 others to join them are holier than the rest of us. So that he can demonstrate that he is not holier than the rest of us, I suggest that my hon. Friend the Minister withdraws the clause so that we can proceed with the Bill.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): The Minister said that the purpose of the 3,000 limit was, at least in part, to exclude cult Churches from benefiting under the clause. I hope that he agrees that neither the Society of Friends nor the Unitarian Church could be described as cult organisations. However, their numbers in Scotland may well fall below the 3,000 limit. Has the Minister consulted either of those Churches and does he know specifically what the impact on them will be if the clause is passed?

My local Unitarian Church in Dundee has asked me to do everything possible to ensure that the clause is not reinstated in the Bill. If that is the flavour coming from Dundee, I suspect that it is the flavour coming from the Quakers and the Unitarian Church throughout Scotland. I hope that the Minister will deal specifically with the question of those two Churches. When he listed the minor Churches that had been consulted, he did not mention either of them.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): I do not want to prolong the debate on this issue because there are a great many important aspects of the Bill that we wish to discuss. The Minister's press release referred to the question posed by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sillars) about consultation with the minor Churches, including non-Christian denominations. The Minister nods. Does he recall that that point was pressed vigorously in Committee by several hon. Members, and that he undertook to begin that consultation?

To which bodies did the Minister write? To which non-Christian denominations did he write? When did he write to them? What length of time did he give them to reply? My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) said that the Unitarian Church had expressed concern about the Bill, but it appears from the Minister's press release that it did not take the opportunity to reply. Perhaps it did not have sufficient time to do so. The Government have a bad record on the way in which they consult—it is often done in a manner designed to create the least possible dissent from their views.

4.45 pm

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Some hon. Members have questioned the disapplication of the provision for exempted religious bodies. All religious bodies would probably view the question of what criteria should be used in the appointment of their members to offices in their organisations as a matter for them. We felt that it was necessary to recognise the legitimate interest of religious bodies, and we have therefore retained the provision for such bodies. We have incorporated the two-tier supervisory structure. That will provide the public with the necessary reassurance that the religious bodies will apply their own tests of reasonableness within their own structures. We believe that they will make decisions in which their members and the public can have confidence. Any religious body, on the introduction of a two-tier structure, can obtain the benefit of the exemption provisions.

The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) referred to the Unitarian Church. It is ruled out because it does not have a two-tier structure. It is a member of the Scottish Churches Committee, which supports the clause, although the Unitarian Church may not. The Society of Friends would not meet the criteria. It may, however, be a recognised English body. Following consultation, it is clear that the religious bodies, especially the Scottish Churches Committee, strongly support the provision.

The question posed by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sillars) concerns me. I have every reason to believe that there is no impediment to giving Muslims recognition under subsection (1)(b). We explained to all the bodies consulted exactly what the clause contained.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) mentioned the keeping of accounts. That is covered in subsection (2)(c), which requires that "the internal organisation of the body is such that one or more authorities in Scotland exercise supervisory and disciplinary functions in respect of the component elements of the body and, in particular, that there are imposed on such component elements requirements as to the keeping of accounting records and the auditing of accounts which appear to the Secretary of State to correspond"— that is the important word—

"to those required by sections 3 and 4 of this Act."

Mr. Dewar: I do not understand the meaning of the word "correspond" in this context. If the Minister is saying that the component elements will have to meet the exact same tests as those included in clauses 3 and 4, by definition the exemption is worthless. If he is saying that they do not have to meet those tests, the word "correspond" appears to have a rather peculiar definition, which he should give us.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: As a rough and ready definition, the word "correspond" means "equivalent to". The point is that the Churches wish to exercise the supervision themselves. The question is whether they can be trusted to do that satisfactorily in the public interest, and I believe that they can.

Mr. Dewar: The Minister has said something of interest, which I wish to understand. It appears that he is saying that, for the accounts and auditing procedures, he anticipates that the Secretary of State will insist on exactly the same standards as if clauses 3 and 4 applied. If so, it is not a matter of trusting the Churches, because it is the duty of the Secretary of State to be satisfied on that point and to insist upon it. The Minister is giving the Secretary of State the job of insisting that, in effect, clauses 3 and 4 are complied with. That is a distinction without merit.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I do not see why there should be any concern about the accounts. The Churches are concerned instead about whom they should appoint to the offices in question. They feel that should be a matter for them, that they should have their own supervisory arrangements, and that they can perform those functions at least as well as anybody else. They do not want the state to interfere in their affairs. Whether or not their fears are well founded, they firmly hold the convictions that they do.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: The Minister's announcement that Quakers will not qualify under new clause 16 will come as something of a surprise to people in Scotland. That apart, the clause introduces a new limit of 3,000 persons, whereas the figure was 5,000 in Committee. Why has that change been made, and what is the purpose anyway of a qualifying figure? If the organisation fulfils the other criteria but has only 1,500 members, why should it be debarred from taking advantage of the exemption in new clause 16?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The purpose was to avoid the inevitable descent into sects. A line had to be drawn somewhere, but not so low that cults having dubious purposes would be admitted. After due consultation, it was felt that a figure of 3,000 provided a suitable dividing line at this stage—although, in my view, it could be reviewed in due course.

The bodies that were consulted were the Hebrew congregation, the Islamic faith, Jehovah's Witnesses, the Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter Day Saints, the Society of Friends, the Salvation Army, and a variety of smaller bodies.

Mr. Sillars: What will happen if there is a cult with 4,000 members?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: That will depend on whether it satisfies the terms of the clause. I use the word "cult" advisedly. The hon. Gentleman may recall that some years ago a person who purported to be a religious leader caused a large number of young people to commit suicide. We must obviously be extremely careful, for that is not the type of activity that should be supported.

All the Churches that I mentioned have memberships above the 5,000 limit. I remind right hon. and hon. Members that new clause 16 has the support of all the major Churches in Scotland, representing more than 1·5 million members over the age of 16. No body has made strong representations against the provisions.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 23

DORMANT ACCOUNTS OF CHARITIES IN BANKS ETC

'(1) The Secretary of State may appoint a person to be the Scottish charities nominee (in this section referred to as "the nominee") who shall have the functions conferred by this section.

(2) Where the nominee receives from a relevant institution the following information—

(a) that every account held by the institution in the name of or on behalf of a named body is dormant; and

(b) the amount of the balance standing to the credit of the body in each such account, and he is satisfied that the body is a recognised body, subsection (3) or, as the case may be, subsection (5) below shall apply as regards the body and such accounts.

(3) Where the aggregate amount standing to the credit of the body in such accounts as are mentioned in subsection (2) above does not exceed £5,000, unless it appears to the nominee—

(a) that a person is concerned in the management or control of the body; or

(b) that there are circumstances relating to the body which would make it inappropriate to do so,

he shall transfer the balance standing to the credit of the body in such accounts to such other recognised body as he may determine, having regard to the purposes of the body in whose name or on whose behalf the accounts are held and those of the body to which it is proposed to transfer the funds; and the body to which the funds are transfered under this subsection or subsection (4) below shall be entitled to apply such funds for its purposes as it thinks fit.

(4) Where, in the case of a body to which subsection (3) above applies, the nominee is unable to ascertain the purposes of the body in whose name or on whose behalf such accounts are held, he shall transfer the balance standing in the name of the body concerned to such other recognised body as appears to him expedient.

(5) Where the aggregate amount standing to the credit of the body in such accounts as are mentioned in subsection (2) above exceeds £5,000 or in any case to which paragraphs (a) or (b) of subsection (3) above applies, the nominee shall advise the Lord Advocate of the information received by him in respect of the body and of any other matter which appears to him to be relevant in the circumstances.

(6) Where the Lord Advocate receives information in pursuance of subsection (5) above he shall inform the nominee—

(a) in the case of a body which is a trust, whether he intends to exercise his power under section 11(2) of the Act to appoint new trustees to the body; or

(b) in any case, if he intends to apply to the Court of Session for the appointment of an interim judicial factor under section 6(4)(c) of this Act, but if the Lord Advocate informs the nominee that he does not intend to proceed under either paragraph (a) or (b) above, subsection (3) above shall apply as regards the body and such accounts as are mentioned in subsection (2) above as if the aggregate amount of the balance referred to in subsection (3) did not exceed £5,000 and neither paragraph (a) nor (b) of that subsection applied.

(7) Notwithstanding anything in any enactment or rule of law to the contrary, the nominee shall, by virtue of this subsection, have the right to effect any transaction (including a transaction closing the account) in relation to any account to which subsection (3) above applies; and the receipt of the nominee in respect of any funds withdrawn or transferred from an account by virtue of this subsection shall, as regards the interest of the nominee in respect of such funds, be a full and valid discharge to the relevant institution holding the account.

(8) No liability (other than liability for a criminal offence) shall attach to the nominee in consequence of any act or omission of his in the performance of his functions under this section.

(9) The power of the nominee to effect transactions, in relation to the accounts of a body shall cease to have effect—

(a) when the Lord Advocate notifies him of his intention to proceed under subsection (6) above;

(b) if the relevant institution by which the accounts are held notifies the nominee that the accounts held by or on behalf of the body are no longer dormant; or

(c) where the nominee becomes aware of the identity of a person concerned in the management or control of the body, when he informs the institution of that fact, and in any case to which paragraph (c) above applies, the nominee shall also inform the Lord Advocate of that fact.

(10) The Secretary of State may, by regulations made under this section—

(a) make provision as to the procedure to be followed by the nominee in exercising his powers under this section;

(b) require the nominee to make to the Secretary of State an annual report as regards the exercise of his functions and such regulations may specify the form and content of such report; and the Secretary of State shall lay a copy of such report before each House of Parliament;

(c) prescribe the circumstances in which and the extent to which the nominee may apply any interest accruing to any account as regards which subsection (3) above applies during any period for which he is entitled to effect transactions in respect of the account for the purpose of defraying his expenses in connection with the exercise of his functions under this section;

(d) require the nominee to keep accounts as regards his outlays and expenses in connection with the exercise of his functions under this section; and

(e) amend subsections (3) and (5) above by substituting a different figure for the figure for the time being mentioned in those subsections.

(11) Where every account held by or on behalf of a body which appears to a relevant institution to be a recognised body is a dormant account, no obligation of confidentiality or requirement of secrecy (whether imposed by any enactment or rule of law or otherwise) shall prevent the institution from supplying to the nominee information such as is mentioned in subsection (12) below.

(12) Information referred to in subsection (11) above is information relating to any account such as is mentioned in that subsection above which consists of any of the following: —

(a) the amount of the balance of the account as at the date the information is supplied;

(b) the last date on which a transaction (other than a transaction consisting only of the accrual of interest to the account) was effected in relation to the account;

(c) so far as is known to the institution, the terms of the trust deed or other document constituting the body or any information as to the nature of the purposes of the body.

(13) For the purpose of this section—

(a) a "relevant institution" is—

(i) an institution which is authorised by the Bank of England to operate a deposit-taking business under Part I of the Banking Act 1987;

(ii) a building society which is authorised by the Building Societies Commission under section 9 of the Building Societies Act 1986 to raise money from its members;

(iii) such other institution mentioned in Schedule 2 to the Banking Act 1987 as the Secretary of State may, by regulations made under this section, prescribe;

(b) an account is dormant if—

(i) in the period of ten years preceding the date on which the institution reviews the account, no transaction (other than a transaction consisting only of the accrual of interest to the account) has taken place in respect of the account; and

(ii) the institution has no knowledge of the identity of any person concerned in the management or control of the body in whose name or on whose behalf the account is held.'.—Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): With this it will be convenient to debate Government amendments Nos. 90 and 91.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In Committee, the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) tabled an amendment which would have required banks to identify accounts of recognised bodies which had lain unused and to require the Inland Revenue to list such bodies. The object of the hon. Member's clause was for moribund charitable funds to be brought back into use. That principle was warmly supported by Committee members, and I gave the hon. Member an assurance that I would explore with the banks how such moneys might be brought back into charitable use.

The Committee of Scottish Clearing Bankers and the Building Societies Association have been co-operative in exploring how moribund charitable funds might be brought into use. We propose to remove any duty of confidentiality from the relevant institution in respect of dormant accounts and to enable them to inform an authorised person—the Scottish charities nominee—of such accounts. They will pass to the nominee details of the account holders' funds, and information as to the founding document. The nominee is to be satisfied that the account holders are recognised bodies. He will be concerned only with those which are recognised bodies. The nominee will have a right to effect transactions in respect of accounts.

The nominee will take different actions according to whether the aggregate amount in the account is £5,000 or less, or more than £5,000. Where the amount is £5,000 or less, subsection (3) procedures provide that the nominee may transfer the balance to such other recognised body as he may determine, having regard to the purposes both of the moribund body and of the body to which he transfers the funds. In many instances, the amounts will be small, and it will not be economically viable to appoint new trustees. Frequently, trust deeds will not be located and therefore there will be no means of appointing trustees. The important consideration is that the money is made available for charitable use, so he is empowered under subsection (4) to transfer funds to such other recognised body as appears to him expedient.

Subsection (5) relates to accounts with funds amounting to more than £5,000 and to cases under subsection (3)(a) and (b). Under that subsection, the nominee is to advise the Lord Advocate of the information received from the relevant institution about the body together with any other relevant matter. Under the powers of clause 11(2) and clause 6(4), the Lord Advocate is able to appoint trustees or to apply for the appointment of an interim judicial factor. Where the Lord Advocate does not so act, the nominee shall dispense the funds in the same way as those under £5,000.

Subsection (10) empowers the Secretary of State to make certain provisions by regulations. They include the procedures to be followed by the nominee in exercising his powers, in reporting annually to the Secretary of State. They also require him to keep accounts under subsection (10), and the Secretary of State is to lay a copy of the report before each House of Parliament.

The functions of the nominee must be paid for. Subsection (10)(c) enables my right hon. and learned Friend to prescribe the circumstances in which, and the extent to which, the nominee may apply any interest accruing during the period when he may effect transactions. Such interest would be used for defraying the nominee's expenses. There will therefore be no public expenditure implications.

Power for the relevant institutions to report to the nominee are included in subsections (11) and (12). Clause 11 removes any duty of confidentiality while subsection (12) sets out the information to be provided to the nominee. I have received an assurance from the banks that their branches will undertake routine periodical trawls of dormant accounts to identify any that they believe fall within the definition of "recognised body". The institutions have assured me that they will make every effort to identify moribund charitable accounts and will make particular efforts to identify accounts with balances in excess of £50. Below that figure, the cost of the efforts involved in addressing the matters becomes a balancing factor, but they have undertaken to use their best endeavours.

Given the assurances and co-operation of the relevant institutions, I am confident that this new provision will prove a very worthwhile innovation in ensuring that good use is made of charitable funds.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: The criteria in subsection (13)(b) are very rigid, referring to "the period of ten years preceding the date on which the institution reviews the account" and to the institution having

"no knowledge of the identity of any person concerned in the management or control of the body".

Ten years seems to me to be an arbitrary period. Surely it should be that if the institution has lost contact with any person concerned with the body's management, the funds will be considered dormant in those circumstances.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I sympathise with the point that my hon. and learned Friend makes. We entered into detailed negotiations with the banks, and new clause 23 is drafted in such a way as to ensure that it can be effectively implemented. The spirit of the amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North has been honoured; although a slightly different approach has been taken, nevertheless substantially the same objective is achieved in bringing funds into use. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North for raising the matter and I hope that the House will support the clause.

Mr. Wilson: This is probably the first evidence I have seen since entering the House of a good idea—if I can claim that for it—being translated into legislation. I am grateful to the Minister and to his civil servants for the work that has gone into producing what I hope is a useful reform, and one that was not conceived of at any stage of the Bill.

Scotland will be taking the lead with this interesting innovation, and if it proves half as relevant as was suggested in Committee, it may be viewed with envy by other parts of the United Kingdom. In Committee, I qualified the value of my proposal but said that it could be useful in some cases—but as other members contributed their anecdotes, the suspicion grew that perhaps we were on to something much bigger than I had realised at the outset. It remains to be seen just how substantial that innovation will be.

The basic point, which I shall reiterate for hon. Members who were not on the Committee, is that in my experience and in random contacts and researches in every rural and urban community in Scotland, there are funds which were raised for some specific purpose and which, for all sorts of historical reasons, have fallen into dereliction. In some cases, those funds have lain in banks for many years and no one knows that they are there: their purpose and the people who administered them have become lost in the mists of time.

I shall follow this matter with considerable interest to see if we shall uncover something big or whether the funds are more modest.

5 pm

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on achieving the amendment. Many private accounts which were set up by or for people who are now dead, must be sitting in the coffers of banks. Perhaps he would like to table another amendment to the next law reform Bill to deal with those.

Mr. Wilson: I should be so lucky. However that is a good point, and the hon. and learned Gentleman may recall that one of his English colleagues said in Committee that a Select Committee had discovered that literally tens of millions of pounds were being held in accounts on behalf of people who had gone into mental institutions or similar places. Money in bank accounts which to all intents and purposes have become defunct could amount to a great deal. We are taking the first step in Scotland, and I warmly welcome it.

For my own clarification, as I am sure the Minister has attempted to meet the spirit of the original amendment, I shall ask him two questions—the first about the term "recognised bodies". As more than a few months have intervened, I have perhaps become hazy about all the debates that we had about recognised bodies, but in practical terms, are we talking about the type of organisation established perhaps 100, 50 or 30 years ago —in most cases pre-war—when the definitions of a recognised or non-recognised body were not current, as they have only recently become?

Within the terms of the clause, will the phrase "recognised bodies" give the nominee access to the type of accounts which I have described? That question is purely for information, as the answer obviously could transform the situation, and I might have to withdraw everything good I said if that is not the case.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The answer is yes.

Mr. Wilson: That is excellent; I shall withdraw nothing.

Secondly, I should like clarification about the public availability of information given to the nominees. I should have thought that to some extent the activities of the nominee should be demand-led. If a village hall is to be built, and folk can check up and find that there is a 50-year-old village hall fund which no-one knew anything about, then that is clearly better than having to wait for the nominee to tell them at some random time that such a fund exists. Will there be public access to the information that the nominee obtains?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the nominee will have to publish an annual report and from time to time may have to advertise information depending upon the situation, and that that matter is currently being looked into?

Mr. Wilson: I know about the annual report and I welcome it, but it will deal with what has been done in the past year, rather than list funds and give an idea of what the nominee may do. However, I am happy to leave the matter there. Clearly, once a register of such funds is established, there should be public access to it.

I do not want to delay the House, and I am delighted with what the Minister has done. I am perfectly happy with the mechanisms drawn up to bring this into effect. We shall know within a year or two whether the measure will be substantial. The important thing is the certainty that, in some communities in Scotland, money which would not previously have been available for useful purposes, which was given for useful purposes, will be unlocked because of the new clause. In that spirit, I thank the Minister for his efforts.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the Minister wish to respond before I put the Question? He does not have to, as there seems to be a degree of agreement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 7

DUTIES OF COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE

'If any person requests from the Commissioners the name of any recognised body or other information relating to that body set out in section 1(1)(b) of this Act it shall be the duty of the Commissioners to supply that information in so far as it is in their possession.'—[Mr. Dewar.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Dewar: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

A minute ago, Madam Deputy Speaker, you referred to a degree of agreement. I guess that that will not exist with this new clause. I fear that the gap between myself and the Minister over this clause is unbridgeable.

I regard this clause as a matter of some importance, because I hate to think how many hours we spend discussing the first 13 clauses of the Bill in Committee. As every hon. Member who has taken even a passing interest in the Bill will know, in those 13 clauses we have erected an extraordinarily complex machinery of control and scrutiny.

We considered rules for accountants and auditors, and the powers of investigation of the Lord Advocate and the Court of Session, and we immersed ourselves in the world of recognised bodies, non-recognised bodies, registered charities and non-registered charities operating in Scotland, and in the problem of what constituted a Scottish charity, which greatly interested us. Many of those bodies had inescapable duties laid upon them, carrying the full force of the law. All that hung on the peg of a new definition of charity, and a new availability of information about charities existing in Scotland which was to come from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

What astonished me, and no doubt other hon. Members, in Committee was that, although we were laying down duties for members of charitable organisations, we were laying no duty upon the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to make the basic information available about whether a charity was recognised for tax purposes.

That was a key matter, because the writ of the Charity Commissioners does not run in England. There is no register of charities which one can consult at present. We were going to put that right by giving people the opportunity to obtain information about who or what is registered for tax purposes as a charity by applying for it to the Commissioner of the Inland Revenue.

I was amazed to discover, in part I, clause 1(i) of the Bill that there is

"No obligation as to secrecy or other restriction upon the disclosure of information imposed by statute or otherwise shall prevent the Commissioners of Inland Revenue (in this section referred to as "the Commissioners") from disclosing . . . to any person who requests it, the name of any recognised body and the address last used by the Commissioners for any communication with the body and the year when such communication occurred."

The Minister explained that he did not wish to make it a duty to give us such information. After all, the Inland Revenue might be in difficulties—presumably it might be in the middle of some cost-cutting exercise or have a difficulty over staff. In theory, because there is no duty to provide information in the Bill, one is merely removing an inhibition that might prevent it from giving such information.

If I turned up and said that I wanted to find out about body X, and whether it is recognised as such, as defined in part I of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue might say that, for various reasons, they had fallen behind with their work in compiling the records, they are hard pressed and, in one way or another, it is not very convenient; and they could ask me to go away and come back at some future date. Legally, there will be no reason why they should not do that.

The Minister will no doubt say, "It won't be like that; the CIR will carry out their part of the bargain." But there is no legal imperative that they should do so. That is an unsatisfactory state of affairs, which new clause 7 seeks to put right.

We are erecting a complicated system around the duty to disclose which, it turns out, does not apply to the CIR. For example, let us consider the duty of a recognised body to make available on request to any member of the public an explanatory document setting out its aims and objectives. If it delays for more than one month in doing so, a complaint can be lodged with the Lord Advocate. If such complaint is lodged with him, then it may be noted for the purposes of clause 1(2). That is all posited on the assumption that there will be disclosure by the CIR.

I take the simple view that it would make this whole construction a good deal more logical and understandable to everyone concerned if we imposed upon the CIR the duty of disclosure, as explained and described in clause 1. I hope, therefore, that the Minister will accept new clause 7. It is simple and straightforward and seems to me to provide justice to both parties to the bargain.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I support, as I did in Committee, the observations of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). When we create a sophisticated and, in some respects, an extremely onerous system for the regulation of charities in Scotland, a system which contains a number of explicit responsibilities and duties which we have not shrunk from spelling out in substantial—some would say overly substantial—detail, it is ludicrous to send this part of the Bill on its way if it does not contain an express duty to permit disclosure of the information that clause 1 is designed to elicit. As has been forcefully pointed out, if there is no duty, then, for any reason which may appear to be appropriate to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, they may decline to make available the information that this part of the Bill is designed to give public currency.

The Minister endeavoured in Committee—in my judgment, hardly successfully—to provide justification for the absence of that duty. He will remember that the way in which the relevant part of the Bill is framed creates a right for the CIR not be be bound by what is otherwise the universal rule of confidentiality. Even that came under scrutiny in Committee. The fundamental and central issue is whether the CIR are obliged to make information available. The absence of a duty of the kind that the new clause seeks to impose would make a substantial part of what this part of the Bill endeavours to bring about unattainable. I hope, therefore, that the Minister will be willing to accept the new clause or, if he is not prepared to do that, to give a better explanation for not doing so than he tendered in Committee.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Clause 1 rightly overrides the Inland Revenue's confidentiality rules, and empowers the Inland Revenue to disclose to the public the names and addresses of Scottish bodies that it recognised as charities for tax purposes. The new clause tabled by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) would place a statutory duty on the Inland Revenue to disclose that information.

The new clause returns to a point that we discussed in Committee. I undertook then to consider what was practicable. I understand why the hon. Gentleman has raised the point, and I have considered it with great care. However, I am afraid that his new clause would lead to some practical problems. I think that the arrangements already provided for by clause 1 will work satisfactorily.

It may help hon. Members who were not on the Standing Committee if I explain how the arrangements for public information will work. Once clause 1 comes into operation, members of the public will be able to ask the Inland Revenue's claims branch in Edinburgh whether particular Scottish bodies have been recognised as charities for tax purposes. Inquiries can be made either in writing or by telephone. The public will also be able to go to the claims branch office at Trinity Park house in Edinburgh and inspect a list of Scottish bodies which have been recognised as charities and which have been in contact with the Inland Revenue within the last 20 years. The list is likely to include about 15,000 charities and will be updated regularly.

The Bill also gives the public the right to obtain further information about the charities direct from the charities themselves. Thus, members of the public will be able to have access to useful information which is not at present publicly available. Furthermore, if there is sufficient demand for the microfiche, it will be made available in other public places.

5.15 pm

We have to bear in mind the fact that the Inland Revenue's records of charities date back to the 19th century. They were designed to meet the needs of tax administration, rather than as a public index. There are many cases where a Scottish body asks the Inland Revenue whether it qualifies as a charity for tax purposes, but it seldom, if ever, makes an actual claim to tax exemption later, because it does not receive the particular types of income on which it would need to claim a tax repayment.

When a charity is wound up, it does not necessarily have to notify the Inland Revenue, so the Inland Revenue's index of charities will include many bodies which were recognised as charities many years ago but which no longer exist, or which have long since moved from their original address.

Some inquirers may ask the Revenue about only one or two charities, but others may ask about a substantial number, or inspect the whole list. In that case, the new clause would in effect place a duty on the Revenue to provide a list of all Scottish charities ever recognised, which would mean going back very many years.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Is the Minister sure that he is right when he says that a charity does not have to inform the Inland Revenue if it is wound up? I recollect a Finance Bill—I cannot put a date on it because I sat on a number of Committees that considered Finance Bills—that discussed charity law in great detail. The Inland Revenue claimed that it found out the very moment when a charity ceased to operate. This is tied up tightly with charity law.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: If registered, that would certainly be the case. I have received briefing not only from Scottish Office officials but also from the Inland Revenue on this point.

The point that I am making is that much of the information included in such a list would be out of date. That would be unhelpful, and indeed positively misleading, to the public. That is why we propose that the list available for inspection will include only bodies which have had contact with the Revenue within the last 20 years. If an inquiry is made about a particular named body, it will of course be possible for the Inland Revenue to check back to their earlier records; and, of course, charities which are still active but have not been in touch with the Inland Revenue for more than 20 years can contact the Revenue again and ensure that they are included in the list.

It is also possible that some small local charities will not be recorded in the central list at the claims branch because, at some time in the past, they have been dealt with by a local tax office which has consulted the claims branch informally. If any such bodies come to light, they can of course be added to the claims branch list, but if the Inland Revenue was put under a statutory duty, as the new clause proposes, it would have to make a comprehensive search of all local office files before the system came into operation, in order to ensure that it could comply with the duty. That would involve disproportionate work and expense.

For all these reasons, I think that the new clause would be undesirable and would lead to practical problems. I can assure the House that the Inland Revenue will provide the information which clause 1 empowers it to do in the way I have already explained. I therefore hope that the hon. Gentleman will not feel that it is necessary to press his new clause.

Mr. Dewar: I am sorry to disappoint the Minister, but I cannot say that my doubts have been swept away. He made the point that members of the public have a right, which cannot be defeated, to request information in the form of an explanatory document from a charity. It is odd, therefore, that members of the public should not have the right to request from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue essential information that would establish whether the body from which they might wish to require further information has charitable status.

I was not impressed by the Minister's remarks. I am sure that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue will attempt to be helpful when they can, but I do not see why they alone should be left with a power of discretion that is not allowed to any of the other parties under part I of the Bill.

New clause 7 is not immodestly drawn; it merely insists that there should be a duty on the commissioners to give "the name of any recognised body or other information relating to that body set out in section 1(1)(b) of this Act." We are suggesting not that they produce something that is not available to them on their records but merely that they ensure that the information on those records is available. If a local charity has never been recorded at central headquarters and has slipped through the net, its name cannot be produced. We are laying on them a duty to give information that is available and is on their records, to guard against the possibility that for some reason they will either allow the matter to slip, exercising their discretion, or will not make the information available.

I cannot say that the Minister has reassured me. I do not think that his objections to the new clause are substantial, and I intend to press it.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I want to be clear that I did not mislead the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). He asked whether charities have a need to inform the Revenue. The answer is that they do not need to do so for tax purposes, but they must give information on tax as required by the Revenue.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New clause 12

CODE OF PRACTICE

'(1) It shall be the duty of the Secretary of State, before the end of the period of one year beginning with the passing of this Act, to prepare in draft a code of practice containing such practical guidance as in the opinion of the Secretary of State would be helpful for the purposes of Part I of this Act.

(2) Such a draft shall in particular contain guidance—
(a) on the proper procedures and administrative arrangements for a charitable body, and
(b) on the provision of information to the public by a charitable body regarding its activities and purposes.

(3) The Secretary of State shall, before the end of the period of one year beginning with the passing of this Act, lay before both Houses of Parliament a draft of the code of practice prepared by him under subsection (1) above, to be approved by resolution of both Houses.

(4) The Secretary of State may from time to time revise the whole or any part of a code of practice brought into effect under this section, provided that such revisions are laid before, and approved by, resolutions of both Houses of Parliament.

(5) A failure on the part of any person to observe any provision of a code of practice which is for the time being in force shall not of itself render him liable to any proceedings; but in any proceedings under this or any other Act—
(a) any such code shall be admissible in evidence, and
(b) any provision of such a code of practice which appears to the Court to be relevant to any question arising in the proceedings shall be taken into account by the Court in determining that question.'.—[Dr. Godman.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

5.30 pm

Dr. A. Godman: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

My code of conduct is designed with the specific aim of giving guidance to those seeking to set up charities, as well as advising them of the need to adhere to the complicated rules and regulations that are outlined in part I. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) said a few minutes ago that we are faced by an extraordinarily complicated structure of rules and regulations for charities. He is right.

In part I, for example, the topics range from clause 1,
"Information as to recognised charities",
to:
"Duty to keep accounting records",
"Annual accounts and report".
and the role of the Lord Advocate in this scheme of things, which is dealt with in clause 5. The role of the Court of Session is outlined in clause 6. Clause 7 is concerned with the disqualification of persons concerned in the management of such bodies. We all know that, occasionally, the odd character happens on a charity and exploits it in his own nefarious interests. There is also an important clause, clause 9, concerned with small charities.

There is a need for a code of conduct for small charities. I remind the Minister and the House of the Industrial Relations Act 1971. I think that it came into force on 28 February 1972, as you would know, Madam Deputy Speaker. That labour law was dreadful in itself, but its one redeeming feature was the code of practice that was introduced with it. It was aimed largely at small companies that were unfamiliar with the formal processes of collective bargaining. I put it to the Minister that small charities are in a position with this Bill analogous to that of the small firms confronted with the code of practice in 1972. I hope that this provision survives longer than the Industrial Relations Act 1971 did.

There is an important principle here. I was not in Parliament at that time. Although I was opposed to the Industrial Relations Act 1971, I welcomed the code of practice because it was a fine little document in terms of grievance and disciplinary procedures. I would argue that this legislation concerning charities—especially small charities—needs such a fine little document.

Some people may say that there is no need for such a code of practice. I can perhaps understand the reason for such reservations, especially, for example, in respect of the fine charity with which I am involved, which was mentioned just now by my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing). Like many large and long-established charities, the Royal National Lifeboat Institution has a strict code of conduct for its various component bodies and strict rules governing its collections and other charitable activities. But often small charities are formed when a number of people come together to give sustenance to those in distress.

For example, in my constituency, following the tragic death of a couple who died in horrible circumstances in a house fire in Port Glasgow, a number of neighbours came together with the object of raising money to provide the young daughter with sustenance and comfort. In fishing communities, in particular, people come together in the immediate aftermath of a tragedy to raise money for the dependants of those who have been lost; that is also not an unfamiliar experience in mining communities.

I promise to be brief, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am anxious to hurry along to the new clauses dealing with children giving evidence in criminal proceedings. In passing, let me say that I am delighted with the fine, generous comments that the Minister made when he referred to those new clauses.

We need to give guidance to small charities, because such bodies may not have the means to obtain advice from lawyers or similar professionals. A code of practice could, I think, give comfort to the individuals involved—particularly in regard to their onerous responsibilities vis-a-vis the Lord Advocate. Some of those responsibilities are entirely right and proper, but the Government must nevertheless give guidance to such bodies. I look forward to a positive response from the Minister to the new clause.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The new clause tabled by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) would provide guidance to charities on how to comply with the requirements of part I of the Bill. The hon. Gentleman proposes that that should be achieved by introduction of a code of practice that would require approval by resolution of both Houses of Parliament. He also proposes that such a code should not be legally binding but that where a person has failed to observe any provisions of the Bill it should be admissible in court proceedings and could be taken account of by the court in its determination.

I sympathise with the purpose and aim of the hon. Gentleman, which is essentially to provide guidance to charities on how to comply with the requirements laid upon them by part I. I do not, however, believe that the means of providing that guidance should be as proposed in the new clause. I do not consider it necessary to provide a code of practice when adequate provisions are set out in the primary and secondary legislation.

I also have some doubts about asking the court, as the new clause provides, to have regard to the code of practice in determining a question that will already have been covered in the primary legislation. That strikes me as likely to frustrate, rather than assist, determination by the courts. However, I certainly accept that the charities should have guidance on how to comply with the requirements of part I and I assure the hon. Gentleman that full guidance on that will be provided by the Scottish Home and Health Department by means of publicity, and also by circulars to recognised bodies.

I should also mention the fact that the Scottish Council for Voluntary Organisations already provides helpful guidance to charities and it will, no doubt, continue to do so. Now that he has been given that assurance, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not seek to press the new clause.

Dr. Godman: The Minister is an honourable man and I am perfectly willing to accept his assurance that the provisions will be publicised. On the basis of that assurance, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 1

INFORMATION AS TO RECOGNISED CHARITIES

Amendments made: No. 90, in page 2, line 2, leave out from 'body' to end of line 5 and insert

'such as is mentioned in subsection (1A) below,'.

No. 91, in page 2, line 9, at end insert:—

'(1A) A recognised body referred to in subsection (1)(a) above is a body—

(a) which appears to the Commissioners to be or to have been carrying on activities which are not charitable or to be or to have been applying any of its funds for purposes which are not charitable;

(b) which is certified by the Lord Advocate as being a body in respect of which information has been provided to the Scottish charities nominee by a relevant institution in pursuance of section [Dormant accounts of charities in banks etc.] of this Act.'.—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move Government amendment No. 1, in page 2, line 43, leave out 'conclusive' and insert 'sufficient'.

Clause 1(7) provides that, for the purposes of any proceedings under part I of the Bill, a certificate signed by a person authorised to do so by the commissioners of Inland Revenue shall be "conclusive" evidence of the fact that the Revenue has recognised the body as a charity. It was suggested in Committee that the word "sufficient" would be preferable and consistent with other legislation. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) had a lot to do with the amendment.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I welcome the fact that the Minister has shown rather more flexibility today than he did during our long passage at arms in Committee, when hon. Members on both sides of the House argued the matter quite forcefully.

Will the Minister confirm that what is now to be legislated for is a system in which a challenge will be available to someone who seeks to challenge the accuracy of what is apparently purported to be correct by virtue of the provision. The argument in Committee turned on the question whether, if the evidence was conclusive, no challenge would be permitted. By substituting the word "sufficient", the Minister has opened the door to challenge in cases where that may be appropriate. That seems to me a more equitable way in which to dispose of the matter than was originally envisaged in the Bill.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: I will just say that my gratitude is sufficient; it is not conclusive.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 2

NON-RECOGNISED BODIES

5.45 pm

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move Government amendment No. 2, in page 3, line 3, leave out subsection (2) and insert—

'(2) For the purposes of this Part of this Act, any body which is not—

(a) a recognised body; or

(b) a body which is—

(i) registered as a charity in England and Wales under section 4 of the Charities Act 1960; or

(ii) a charity which is not required to register by virtue of subsection (4) is a non-recognised body.'

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this we may take Government amendment No. 13.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Clause 2(2) defines the expression "non-recognised" body. The subsection was criticised by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) and by my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Irvine), who found the double negatives confusing. The amendment is a drafting amendment, the purpose of which is to avoid the use of multiple negatives.

Mr. Dewar: I am sorry that the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Irvine) is not with us today because, on occasion, he greatly entertained me in Committee. I certainly had a great deal of sympathy with his inability to follow the tortuous double negatives that were built into the Bill.

Out of curiosity, I should like to engage the Minister's attention on a much smaller matter. By a happy coincidence, amendment No. 13 refers to clause 13, which states:

"'non-recognised body' has the meaning given by section 2 of this Act".

Amendment No. 13 would remove the words

"has the meaning given by"

and insert the words

"shall be construed in accordance with"

Can the Minister explain why that important change is proposed and what practical difference the amendment will make?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It makes for greater accuracy and clarity and would make the provision easier for the general public to interpret.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 5

Powers of Lord Advocate to investigate charities and to suspend trustees

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 3 in page 7, line 2 after 'apply' insert 'by summary application'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos 4 and 5.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: These amendments relate to procedural matters under clause 5. Amendment No. 3 is a simple clarifying amendment which makes it plain that application by a nominated officer to the sheriff for an order under clause 5(6) is by the summary application procedure.

Amendment No. 4 is also a clarifying amendment. Subsection 5(6)(a) specifies that the nominated officer may apply to the sheriff for an order requiring a person to attend to answer questions and provide information at a time and place specified in the order. The insertion of the word "and" makes it clear that the order requires the person not only to attend, but also to answer questions and provide information.

Amendment No. 5 inserts a new subsection after subsection (6). It reflects concern in Committee that a person required by a court order to provide answers to the nominated officer might be faced with the choice of obeying the order and incriminating himself by answering the questions or possibly to commit an offence by refusing to make a statement and thus breaching the court order.

It is important to bear in mind that these are civil and not criminal proceedings. They relate to the investigation of an officer appointed by the Lord Advocate to discover whether there appears to have been misconduct or mismanagement of a charity's affairs. I recognise the concern expressed by several Committee members, including the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), that there should be no room for doubt. The amendment makes it clear that a person must answer truthfully questions put to him by a nominated officer when an order has been made under subsection (6) and that he may not refuse to answer on grounds that his answer might incriminate him.

The new provision that amendment No. 5 seeks to insert also makes it clear that no answer to a question under subsection (6) may be used in any subsequent criminal proceedings against the person. I believe that in practice the nominated officer will act more like a Department of Trade and Industry official than a procurator fiscal. If he asks a question and receives an apparently incriminating reply, the nominated officer will normally terminate the interview immediately and refer the matter to the Lord Advocate with a view to the matter being referred to the police for criminal investigation if an incriminating answer gave rise to questions not as to whether there had been a breach of trust, but as to a serious crime.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: On the occasion of such a transaction as the Minister has described, does he envisage that the nominated officer would put the person summoned on oath and require him to take the oath in conventional terms like that taken by a witness giving evidence in court?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Statements to the nominated officer will not be under oath.

Mr. Dewar: Although it is difficult with our time constraints and our inability to amend the Bill now, I would like the Minister to give us a little more help. He has already shed some light on the Government's intentions. As the Minister has said, the concern is that we have a rather cumbersome procedure whereby the Lord Advocate, having decided to inquire into a charity, appoints a nominated officer. If that nominated officer meets a refusal to co-operate, he can go to the sheriff for an order under clause 5(6) which would force the person concerned to answer questions or to furnish information at a time and place specified in the order.

The concern was that that person might in effect be asked to incriminate himself. The Minister has explained that we are talking about civil proceedings and that nothing that is said will be admissible in evidence in any subsequent criminal proceedings.

The position is still quite difficult. If I am being interrogated or questioned by the nominated officer, it will cause me some unease if I have to answer a question which, if I answer it honestly—we are talking about the real world here—will be written down and although it may not be used as primary evidence in any criminal proceedings, will be passed to the Lord Advocate who is, after all, instructing the nominated officer. The Lord Advocate has certain other duties of a criminal nature. Obviously I may be prejudicing my future quite considerably if I proceed to follow the advice that the Minister has given and answer the questions honestly.

I want to be clear about what would happen if I do not answer the questions. If I say that I am very sorry, but I do not want to answer a particular question, am I caught by clause 5(7)? I have complied with the order in the sense that I have turned up and answered questions. Do I have to answer every question? If I say that, in effect, I wish to plead the Scottish equivalent of the fifth amendment, will I be caught by the penalty in clause 5(7) or would I be a person under clause 5(8)

"who wilfully alters, suppresses, conceals or destroys and record which he may be required to furnish or transmit"?

I should not have thought so, but what is the sanction? The person is not on oath, as the Minister has explained. He cannot be in contempt because he is not in a court although I suppose that it may be a "once removed" contempt of the order made under clause 5(6) by the sheriff.

Apart from a sense of scout's honour which may not apply very strongly in the circumstances that I have outlined, what is to stop someone simply saying, "I've told you all that I intend to tell you and I've gone as far as I'm going"? Someone might well want to do that if he was being precognosced about the matter by the Crown Office or anyone else. I am still a little unhappy about a situation in which the Minister glibly states that someone must answer questions which of course are not admissible as evidence but which will be put on a hot line and a quick fax machine back to the Lord Advocate. That person is being placed in a position in which, apparently, he has to incriminate himself.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: I am extremely worried, and the worries that I voiced in Committee have not been allayed by this, I assume, charitable attempt by the Minister to remove them.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) has put his finger on a number of important points. With regard to this provision, we are in a nebulous state. I do not know whether the appearance is to be in public or in private, or whether members of the press or the CID are entitled to be present. There is certainly nothing in the statute to prevent their being present.

I do not believe that the sheriff could say to someone, "You are going to be asked a question," and then have any alternative under the statute but to say, "And you've got to answer it." That is the thrust of the provision. It would take a brave fellow to say, "I have actually read the provision and I know that I've got to turn up, but I equally know that there is no provision telling me that I've got to answer." If someone is dragged along to a star chamber court and put before a judge, there is an assumption that one must answer. If I was a sheriff, I would find it difficult to know whether I was entitled to order the chap either to answer, or be prevaricating on a contempt, or to say that the chap did not have to answer.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: The hon. and learned Gentleman is right to point to the absence of a clear indication in the Bill of what would happen in the circumstances that he has described. Has he considered the fact that the ambiguity and lack of specification in the Bill may go further than even he has imagined? The sheriff may not necessarily be involved in the proceedings after he has issued an order to a nominated officer. On the face of the Bill, it seems that, once someone becomes a nominated officer, it is up to that person to go off and examine—using the word loosely—the person against whom the order has been made. However, all that seems to be regarded as taking place away from the sheriff court and away from the presence of the sheriff. If I am right about that, the possibility of the precise difficulty to which the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) eloquently referred seems, if anything, to be yet more likely than the circumstances that the hon. and learned Gentleman has postulated.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: I am obliged to the hon. and learned Gentleman. There are terrible pitfalls which are not cured by the amendment. I had forgotten, of course, that the nominee can take someone off to a hole in the wall and cross-examine him. There is no suggestion that he needs corroboration of what that person is supposed to have said. There is no suggestion of the principles of safeguard against being misled. One has only to be involved in cases concerning customs and excise officers rather than policemen to realise how important such protections are.

Apart from that, two other matters give me the greatest concern. First, is the nominee allowed to say that the press can be present so that admissions which are not admissible in evidence against the fellow can be published in the press? If that fellow says, "As a matter of fact, my granny was suffering from cancer so I just nicked all the funds before I cut the head off the beagle," and it appears in the press but is not admissible in evidence, I should not have thought that the "not admissible in evidence" provision was very helpful.

Secondly, I am worried about the presumption of guilt which arises easily, if sometimes properly, in the minds of policemen and prosecutors. If the nominee sends along a document which states that Willie Smith admits that he has been subtracting 50 per cent. of donations over the years, or any other incriminating statement, do not tell me that any prosecution will not proceed on the assumption that that is true when previously there was no evidence to suggest it. The fact that one cannot actually use those words does not help. Heaven knows, there is not an hon. Member present who does not know of cases in Scotland in which evidence was not invented to justify presumed assumptions, particularly of an alleged confession.

The amendment is dangerous, not because the Minister is not trying to help, but because the provision does not help. The nominee can wear a knuckleduster and say, "You answer my questions or I will hit you." That might be a breach of the law. He might say, "You realise that if you do not give me the answers that I would like, you may be in severe trouble." That is not a breach of the law by a nominee. I suppose that it might be a form of assault, but he is not an officer of the law—he is trying to get the answers that he wants.

It is a terrible path that the Lord Advocate and the courts of Scotland are being asked to tread. People collecting for charities will be subjected to a third degree from which even the most appalling terrorist would be protected.

Mr. Harry Ewing: I approach this matter on the basis that the interviews will be held in private and that the press will not be present. Two points worry me. The first is the lack of corroboration. Will the person being interviewed be entitled to have a representative present with him at the interview and whether the person who was nominated by the sheriff will have someone with him to corroborate the interview? The law of Scotland is based on corroboration. The Minister should say something about corroboration.

Secondly, the Minister explained what would happen in the interview. Once, in the view of the nominated person, the person being interviewed gives an incriminating answer, the nominated person would then, to use the Minister's words, immediately terminate the interview. Whether the Minister likes it or not, that would be a judgment. The nominated person would judge that the person being interviewed has made a statement that may or may not lead to criminal proceedings but which certainly merits being reported to the Lord Advocate for further investigation on the basis that criminal proceedings might follow. That is fraught with difficulties. I am not sure how that matter can be handled, and I am not happy about it.

It seems that there will be a one-to-one situation—no corroboration. The nominated person will make a judgment the background of a statement by the person being interviewed and will immediately terminate the interview. The matter will then be sent to the Lord Advocate for further investigation. As the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) said, that is fraught with difficulties. I know that this matter is difficult for the Minister also, but I should be grateful for further explanation of those points.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: The difficulties that have arisen in short consideration of this matter only serve to underline the fact that, when the provisions were framed and when the additional amendment was sought to be added, there was insufficient analytical consideration of the nature of the transaction between the nominated officer and the person who was summoned by virtue of an order of the sheriff. Ex facie of the Bill, the sheriff, having pronounced his order, is functus—he no longer has part in the proceedings. The nominated officer goes off with the order. It is as though an attempt had been made to add to the procedure known as commission and diligence and specification of documents—the equivalent of discovery in England and Wales.

It is as though, in addition, something had been added which requires a person to provide information in formal or informal circumstances, depending on the decision of the nominated officer, and which may be public or private because there is no specification of the proper method of proceeding. The circumstances may be formal or informal in the sense that one nominated officer may adopt the wholly informal approach—that of a conversation—and another may treat the matter with greater formality and ask the person who has been summoned to sit in a certain place and to conduct the proceedings in a particular way as though it were a formal investigation.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: Another matter that the hon. and learned Gentleman might care to consider is that he adduced from the Minister the fact that the proceedings would not be under oath. If they are not under oath, on what possible basis could there be a prosecution for an offence under section 2 of the False Oaths (Scotland) Act 1933?

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I am much obliged to the hon. and learned Gentleman, who has anticipated my next point. It appears that the nominated officer must give some warning when the proceedings commence. If, depending on my answer, I may be liable to prosecution for contravention of the False Oaths (Scotland) Act 1933, albeit perhaps a prosecution that is not founded on what I may have said, surely I should be entitled to a warning that the proceedings before the nominated officer might have that criminal consequence, yet there is no such provision.

The Minister says—no doubt sincerely—that, when an incriminating answer appears to have been given, the nominated officer will terminate the interview. Whether he does or not is the nominated officer's choice. Nothing in the Bill states that, as soon as an incriminating answer is given, the nominated officer must terminate the interview. Furthermore, neither the nominated officer nor the person being questioned may appreciate at a particular moment that that is an incriminating answer and might have the consequences to which other hon. Members have referred.

That is why the point made by the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) is so important. If a person is summoned to meet a nominated officer, is he or she entitled to be represented, or is this situation similar to the examination for bankruptcy proceedings about which there was considerable doubt in Scotland for a long time on the question whether the bankrupt was entitled to be represented at his own proceedings?

Far too many questions have been left unanswered. To return to my earlier point, they remain unanswered because there has not been any rigorous examination of the consequences of inserting such a provision in the Bill. It is perfectly right for the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross to talk with some awe about the powers of the Customs and Excise and of VAT inspectors. The hon. and learned Gentleman knows that, in the case of the Lord Advocate v. Friel, Lord Ross—now Lord Justice-Clerk Ross—took a vigorous view against the method of questioning used by the Customs and Excise inspectors. He held strongly that they were not entitled to conduct themselves in a way that was contrary to the principles laid down in the law of Scotland, stemming from the case of Chalmers v. the Lord Advocate.

Far too many questions are unanswered. There are far too many opportunities for mistake, confusion and injustice. That is why I believe that the provision does not bear the hallmark of careful and analytical consideration and it certainly does not bear the hallmark of any rigorous

My final point echoes to some extent what was said by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). An answer may be incriminating. It may not be able to be used in criminal proceedings later against that person. It may form the basis upon which other investigations can be carried out, by referring, for example, to the location of a certain piece of evidence. The statement about where the evidence is said to be located may not be admissible, but if someone examines the box in which the papers that have been referred to can be found, those papers and their findings may in turn come to be the incriminating evidence. It is artificial to suggest that there is as much protection as the Minister appears to claim for a person who is asked in response to an order from the sheriff.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: On the hon. and learned Gentleman's point about the False Oaths (Scotland) Act, although a section states that that may not be used in evidence in criminal proceedings, there is no way in which the Act comes into this unless it can be put to the person who is on oath, when subsequently charged with a criminal offence, that he or she previously said something different from the nominee.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: The hon. and learned Gentleman is quite correct. To establish a conviction under the False Oaths (Scotland) Act 1933, it will be necessary to prove that what was said to the nominated officer was false, and that can be done only by leading evidence in relation to what was said to have been incriminating.

This is a can of worms. Although it is commonplace in Committee or on Report for hon. Members to complain that the provisions are insufficiently detailed or insufficiently well thought out, in this case such criticisms are more than germane. They go right to the heart of what the Minister is endeavouring to persuade the House to accept. I hope that he will realise that hon. Members of all parties have advanced points of great substance, not mere debating points.

If, in the light of what has been said, he is not satisfied with what he is trying to persuade the House to accept, he should take the honourable course and withdraw the

6.15 pm

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Several interesting points have been raised. I begin with the question asked by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) about whether the person who is being interviewed would be caught by clause 5(7) if he or she refused to answer the question. The person would be so caught, because subsection (6) requires the person to answer such questions as may be asked under subsection (4). An offence would therefore have been committed.

The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) asked whether a sheriff would be present at the interview. The hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) asked about corroboration. The sheriff will not be involved in the interview. The offence will be required to be proved beyond reasonable doubt in the same way as any other offence and will be subject to the requirement of corroboration.

Mr. Dewar rose——

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment.

The hon. Member for Falkirk, East also asked whether a person is entitled to be legally represented at the interview. The Bill does not create a right for a person to be legally represented, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that no objection will be made if a person wishes to be legally represented at the interview.

The hon. Member for Carscadden——

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, and I do not wish to thrash this point unnecessarily. Suppose the nominated officer said, "I am not prepared to allow you to have the solicitor of your choice present at this examination." The person who has been summoned has no right to the presence of a solicitor or any other person. If the nominated officer takes that decision, the person who has been summoned will have to abide by it. How can that be just?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am giving an undertaking that that will not happen. Such a person would be allowed to have a solicitor with him.

Mr. Dewar: Could the Minister say a little more about the effect of the criminal penalty in clause 5(7)? Obviously, an offence would have to be established by corroborated evidence. One therefore assumes that there will be people in the room other than the interviewee and the interviewer——

Mr. Menzies Campbell: Such as a shorthand writer?

Mr. Dewar: Is there, for example—I am being helpfully prompted from the left—likely to be someone such as a shorthand writer present? If there are only two people in the room, corroboration will prove a remarkable difficulty. Perhaps the Minister could say something about that.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I sincerely hope that in most of the cases that we believe would involve a possible breach of trust, or something of that nature, there will be no question of criminal proceedings. However, if somebody refuses to answer or to provide accounts where they undoubtedly exist, the provisions will prove necessary to ensure that those who have given money to a charity or those who will benefit from it are not disadvantaged or prejudiced in the process.

Mr. Dewar: Absolutely. However, I am referring to what the Minister helpfully said about clause 5(7)—that, if a person refuses to answer a question, he or she will be open to a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale. That is clearly a criminal prosecution. I am simply trying to establish who the Minister expects to be in the room to provide the corroboration.

While the Minister is at it, perhaps he could say more about his guarantee that a solicitor can represent the person being interviewed. It will be an odd situation, because presumably a solicitor is present to give his client advice about his right and might well be tempted to say, "I don't think that you should give that information, because you will incriminate yourself." What would be the solicitor's position if he gave that advice and if the client purported to take it?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman has answered his own question—he said that a shorthand writer or someone of that nature would probably be with the nominated person. If an offence were committed, it would be subject to the normal rules relating to proof and corroboration when it came before a court.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn rose——

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I want to answer the question about false oaths, and my hon. and learned Friend can come back on this in a minute if he likes. It is clear that no answer to a question under subsection (6) can be used in any subsequent criminal proceedings. This will operate in the same way as Department of Trade and Industry inspectors, who have not run into tremendous difficulties in this connection. There are precedents for DTI inspectors making investigations. If, when making an investigation, an inspector, instead of finding evidence of breach of trust, runs into a case of serious fraud, he stops immediately and reports it to the Lord Advocate.

I mentioned that no answer to a question under subsection 6 could be used in any subsequent criminal proceedings against the person, except under section 2 of the False Oaths (Scotland) Act 1933, which relates to the making of false statements without oath. Section 2 states:

"If any person knowingly and wilfully makes (otherwise than on oath) a statement false in a material particular, and the statement is made—

(a) in a statutory declaration; or

(b) in an abstract, account, balancing sheet, book, certificate, declaration, entry, estimate, inventory, notice, report, return or other document, which he is authorised or required to make, attest, or verify by, under, or in pursuance of any public general Act of Parliament for the time being in force; or

(c) in any oral declaration or oral answer which he is authorised or required to make by, under, or in pursuance of any public general Act of Parliament for the time being in force, he shall be guilty of a crime."

I think that that is quite straightforward, and there is no question of that provision being repealed.

New Clause 15

BOARD'S INTERVENTION POWERS

'.—(1) The powers conferred on the Board by this section may be exercised if, after such inquiry (if any) as the Board consider appropriate, it appears to them to be desirable to do so for the purpose of protecting the interests of the clients, or prospective clients, of an independent qualified conveyancer or an executry practitioner (each of whom is in this section referred to as a "relevant practitioner").

(2) The Board may, in particular, exercise any such power where it appears to them that a relevant practitioner—

(a) is no longer a fit and proper person to provide conveyancing services or, as the case may be, executry services;

(b) has ceased, for whatever reason, to provide such services; or

(c) has failed, or is likely to fail, to comply with regulations made under section 15(10A) or, as the case may be, section 16(10) of this Act.

(3) The Board may direct the relevant practitioner not to dispose of, or otherwise deal with, except in accordance with the terms of the direction—

(a) any assets belonging to any client of the practitioner and held by or under the control of the practitioner in connection with his business as an independent qualified conveyancer or, as the case may be, an executry practitioner; or

(b) any assets of the practitioner which are specified, or of a kind specified, in the direction.

(4) The Board may direct the relevant practitioner to transfer to the Board, or to such persons (in this section referred to as "the trustees") as may be specified in the direction—

(a) all assets belonging to any client of the practitioner and held by or under the control of the practitioner in connection with his business as an independent qualified conveyancer or, as the case may be, an executry practitioner; or

(b) any assets of the practitioner which are specified, or of a kind specified, in the direction.

(5) A relevant practitioner to whom a direction is given may, within 21 days of the date on which the direction is received by him, apply to the Court of Session, which may make such order in the matter as it thinks fit.

(6) A relevant practitioner to whom a direction is given shall comply with it as soon as it takes effect (and whether or not he proposes to apply to the Court of Session under subsection (5) above).

(7) If, on an application to the Court of Session by the Board, the court is satisfied—

(a) that a relevant practitioner has failed, within a reasonable time, to comply with any direction given to him; or

(b) that there is a reasonable likelihood that a relevant practitioner will so fail, the court may make an order requiring the practitioner, and any other person whom the court considers it appropriate to subject to its order, to take such steps as the court may direct with a view to securing compliance with the direction.

(8) Any assets which have been transferred as a result of a direction given under subsection (4) above shall be held by the Board, or by the trustees, on trust for the client or, as the case may be, the practitioner concerned.

(9) The trustees may deal with any assets which have been transferred to them only in accordance with directions given to them by the Board.

(10) If the Board have reasonable cause to believe that a relevant practitioner or an employee of a relevant practitioner has been guilty of dishonesty resulting in pecuniary loss to a client of the relevant practitioner, they may apply to the Court of Session for an order that no payment be made by any bank, building society or other body named in the order out of any bank, building society or other account or any sum deposited in the name of the relevant practitioner without the leave of the court and the court may make such an order.

(11) Any direction under this section—
(a) shall be given in writing;
(b) shall state the reason why it is being given;
(c) shall take effect on such date as may be specified in the direction (which may be the date on which it is served on the relevant practitioner); and
(d) may be varied or revoked by a further direction given by the Board.

(12) In this section—
"assets" includes any sum of money (in whatever form and whether or not in any bank, building society or other account) and any book, account, deed or other document held by the relevant practitioner on his own behalf in connection with his business as a relevant practitioner or on behalf of the client concerned; and
"independent qualified conveyancer" and "executry practitioner" respectively include any independent qualified conveyancer or executry practitioner whether or not he was registered as such at the time when the matter in relation to which the Board exercise or propose to exercise their powers under this section arose and notwithstanding that subsequent to that time he has ceased to be so registered.'—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 38, 51, 53 and 63 to 66.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The new clause was not heralded during our discussions in Committee, so it may be helpful to the House if I briefly outline its purpose and effect.

The provision is intended to enhance the regulatory structure under which the board is to operate. It corresponds closely to an amendment brought forward during the Report stage of the Courts and Legal Services Bill. The new clause gives the board the power to intervene in the business of an independent, qualified conveyancer or an executory practitioner where it appears to the board that the interests of the practitioners' clients are likely to be put at serious risk. I do not envisage that that power will be used often, but it could prove valuable if a practitioner were to deviate from acceptable business practice to such an extent as to threaten the interests of clients or prospective clients.

Under the new clause, the board's powers are backed up by an enforcement mechanism that allows it to go to the Court of Session for an order to secure compliance. I do not believe that the new clause is controversial. It represents the final component of the regulatory regime that we have established for independent qualified conveyancers and executory practitioners.

Mr. Dewar: I am quite prepared to accept that the new clause is non-controversial, and I am delighted to hear that it is the final component. However, I fear that it may not be the last time that I hear about independent qualified conveyancers. I understand that the new clause deals largely with the winding up of businesses of independent qualified conveyancers—not a particularly cheery subject for those who have faith in the new breed of operator. I am advised that it gives the conveyancing board powers similar, in terms of dealing with their assets, to those allowed to the Law Society of Scotland, in terms of sections 45 and 46 of the Solicitors (Scotland) Act 1980. I certainly do not have strong feelings on that matter, and I am prepared to see it go through.

Mr. Harry Ewing: Does the Minister envisage that the procedure would be activated on a complaint from the client, or is there some other way that I have not understood?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It would normally be activated on a complaint from the client, unless some untoward facts were discovered. I sincerely hope that nothing of that nature will ever occur.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time and added to the Bill.

New clause 22

MULTI-NATIONAL PRACTICES

'. Before section 61 of the 1980 Act there shall be inserted the following section—

"Multi-national practices

60A.—(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, solicitors and incorporated practices may enter into multi-national practices with registered foreign lawyers.

(2) The Council shall maintain a register of foreign lawyers, and may make rules with regard to registration; and, without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing, such rules may include provision as to—
(a) the manner in which applications for registration are to be made;
(b) the fees payable in respect of such applications;
(c) conditions which may be imposed in respect of registration; and
(d) the period for which any such registration is to run.

(3) Section 34(2) and (3) apply to rules made under subsection (2) as they apply to rules made under that section.

(4) Any foreign lawyer may apply to the Council to be registered as such for the purposes of this section and the Council shall, if they are satisfied that the legal profession of which the applicant is a member is so regulated as to make it appropriate for him to be allowed to enter into a multi-national practice with solicitors or incorporated practices, enter his name on the register.

(5) Subject to subsection (6), the Secretary of State may by order made by statutory instrument provide that any enactment or instrument—
(a) passed or made before the commencement of this section;
(b) having effect in relation to solicitors; and
(c) specified in the order, shall have effect with respect to registered foreign lawyers as it has effect with respect to solicitors.

(6) Before making any order under subsection (5), the Secretary of State shall consult the Council.

(7) An order under subsection (5) may provide for an enactment or instrument to have effect with respect to registered foreign lawyers subject to such additions, omissions or other modifications as the Secretary of State specifies in the order.

(8) No order shall be made under subsection (5) unless a draft of the order has been approved by both Houses of Parliament.".'—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 97, 100, 101 and 113 to 115.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: New clause 22 will be welcomed by the whole House. The Bill already provides for the removal of existing statutory barriers to the formation of multinational practices. The new clause makes it clear that Scottish solicitors are entitled to enter into such practices. More significantly, it gives the council of the Law Society of Scotland powers to regulate such practices.

The House will wish to know that the amendment has been discussed with the Law Society, which indicated its support for the new clause and the policy in general. The new clause places the Council of the Law Society under a duty to maintain a register of foreign lawyers with whom Scottish lawyers are to be permitted to go into partnership. They will be lawyers whose native jurisdiction is regulated to the society's satisfaction.

The new clause is an enabling power rather than a detailed attempt to regulate multinational practices. It creates a flexible framework within which details can be worked out in the light of developments in national legal practice, and thus the Secretary of State is accorded a regulation-making power under subsection (5) to attach existing statutes and statutory instruments to foreign lawyers practising in Scotland or in partnership with Scottish solicitors where he considers that appropriate. That power is to be exercised only after consultation with the Law Society's council and is subject to affirmative resolution in both Houses of Parliament.

I believe that the new clause paves the way for the enhancement of business opportunities for the Scottish legal profession and better services for clients.

The remaining amendments in the group are primarily intended to clarify the position of multi-disciplinary practices in the regulatory framework that governs solicitors. The House will be aware that the Bill already provides for the removal of the existing statutory barriers to the formation of multi-disciplinary practices—those involving solicitors and members of other professional disciplines—and for shifting responsibility for the extent to which multi-disciplinary practices should be permitted to the council of the Law Society of Scotland. That is quite proper, as the solicitor profession in Scotland is very much a self-regulating one, and it should be for the council to decide on practising structures for its members.

Mr. Dewar: There is no objection from any quarter with which I have been in touch to the proposals on multinational practices in the new clause, but it would be helpful if the Minister said a little more about them.

I understand that multinational practices contain foreign lawyers who will register with the Law Society of Scotland and who are not necessarily restricted to being lawyers who qualified in another EC country—they can come from any part of the world. Amendment No. 114 defines a foreign lawyer as "a person who is not a solicitor or an advocate but who is a member, and entitled to practise as such, of a legal profession regulated within a jurisdiction outwith Scotland".

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: Does foreign in this case include England?

6.30 pm

Mr. Dewar: I assumed that it does, for these purposes. No doubt the Scottish National party would take an interest in the matter if its members were present, but unfortunately their enthusiasm for law reform in Scotland ran out some hours ago and they are not here to participate in discussing this relevant point.

For these purposes it is fair to say that a foreign lawyer will be an English lawyer, so an English lawyer can become a partner in a Scottish law firm as long as he is registered with the Law Society of Scotland and it is satisfied with his qualifications and his ability to practise. I am not sure what test the society will apply—perhaps the Minister will tell us.

The English jurisdiction is fairly close to the Scottish one, but it seems that even a Spanish, Australian or Papua New Guinean—I cast no aspersions—could perfectly well become a partner. Presumably the Law Society of Scotland will apply a test of competence in the law of Scotland before such a lawyer is allowed to join a practice. No doubt those matters have been discussed with the Law Society; perhaps the Minister can tell us more.

One of the problems with the Bill, of which even Members who are not connected with the measure will have heard, is the extreme danger of reading it in terms of the words that appear within its covers. Sometimes the Government mean the opposite of what the legislation appears to do. That was exemplified in the case of the multidisciplinary practices, which we are defining in the Bill. I am delighted, incidentally, to see the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) in his place. Not only does he hold the distinguished office of vice-chairman of the Conservative party in Scotland, but I note that he is acting as parliamentary private secretary to the Under-Secretary of State, a responsibility that he bears with distinction. Perhaps it is now one that substitutes for his vice-chairmanship, which dangles by the proverbial thread.

As the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) will recall, when we discussed multi-disciplinary practices, we were removing the barriers to them. That was the clear message on the face of the Bill, but it emerged that that was not what we were doing at all. We were not inviting the arrival of those practices. The Government had entered into a private agreement with the Faculty of Advocates first, and thereafter rather more publicly with the Law Society of Scotland, to the effect that they would approve any regulations that would ban multi-disciplinary practices. So there were to be none at all in Scotland in the foreseeable future.

There was a moment of high comedy when we were asked not to defeat a certain part of the Bill on the ground that it prevented the Office of Fair Trading from interfering with our affairs, and because that office was being banned from the field, level or otherwise, it would be even harder for multi-disciplinary practices to enter by the side door or the back door.

So, despite the defining of multi-disciplinary practices, the Government, the Committee and everyone else have agreed not to have them. I want to find out whether the same will apply to multinational practices. Although we appear to be removing barriers and giving them the green light, perhaps there is already an agreement not to have them. Can the Minister clear up that point and say a word or two about the MDPs that we are so neatly defining in amendment No. 114, sub-paragraph (ab)? That may be something of an academic exercise, in view of the arrangements that have been reached, but although the matter was spelt out in Committee, it might be helpful if it were spelt out again on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Harry Ewing: I welcome the proposal to have multinational practices. I suspect that one of the great difficulties of pursuing cases on behalf of clients against the background of tragedies such as Piper Alpha and Lockerbie is our lack of experience in working on a multinational basis. But it is also important to warn the people of Scotland of what lies ahead. I look forward to the day when Ross, Harper and Murphy becomes Ross, Harper, Murphy, Ashrap, Gomez and Waleski.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I should like to ask the Minister to be forthcoming about what precisely is conveyed by subsection (4), which reads:

"Any foreign lawyer may apply to the Council to be registered as such for the purposes of this section."

Some distinguished foreign lawyers may find the prospect attractive.

"The Council shall, if they are satisfied that the legal profession of which the applicant is a member is so regulated as to make it appropriate for him to be allowed to enter into a multi-national practice with solicitors or incorporated practices, enter his name on the register."

One can see circumstances in which the legal profession of which the applicant is a member is so regulated as to ensure that he is a person of good character or financial probity, or that he regularly fulfils responsibilities equivalent to those in Scotland under the solicitors accounts rules. Legal professions may prudently impose such tests on these lawyers, but there appears to be no provision here requiring the council to consider whether they are sufficiently expert in and knowledgeable about Scottish law to be able to enter a professional relationship with Scottish lawyers.

It may be argued that it should not matter whether a person qualified in Spanish law is sufficiently qualified in Scottish law, but partnerships of solicitors attract joint and several liability; so it may equally be argued that before any multinational practice may be created a lawyer coming to it from a foreign jurisdiction should be shown to be well enough versed in the law of Scotland at least to understand the responsibilities of partnership in Scotland.

As I read subsection (4), it is concerned with the way in which the native or the domestic legal system of which the foreign lawyer is a member may be regulated. It is not concerned with whether any such applicant is sufficiently versed in Scottish law to understand the consequences of entering into a partnership with Scottish solicitors. That seems to me to be an omission. Perhaps it is a deliberate omission; if so, no doubt the Minister will tell us. If he accepts that it is an omission by reason of oversight, however, I hope that he will at least give some consideration to the point that I have made. At the very least, it seems to be desirable that anyone entering into a partnership with a Scottish lawyer should be aware of what the consequences may be, in terms of personal liability and what the responsibilities to the Law Society of Scotland and the provisions of the accounts rules undoubtedly are.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: One of the questions that I was asked was whether the term "foreign lawyer" included English lawyers. Amendment No. 114 defines "foreign lawyer" as "a person who is not a solicitor or an advocate but who is a member, and entitled to practise as such, of a legal profession regulated within a jurisdiction outwith Scotland."

The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) and the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) asked who would decide which jurisdictions were acceptable for inclusion in the register of foreign lawyers—for example, whether the educational requirements were sufficient. That will be for the Law Society regulations to decide. The test will be the arrangements for training and fitness in the home jurisdiction of the applicant concerned.

I was also asked whether multi-disciplinary practices would exist. The answer is yes, if the Law Society wants them. The amendments provide for them to be adequately regulated. The hon. Member for Garscadden looks amused, but it is important that we secure the acceptability of the amendments. The Law Society pressed hard for the amendments on multinational practices, and I suspect that there will be more pressure in that regard. The Secretary of State and I both devilled, before being advocates to a QC who is now a European judge—that is a sign of the greater contact between European nations.

Let me say to the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) that I am surprised that, as the shadow Secretary of State is a partner of Ross, Harper and Murphy, he did not at least mention the name of the hon. Member for Garscadden before mentioning many extra names.

Mr. Dewar: I wish this point to be put clearly on the record. On multi-disciplinary practices, the Minister is saying that the Government will abide by what the Law Society of Scotland wants—that they will endorse the decision. If the Law Society wants multi-disciplinary practices, so be it, and if it does not, so be it.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: That is exactly what I am saying. I have had very satisfactory meetings with the Law Society, and I can confirm that it finds the amendments acceptable.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: Is the Minister saying that, if the Law Society of Scotland considers it appropriate that a foreign lawyer should have some knowledge of Scottish law and the consequences and liabilities of entering into partnership with Scottish solicitors, it may impose that as a qualification before admitting any individual to the register that it will maintain?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Yes, it could regulate multinational practices. We are at an early stage, but obviously it will become an issue in 1992, when there will be more competition between European countries. It is only right that this provision should be included in the Bill so that they can take the necessary action as required.

Clause 14

THE SCOTTISH CONVEYANCING AND EXECUTRY SERVICES BOARD

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 21, in page 18, line 31, leave out 'providing such services in the course of practising as solicitors'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this we may take Government amendments Nos. 22, 34 and 99.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The amendments are intended to deal with the concerns expressed by a number of hon. Members in Committee about the demarcation of regulatory responsibilities between the Scottish Conveyancing and Executry Services Board and the Law Society. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) and the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) both spoke eloquently on this topic. I hope that they will agree that the amendments make it absolutely clear that the jurisdiction of the board does not extend to solicitors, who will be regulated by the Law Society alone. It will not be possible for a solicitor to register as a qualified conveyancer or an executry practitioner without first having had his name removed from the roll of solicitors. I believe that the amendments clarify the position.

Mr. Dewar: I welcome that. There was considerable concern in Committee about the possible overlap when someone was both a solicitor and an independent qualified conveyancer. There was a feeling that there might be differences in the rules and regulations and problems about jurisdiction.

As I understand the import of this group of amendments, the conveyancing board will look after the qualified conveyancers and the Law Society will rule supreme with solicitors. The two cannot be combined. That seems a sensible improvement on the rather confused situation that could potentially have existed. I thank the Minister for his efforts.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 22, in page 18, line 37, leave out 'providing such services in the course of practising as solicitors'.—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Clause 15

QUALIFIED CONVEYANCERS

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 23, in page 19, line 21, leave out '(4)' and insert '(13)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may also consider the following amendments: No. 136, in page 19, line 24, leave out 'may' and insert 'shall'.

Government amendments Nos. 24, 25, 35, 36 and 37.

6.45 pm

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I shall be happy to accept amendment No. 136 when it is moved. It ensures consistency between the rules governing registration of executry practitioners and qualified conveyancers, and I am grateful to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) for bringing it before the House.

Amendments Nos. 23, 24, 25, 35 and 36 seek to establish a standard time limit for appeals against decisions made by the Scottish Conveyancing and Executry Services Board relating to disciplinary matters and to the refusal of applications for registration as a qualified conveyancer or as an executry practitioner. The House will have noted that clause 18(10) already provides for such a time limit in connection with the disciplinary measures imposed by the board. The amendments aim for a consistent approach throughout part II.

I am sure that the House will agree that 21 days is a reasonable period within which an aggrieved practitioner can be expected to appeal against a decision made by the board. It corresponds exactly to similar provisions in the Solicitors (Scotland) Act 1980, which is perhaps the most relevant comparable legislation.

Amendment No. 37 fulfils an undertaking that I gave to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) during the Committee's consideration of his amendment No. 253. Its purpose is to place the Secretary of State under a specific duty to include provisions relating to educational qualifications and practical training in the regulations governing the conduct and practice of executry practitioners, which he is required to make under clause 16. While it was always the Government's intention that such matters should be covered in the regulations, the amendment puts the matter beyond question. I wish to make it clear that we have responded to the concern expressed by the hon. Member for Garscadden in Committee.

Mr. Dewar: There is no time to go over what is obviously an improved position. I can only say that I am grateful to the Minister for accepting amendment No. 136, which I shall move when we come to it. It is important that we give proper attention to educational qualifications and to training qualifications in the area where both qualified conveyancers and executry practitioners operate.

The amendments that we shall consider this evening go a long way to meet some of the doubts and anxieties that were expressed in Committee, and I am glad to see them on the amendment paper.

Amendment made: No. 136, in page 19, line 24, leave out 'may' and insert 'shall'.—[Mr. Dewar.]

Amendments made: No. 24, in page 19, line 31, after 'may' insert

', within 21 days of the date on which the Board's decision is intimated to him,'.

No. 25, in page 19, line 33, leave out

'if he is not satisfied'

and insert

'within 21 days of the date on which the outcome of such review is intimated to him'.

No. 97, in page 20, line 5, at end insert—

'or

(d) a multi-disciplinary practice within the meaning of that section,'.—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 26, in page 20, line 22, at end insert—

'(10A) The Secretary of State shall, subject to section 36 of this Act and after consultation with such persons as he considers appropriate, by regulations make such provision as he thinks fit with a view to maintaining appropriate standards of conduct and practice of independent qualified conveyancers, and such regulations shall, in particular, make provision with respect to—

(a) the manner in which such conveyancers conduct the provision of conveyancing services;

(b) conflicts of interest;
(c) the contractual obligations of such conveyancers;
(d) the holding of clients' money; and
(e) the disclosure of and accounting for commissions.

(10B) Regulations under subsection (10A) above shall be made by statutory instrument and no regulations shall be made under that subsection unless a draft of the regulations has been laid before, and approved by a resolution of, each House of Parliament.'

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may take Government amendments Nos. 27 to 32, 43, 56 and 57.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Broadly speaking, the amendments reflect the terms of an amendment that was tabled in Committee—again, by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar)—with some further consequential amendments.

The purpose of the amendments is to place responsibility for making rules governing the conduct and practice of independent qualified conveyancers in the hands of the Secretary of State, who will be required to make such rules in the form of regulations that will, in turn, be subject to affirmative resolution in both Houses of Parliament. When our amended conveyancing proposals were brought before the Committee, our initial view was that it should be for the board to make the rules, subject to the approval of the Secretary of State; however, on reflection a further degree of parliamentary scrutiny is considered appropriate, and I am happy to commend the amendments that so clearly reflect the Committee's wishes.

Mr. Dewar: This is becoming something of a dialogue, but for the best of all possible reasons the Minister has again been helpful. The decision that the Secretary of State should make resolutions that are open to affirmative procedure strengthens parliamentary scrutiny in an area in which there is a degree of public interest. My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) is muttering. I assure him that the whole point is to allow him into the discussion rather than having it confined to the conveyancing board. I hope that he is pleased at that, and I look forward to hearing his many contributions when we debate the regulations that will ultimately be laid.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 27, in page 20, line 25, leave out 'subsections (12) and (13)' and insert 'subsection (12)'.

No. 28, in page 20, line 28, at end insert 'and'.

No. 29, in page 20, leave out lines 33 to 45.

No. 30, in page 21, line 5, leave out 'or (11)(c)'.

No. 31, in page 21, line 11, leave out 'a' and insert 'an independent'.

No. 32, in page 21, line 11, leave out
'rules made under subsection (11)(c)'
and insert
'regulations made under subsection (10A)'.—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 33, in page 22, line 4, at end insert—

'(18A) Where an offence under subsection (17)(a) above is committed by a body corporate and is proved to have been committed with the consent or connivance of or to be attributable to any neglect on the part of—
(a) any director, secretary or other similar officer of the body corporate; or
(b) any person who was purporting to act in any such capacity, he (as well as the body corporate) shall be guilty of the offence and shall be liable to be proceeded against and punished accordingly.

(18B) Where an offence under subsection (17)(a) above is committed by a partnership and is proved to have been committed with the consent or connivance of a partner, he (as well as the partnership) shall be guilty of the offence and shall be liable to be proceeded against and punished accordingly.'

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 39, 83 and 86.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In a sense, the amendments are technical. They are designed to remove existing doubts about whether the law at present would allow the prosecution of individual partners and managers of organisations involved in the provision of legal services as well as the organisations themselves.

Amendment agreed to.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 98, in page 22, line 4 at end insert—

'(18C) Any independent qualified conveyancer who provides conveyancing services upon the account of, or for the profit of, any person other than—
(a) a solicitor;
(b) an incorporated practice within the meaning of section 65 of the 1980 Act;
(c) a multi-disciplinary practice within the meaning of that section; or
(d) another independent qualified conveyancer, knowing that person not to be a solicitor, incorporated practice, multi-disciplinary practice or independent qualified conveyancer, shall be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 4 on the standard scale.'

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider the following amendment No. 137, in page 22, line 4 at end insert:—

'(18C) Any independent qualified conveyancer who provides conveyancing services upon the account of, or for the profit of, any person other than—
(a) a solicitor;
(b) an incorporated practice within the meaning of Section 65 of the 1980 Act;
(c) a multi-disciplinary practice within the meaning of Section 65 of the 1980 Act; or
(e) another independent qualified conveyancer,
knowing that person not to be a solicitor, incorporated practice, multi-disciplinary practice, or independent qualified conveyancer, shall be guilty of an offence and liable in summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 4 on the standard scale.'.

Government amendments Nos. 110 and 112.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This group of amendments clarifies the business relationships which can be entered into by independent qualified conveyancers and solicitors. The first amendment fulfils an undertaking that I gave in Committee to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart). It prevents an independent qualified conveyancer from acting on an agency basis for persons other than solicitors or other independent qualified conveyancers. The obvious example of such an arrangement—I do not think that it is a likely scenario—would be a large financial institution seeking to use independent qualified conveyancers as agents, thus gaining access to the financial market by the back door. Amendment No. 137, which was tabled by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) similarly seeks to prevent such business relationships, and is virtually identical to amendment No. 98, which I hope he will feel able to support.

Amendment No. 110 clarifies the extent of the provision in section 26 of the Solicitors (Scotland) Act 1980 which makes it an offence for solicitors to act on a similar agency basis for unqualified persons. It makes it clear that solicitors will be able to act on such a basis for independent qualified conveyancers and executry practitioners within their specific areas of legal practice. The amendment also makes it clear that solicitors will be able to work on that basis in law centres. That matter was raised in Committee by the hon. Member for Garscadden and, although we discussed it only briefly, the Committee clearly supported the concept of law centres. I think that the law centre in Castlemilk was mentioned. Therefore, the amendment removes one of the remaining legal obstacles to the establishment of law centres and it has the support of the Law Society.

Amendment No. 112 disapplies the offence provision in section 32 of the 1980 Act from independent qualified conveyancers preparing writs relating to heritable or moveable estate. I suggest that they relate only to moveable estate connected with the conveyancing transaction concerned. The amendments are concerned primarily with agency arrangements involving solicitors and qualified conveyancers.

Mr. Dewar: This is a complicated series of amendments and it would not help if I were to plunge into them. At the moment I am not sure that I am competent to do so. I am grateful to the Minister for a series of proposals which largely meet points that were raised in Committee. It is important for the independence of qualified conveyancers to be safeguarded. That is a polite way of saying that this is another move to ensure that the banks and building societies do not get into this field, as originally envisaged. As I understand it, the amendment will prevent conveyancers from being employed by banks or building societies. They will have to work on their own behalf or for solicitors. They cannot work for a financial institution as was at one time envisaged. That is important.

The law centres are a rather technical matter. A number of points were raised about them in Committee and I shall certainly consider how far the Minister has been able to go. I am glad that he feels that he has been able to meet some of the worries expressed by the law centres. The movement has not had as much positive encouragement in Scotland as it deserves. Perhaps we may return to that on another occasion.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: I welcome the amendments, which I thought that I had suggested.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): You can have them.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: No man is a prophet in his own country. I hope that the message will go from here that it will be a criminal offence for anybody to attempt to get around the exclusion of institutions to do conveyancing by employing them as runners, lackeys or fags—whatever one may call them. It is a criminal matter now, and it is important for that to be known.

Amendment agreed to.

No. 37, in page 23, line 16, leave out 'may' and insert 'shall'.

No. 38, in page 23, leave out lines 22 to 25.

No. 39, in page 23, line 47, at end insert—

'(16) Where an offence under subsection (14) above is committed by a partnership or by an unincorporated association (other than a partnership) and is proved to have been committed with the consent or connivance of a partner in the partnership or, as the case may be, a person concerned in the management or control of the association, he (as well as the partnership or association) shall be guilty of the offence and shall be liable to be proceeded against and punished accordingly.'—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Clause 17

EXECUTRY SERVICES BY RECOGNISED FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 40, in page 24, line 1, at beginning insert

'Subject to subsection (2A) below,'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 41, 42, 124 and 141.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The most important of these amendments is No. 41 which is again designed to meet the concerns expressed in Committee by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) relating to the competence of a recognised financial institution wishing to offer executory services. The amendment requires such an institution to notify the board that it complies with certain standards about the educational qualifications and practical training of its executory staff, which will be prescribed in regulations made by the Secretary of State. The provision ensures that financial institutions recognised under clause 17 employ adequately trained staff for the purposes of offering executory services. I am happy to accept amendment No. 141 in the name of the hon. Member for Garscadden. It should not be confused with amendment No. 41, which is also in this group. That provides that the regulations will be subject to affirmative resolution.

Amendments Nos. 40 and 42 deal with the possibility that an institution might, for whatever reason, fail to maintain a suitable complaints mechanism or suitable standards of training for its staff, notwithstanding the fact that it was fully up to standard at the time when it notified the board of its intention to offer executory services. In such circumstances, the institution is required by the amendment to stop providing executory services and to notify the board that it is doing so.

The amendments go a long way towards meeting the concerns expressed in Committee. Amendment No. 124 is technical and clarifies clause 17 in relation to the Insurance Companies Act 1982. Section 16 of that Act specifies the areas of business which, under statute, insurance companies are permitted to undertake. The amendment makes it clear that clause 17 does not extend that area of business. The amendments will introduce additional consumer safeguards for the provision of executory services.

Mr. Dewar: I thank the Minister for the amendments. As he said, they are in response to worries expressed by me and other hon. Members in Committee. I had better mention other hon. Members in case I stand on the distinguished and learned toes of the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn). I am prepared to share the technicality of this matter with him.

It is important that financial institutions such as banks and building societies which are already offering executry services to the public should not, because they are already in the field, be exempt from providing qualifications in training and education for those dispensing the service. It would have been an anomaly if anyone registering as an executry practitioner now had to meet certain standards, while the big boys who were in the area earlier were exempt from the same requirement. Amendment No. 41 seems to meet that point. I shall not even complain about my amendment (a) not appearing on the order paper. The main purpose of the Committee has been met.

7 pm

I am glad that the Minister has accepted amendment No. 141, which means that regulations laid under clause 17(1) will be subject to positive resolution by the House. That is consistent with what we decided earlier this evening, and it is appropriate. I thank the Minister.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 41, in page 24, line 3, after 'so;' insert—

'(aa) it complies with such requirements as may be prescribed by regulations made by the Secretary of State with respect to the educational qualifications and practical training of those of its employees who are to be engaged in the provision of executry services;'.

No. 42, in page 24, line 23, at end insert—

'(2A) Where—

(a) a recognised financial institution ceases (for whatever reason) to comply with the requirements with respect to educational qualifications and practical training referred to in paragraph (aa) of subsection (1) above;

(b) a recognised financial institution ceases (for whatever reason) to be a member of, or otherwise subject to, a scheme referred to in a notice given by it under that subsection; or

(c) such a scheme ceases to comply with the requirements mentioned in paragraph (b)(ii) of that subsection,

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 44, in page 25, line 20, at end insert—

'(ee) in a case where the practitioner has provided inadequate professional services, to direct the practitioner to pay to the client by way of compensation such sum, not exceeding £1,000, as the Board may specify;'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may discuss Government amendments Nos. 45, 125, 79 to 81 and 126.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: These amendments fulfil an undertaking that I gave during the Committee's consideration of new clause 12, which was tabled by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). I said that I would accept the principle behind that new clause, and I have tabled the amendments to do so.

The amendments provide the Council of the Law Society, the Scottish Solicitors Discipline Tribunal and the Scottish Conveyancing and Executry Services Board with a power to order the payment of compensation by a practitioner against whom a complaint of providing inadequate professional services has been upheld. It is intended that the compensation will be for distress or inconvenience that the client has suffered, although it will be open to those disciplinary bodies to order the payment of compensation for a specific and quantifiable financial loss. Amendments along these lines have been pressed for by the Scottish Consumer Council since the introduction of the Bill in another place and I am confident that the consumer lobby will give them a warm welcome. The Law Society of Scotland has indicated that it does not dispute the principle on which the amendments are based.

The House will wish to be aware that a corresponding provision along these lines is included in the Courts and Legal Services Bill—indeed, it was specifically sought by the English Law Society. The amendments also include a further refinement, included after detailed discussions with the Law Society of Scotland, which makes it clear that any decision of the board, the tribunal or the council cannot be founded upon in any proceedings in order to show negligence on the part of the practitioner; that any award of compensation will be totally without prejudice to the client's right of redress under civil law; and that the amount of any award of compensation can be taken into account in the calculation of any award of damages by a court. Those provisos are eminently sensible and will, I hope, meet with the approval of the House.

The compensation power provides a useful additional remedy to the disciplinary sanctions already available to the board, the council and the tribunal.

Mr. Dewar: We have been moving along at fair lick and we have dealt with a great many quite important, but on the whole technical, matters.

The amendment is worth a particular welcome. It has been tabled in response to a new clause that I moved in Committee, but in a sense it is the culmination of a campaign. I join the Minister in paying tribute to the Scottish Consumer Council that lobbied for the amendment. Its chair, Barbara Kelly, was present when these matters were discussed in Committee. The amendment provides an important new power and extends the remedies available to the public in their dealings with solicitors when something has gone wrong. That is useful and important.

We are all aware that the Law Society rightly takes a stringent view of dishonesty or a failure to abide by the solicitors' account rules. However, the general public have felt for some time that there has been a lack of provisions to deal with problems of shoddy work, delay, inadequacy or incompetence. The Law Society already has the power to instruct that the work be put right either by the solicitor free of charge, or by another solicitor at the expense of the defaulting solicitor.

I am aware of the problems through my experience in my constituency and through my contacts with the public. Even those who are now somewhat distant from the everyday business of the law profession are often recipients of stories about it and tales of distress. There is no doubt that those who are faced with inadequate professional services, and the delay and the problems that flow from that, suffer inconvenience and distress. It is right that a power should be available to the Law Society, through its disciplinary machinery, to offer some form of compensation.

The wear and tear on the nerves and the general aggravation that can result from the problem of trying for many weeks, perhaps months, to get a satisfactory answer from the defaulting solicitor can be a considerable burden for those concerned. I think that £1,000 is a fair sum to have available as an upper limit—not as compensation, but as a payment to mark the inconvenience and distress that has been caused.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: The hon. Gentleman said that it was not compensation, but the amendment states, "by way of compensation".

Mr. Dewar: I understand that, and I know that there was some discussion about whether the word "compensation" should be included. I am interpreting the word as I believe it will be interpreted in practice. It is not compensation for a loss, but the giving of some solace for the inconvenience and distress that has been caused. Had the amendment been tabled in Committee, I would have looked for a different word——

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: "Solatium".

Mr. Dewar: "Solatium" has been suggested by a man of law as a suitable shot at getting the right nuance.

I am making a distinction of some importance, and whatever the word in the Bill, I suspect that it will be approached more in the terms of solace or solatium by the Law Society when it operates the scheme. It is in that spirit that I welcome the amendment as an important improvement on the current position. Although a minor matter on another level, it is important to those concerned. It is right that the powers should be available, and I am glad that the Minister has given way on that.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: I welcome the amendment, but I want to put certain questions to my hon. Friend the Minister. I am not sure whether I misheard him, but I thought that he suggested that the fine—it is solatium for the client but a fine for the practitioner—could be subtracted from any award given in civil proceedings. That would be wrong.

I do not like absolutes such as £1,000. People may have suffered appalling experiences and immeasurable losses. There is nothing magic about £1,000, except that it operates on the decimal system. It is idiotic. We just agreed to amendment No. 33, which contains words in the law of Scotland that are new to me:

"shall be liable to be proceeded against and punished accordingly."

Is it not the threat of eternal life to be proceeded against and punished accordingly? It does not say, "You will only be burnt for 10 minutes," or "Satan's oven will not be allowed to be turned up above 50 degrees." If we are to introduce into the law of Scotland the concept of according punishment, why not do it here?

It seems ridiculous to pluck from the air some symbolic, maniacal figure such as £1,000. If an appropriate sum would be £10,000, £50,000 or, as in a recent case in England, £3 million, why should that not be the sum awarded? I see no point to imposing a limit. Why not use instead the words "and punish accordingly"? If we are to introduce marvellous, 16th-century wording of that kind into the law of Scotland, why impose a limit of £1,000? If it is suggested that the award is made by way of compensation, will not the argument be made by the lawyer appearing for the solicitor in future civil proceedings that the complainant has already been compensated? The advocate may argue that, under the Act, the Law Society has awarded compensation of £958.

While I welcome the right of the board to punish delinquent practitioners, the choice of words is most unfortunate, because the word "compensation" can be used in two senses. In cases of reparations, one often finds that the person suffering an injury only begins to recover when he or she has won their case—even if they are awarded only one penny. I appreciate that the complainer may be compensated in the sense that he or she will be made to feel better, but there is also the punishment of the delinquent practitioner to consider. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister seriously to reconsider whether there needs to be an imaginary limit rather than revert to those wonderful and ancient words of "punish accordingly".

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I first make the point that such compensation cannot be founded upon in the courts if a negligence action is subsequently raised, because it relates to distress or inconvenience arising from inadequate professional services. We are talking not in terms of punishment but of assisting the individual concerned. Compensation paid to the client is not to be regarded as a fine upon the solicitor. There is a maximum of £1,000, and the Law Society can award up to that sum —but it does not set limits on what the courts can award. In any event, negligence actions are completely separate from the provision before us.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 45, in page 25, line 43, leave out 'or (b)' and insert ', (b) or (dd)'—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 46, in page 25, line 47, at end insert—

'(6A) Where a practitioner—
(a) fails to comply with a notice under subsection (6) above; or
(b) complies with such a notice but the Board are not satisfied as to the steps taken by the practitioner to comply with the direction to which the notice relates, the Board may apply to the Court of Session for an order requiring the practitioner to comply with the direction to which the notice relates within such time as the court may order.'

The amendment provides the board with an additional enforcement power, to enable it to ensure compliance with any disciplinary direction that it may issue under clause 18(6). It allows the board to invoke the power of the court in support of its disciplinary measures, by providing for it to seek an order from the Court of Session requiring the practitioner to comply with a disciplinary direction. A similar power is available to the council of the Law Society, to secure enforcement of its disciplinary decisions by application to the solicitors' disciplinary tribunal. The amendment provides a useful addition to the board's powers, and I commend it to the House.

Amendment agreed to.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 47, in page 26, leave out from the beginning of line 21 to 'refrain' in line 27.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this, it will be convenient to consider the following: Government amendments Nos. 48 to 50.

Amendment No. 139, in schedule 7, page 94, leave out lines 13 to 15 and insert:—

'In paragraph 14 for the words "may be published in such manner as the Tribunal may determine" there shall be substituted the words "shall where the solicitor complained against is found guilty of professional misconduct or of providing an inadequate professional service be published in such manner as the Tribunal may determine and in all other cases every decision may be published in such manner as the Tribunal may determine."'.

Government amendment No. 84.

7.15 pm

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Amendment No. 47 was the subject of considerable debate in Committee. It deals with the extent of the publicity that should be given to the decisions of the Scottish Conveyancing and Executry Services Board and of the Scottish Solicitors Discipline Tribunal. Hon. Members who were on the Committee will recall that, following lively debate, I undertook to reconsider the matter.

I have reached the view that all decisions of both the board and tribunal should be published, including the names of the practitioners against whom there has been no finding. In doing so, I have taken fully into account representations to the effect that even an acquittal could damage a practitioner's reputation, on the argument that there is no smoke without fire. However, I do not believe that that is likely to be a problem in practice—not least because there is likely to be little public interest in the names of those who have been acquitted. That has proved to be the case south of the border, where the English solicitors' disciplinary tribunal publishes its findings in full. The General Medical Council does likewise.

I do not accept that any special provisions should be made for Scottish solicitors in that respect. Both the board and the tribunal retain a discretion to refrain from publishing names or any other information that might damage the interest of persons other than the practitioner or his close associates or their families. That proviso was requested by the Lord President of the Court of Session, and is eminently sensible. The drafting amendments seek to remove the uncertainty about the effects of the provision that was expressed in Committee. I am aware that this issue divided the Committee, but I am satisfied that the amendments capture its overall mood.

Mr. Dewar: I am bound to observe that the amendments do not capture my mood. The Committee was divided—not between parties, but between those in all parts of it, which presented the Minister with a genuine difficulty in reaching his decision. It would not be sensible to pursue my objections at this stage, but I must express my personal regret at the Minister's decision, which I believe is the wrong one.

It is important that any solicitor held to be guilty of dishonesty or of bad practice, who is the subject of any finding of guilt—to use a shorthand, lay term—in respect of proper professional ethics should have his name and the finding published. However, I have grave reservations about that being done where there has been no finding of fault.

I am unimpressed by the Minister's arguments. Even in General Medical Council findings of no fault or not guilty, its hearings are held in public and it publishes its findings, but its practice should not bind us in considering the correct procedure in disciplining solicitors. Anyone who followed the recent case of the unfortunate doctor who was found not guilty of having sexual intercourse with one of his patients will know that even the colour of his underwear became the subject of prurient and astonishingly widespread public interest. That doctor would be amazed to hear the Minister say that a finding of not guilty may not necessarily damage the reputation of the individual concerned. Of course it can.

I accept that the General Medical Council is in a slightly different situation, in that its hearings are public, so that journalists can attend to report the juicy bits of evidence. That will not happen with solicitors' hearings, but even where there is no finding of fault, details of the hearings may still come to the public notice.

Perhaps I should now put on my own sackcloth and ashes and tell the Minister that such hearings are matters of not only public but professional interest. Although I read the informative articles in each issue of the Law Society of Scotland's journal when I was in private practice, I also checked the records of the disciplinary committee that appeared at the back of that publication. If I learned that one of my colleagues or someone whom I vaguely knew had been up before the committee, and even if that individual had not been found to be at fault,

[Mr. Dewar]

I could not help noting that a charge had been brought at all—and the fact that it had did not do that individual's reputation any good in my mind.

To be quite honest, his professional reputation suffered. People used to say, "Well, you know, he has been before the disciplinary committee a couple of times. All right, they didn't get anything on him, but!" Solicitors are no more objective about presumptions of innocence than any other group, and they are just as much of a gossipy village as any other vested interest or professional group. It is nonsense for the Minister to say that there will be no damage.

In amendment No. 84 we have gone to great lengths to say that there need not be publication if it would damage the interests of any person other than the solicitor, his partner or their families. Also, there ought to be some consideration for the inevitable damage that could result for someone who is also worthy of consideration: the solicitor who has been the subject of allegations which have not been proved to be justified.

Publication is bound to have a damaging effect, for the reasons that I have given. Clearly, my own preference would have been for my amendment No. 139, because it said that there should be no discretion, if there was a finding of fault, which is a big change from the present arrangements. If solicitors were found guilty of the complaint made against them, their names had to be published, subject to the necessary qualifications in amendment No. 84.

However, if the finding was not guilty, we should at least leave the element of discretion so that, if it was clear that there was no moral turpitude and the allegations made had been held not to be proved, the discretionary committee of the Law Society could decide that, even if there was an interest in ventilating the circumstances of the case because it made a point of practice about which solicitors ought to be aware, it could be done without naming the solicitor concerned. That seems to be a sensible provision, and I am sorry that it has not found favour with the Minister. He is wrong, and individuals may suffer as a result.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) as I can imagine nothing more harmful than publication. As he generously suggested, professional people are no less scurrilous in their suspicions, although there should be a presumption of innocence, than non-professional people. If someone comes up before the disciplinary committee and gets off twice, all they will say is that he has got away with it again. Publication will be a slur on a solicitor's professional reputation and it will be impossible to remove it.

I was astonished that a Scottish Minister should pray in aid the English section of the General Medical Council as an example to show that people did not suffer. I do not suppose there is any hon. Member in the Chamber who does not remember the name of the doctor the hon. Member for Garscadden mentioned, but the women with whom he was supposed to have had intercourse were protected and known as Mrs. A and Mrs B.

The General Medical Council presumed guilt before it started, because it said that a couple of women could not be named, although their practices could not be affected as they did not have any. Their livelihoods and their families would not be affected, but the council said that the man who was wrongly accused could be named and the press were able to name him. I would not want the English section of the General Medical Council to be taken for an upholder of morals if that is the way that it behaves.

Therefore, at the very least there should be the discretion not to disclose the name of a solicitor against whom a complaint has been made. I could name many cases—but I shall not—in which a disappointed litigant has made allegations against a solicitor, frequently at the same time as litigation but often years later, for motives which were entirely vindictive, irrational and emotional. There is absolutely no reason why the solicitor's livelihood, or that of his family and his partners, as well as his clients' interests should be put at risk by the publication of such an accusation. People remember accusations, but they rarely remember acquittals.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: If the Minister seeks to rely on the General Medical Council, one can only assume that he was on holiday throughout the months of August and September. Anyone who had any regard to the nature and degree of publicity which attached to the proceedings referred to by the hon. Member for Garscadden could not but believe that a procedure which resulted in such publicity was thoroughly defective and damaging. The subject of such publicity has little chance of recovering.

I hope that the individual we are discussing will recover, but the nature of the coverage in the press, on television and radio was such that he will find it a substantial obstacle to overcome. These matters must be assessed against the principle of public interest. It is clearly in the public interest that they should know about solicitors who have contravened the rules and regulations and have been found guilty of so doing.

One might argue that, for the public's protection, they should know which solicitors have fallen below the prescribed standards of behaviour and conduct, so that they can exercise a choice about going to that solicitor. Also, they can be advised that discipline and behaviour are taken seriously by the Solicitors Discipline Tribunal.

Where is the public interest in publishing the names of people who have not been found to have contravened the regulations? Hon. Members on both sides of the House and in Committee have accepted that the professional and financial consequences may be substantial for the individual concerned and for his partners and associates.

The Minister has taken a broad brush, and decided to publish and be damned, but the people who will be damned are those who do not deserve to be. Even at this stage, the Minister should be able to exercise his independent judgment, and take a decision for which he would be praised by both sides of the House—a decision that would reflect an independence of mind appropriate to the office that he holds—and say that he will think the matter over again. If he withdrew the amendment and gave it further consideration, he would earn the respect of the whole House.

Mr. Harry Ewing: It is a great pity that the example of the General Medical Council has been thrust into the debate. There is no comparison between a medical practitioner who is accused of misconduct and the procedure followed when a legal practitioner is accused of malpractice.

In the case of the medical practitioner, whether a consultant or general practitioner, a whole host of procedures are followed before the case finally goes to the General Medical Council. Many cases do not even reach the council, because they are dealt with and disposed of at an intermediate stage. That is not the case with legal practitioners, because there is only one avenue for dealing with their alleged misdemeanors.

The example of the General Medical Council is a red herring, for the reasons I have already stated and also because the council is constituted differently from the tribunal which considers allegations made against legal practitioners. The General Medical Council includes members of the public. My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) was a lay member of the council for a number of years, and a number of lay members sit in judgment on cases. There is no comparison between what happens to a medical practitioner and what happens to a legal practitioner when they transgress.

The Minister ought to accede to the request by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) and take this matter away. There is no doubt whatsoever that it would do almost irreparable damage to a solicitor practising in a closely knit community. Anyone who thinks that closely knit communities are to be found only in villages knows nothing of some of Scotland's larger urban areas. In my constituency, all the solicitors who practise in Falkirk, Grangemouth and Bo'ness are well known to every person who lives in those communities. If, after a disciplinary hearing, any one of those solicitors was found not to have transgressed yet had his or her name published, I can give the Minister an absolute guarantee —my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) is here; he knows the communities that I am talking about as well as I do, and in the case of Bo'ness better than I do—that that solicitor's practice would be damaged beyond repair.

7.30 pm

It is a major error for the Minister to suggest that those who are found not to have trangressed should have their names published. I accept what the Minister said about there being no smoke without fire. A balance has to be struck. Do we publish the name of someone who is found not to have transgressed and therefore seek to clear that person's name, or do we withhold the name and hope that people accept that that person has not transgressed?

I accept that a balance has to be struck, but it is not a fine balance. The heavy balance of probability comes down in favour of not publishing that person's name. Damage will be done in any case, but the damage could be minimised by not publishing the names of those who were found not to have transgressed. The names of those who were found to have transgressed should certainly be published, but those who have not transgressed can do without the ignominy of their names being published, with the statement that they have been found not guilty. There is nothing more damning. The Minister ought therefore to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Dalyell: When colleagues have spent many hours on a Bill, those hon. Members who did not spend those many hours upstairs ought to be reticent. Perhaps, however, I may be allowed to break silence on this issue —and briefly.

I am strongly in favour of the arguments that were first advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). My strong, ferocious feeling is the result of constituency experience. When my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) referred to Bo'ness he may have been thinking of a particular case that arose some years before Bo'ness became part of his constituency, when I represented it. The case is indelibly marked on my memory. It demonstrates how vulnerable solicitors can be if someone bears a grudge against them, a grudge that is perhaps completely ill-founded. Doctors are also vulnerable, and the police are becoming more and more vulnerable.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, East said, the trouble is that there is no smoke without fire. Mud sticks in small Scottish communities. This is not a party matter. When it becomes clear that the mood of the House of Commons is such that the Minister ought to think again —this Minister has a reputation, well deserved, in my opinion, for decency and for listening—and since he has heard colleagus on all sides ask him to think again about this matter, as a result of all our experiences, he should do so. Therefore I ask him, please, to do so.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: We have had very interesting debates, both tonight and in Committee. The tenor of the representations made on that occasion was rather different. Powerful speeches were made in Committee on the subject in support of the proposition that there should be no special treatment for lawyers on the question of what publicity should be given to the disciplinary decisions of the relevant regulatory authorities.

Views on the matter do not divide along party political lines. For example, on that occasion the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) said that he saw no grounds for making a special case for lawyers in this context. On looking into the position with regard to similar professional regulatory authorities, I am of the firm view that the case for giving publicity to the decisions of the council, the tribunal and the board in all cases is conclusive.

I recognise the strongly held views both inside and outside the legal profession on this question. Nevertheless, I believe that the amendments that I have tabled reflect a sensible and moderate approach. I hope, therefore, that the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) will not feel that he has to press amendment No. 139 to a Division. I do not see the need for any secrecy in connection with the decisions of the tribunal or the board, whatever the outcome of the case in question.

Mr. Wilson: We intend to press this matter to a vote because an important point of principle is involved. What both we and the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) have been asking is: do we believe in smearing people? To publish a verdict of innocence but still to broadcast the fact that the case occurred amounts to stigmatising a person's reputation.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: I advise the hon. Gentleman —I shall not charge for this opinion—that if he wants to defame someone without the risk of having to pay damages, all that he needs to say is, "My dear boy, let me be the first to deny this rumour that is going about that you are a paedophile."

Mr. Wilson: Perhaps we could have a conference to agree on which rumours about the hon. and learned Gentleman we should deny.

I am not a lawyer; I have a journalistic background. People have come to see me on many occasions because they were obsessed by what they regarded as a legal grievance. That has occurred particularly in the Highlands. Crofting throws up innumerable cases of that kind. Such people go to every lawyer in the Highlands and Islands and become absolutely convinced that each new lawyer they see is more bent and less interested in their case than the previous lawyer. People who are obsessed in that way take their case from lawyer to lawyer.

I have spent many hours trying to get to the bottom of complicated cases in order to find out whether someone has been badly treated. As soon as one realises that a person has been to 10 lawyers and that the first nine agree, one's suspicions are aroused. When a person is convinced of his rectitude but when in law he does not have a leg to stand on, the idea that the lawyers should be exposed as having failed their client, or should be suspected of having failed their client by the publication of this material, would be gratuitous, offensive and unnecessary, and would not lead to public satisfaction with the process. It would discredit people who had no cause to be discredited.

We all agree that wrongdoing and malpractice should be published, but where malpractice and wrongdoing have been found not to have been committed there should be no publication. It is a simple principle. I wish that it could be extended beyond solicitors to many others. There is nothing so damaging as the dirty little paragraph in a local newspaper telling the world that someone has been found not guilty of something. Two wrongs do not make a right. Let us not enshrine in law, by means of the amendment, the principle that solicitors should be treated in the same way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Question is that the amendment be made——

Mr. Dewar rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are dealing with amendment No. 47.

Mr. Dewar: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It would save a lot of confusion if I say that I shall recommend to my hon. Friends that we force a Division on amendment No. 139.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman can do that, but it appears way on in the Order Paper. We cannot take a Division on amendment No. 139 until we reach it on the Order Paper. The hon. Gentleman could certainly divide the House on that amendment, but it would not happen for some time. Perhaps he would like to reconsider his position in the light of that.

Mr. Dewar: The only way that I could achieve the effect that I wish is either to vote for amendment No. 139 or against Government amendment No. 84. That might have the effect of marking the point that I make. I do not know whether it would be easier to divide on Government amendment No. 84. Unfortunately, it is a mixed bag of amendments, but I am sure that the Chair understands my difficulty.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If I could help the hon. Gentleman, I would, but Government amendment No. 84 appears a long way down the Order Paper. It will not be possible to vote on it until we reach it.

Mr. Dalyell: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Might not this be one of the occasions when parliamentary procedure is a bit unhappy in its effects? In the light of what has been said, some hon. Members would like to give the Minister time to consult his ministerial colleagues and advisers and reach a considered decision. I am very much against Ministers being forced, at point blank range, into a decision when, if given more time, they might reach a different decision.

Mr. Dewar: In the circumstances, I will not divide the House at this point, but I reserve the option to do so on amendment No. 139 when we reach it. That would be common sense. I am attracted to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). I do not know whether the Minister has any room for manoeuvre, but he will have gathered that we feel quite strongly about this point of principle and that our feelings are shared by some Conservative Members.

I hope that it is not improper to say that I have had conversations with the Law Society on the matter and that in general it supports the point that I am making. There is quite a group of interested people and of people of some expertise, and perhaps in the interval before we reach amendment No. 139, the Minister will consider his position and consult representatives of the Law Society, who are in the building.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand the difficulty that the House is in, but I can give the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) an assurance that, when we reach amendment No. 139, if he desires to divide the House, that desire will be conceded by the Chair.

Mr. Harry Ewing: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. To clear the mind of hon. Members, the vote on amendment No. 139 is anything but imminent. As I read the Order Paper, it would be the last vote in our consideration. That takes the pressure off the Minister and gives him much more time to reach that sensible conclusion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hope that we have reached a sensible and happy conclusion.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 54, in page 39, line 21, leave out 'and the High Court of Justiciary'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to consider Government amendments Nos. 55 and 70 to 77.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: There has been considerable support for the principle underlying the new provisions contained in paragraph 4(2)(b) of schedule 4 relating to the filling of vacancies in the Inner House of the Court of Session. Under existing provisions, when a vacancy arises in a division of the Inner House, the most senior lord ordinary is automatically appointed. In many circumstances, it may well be that, not least by virtue of his experience, the most senior lord ordinary is indeed the best-fitted judge to fill the vacancy, but, equally, there is no reason to suppose that that will necessarily be true on each and every occasion.

The Buggins' turn principle, if I may so describe it, may have worked well enough in the past, but it hardly seems appropriate in modern circumstances. In recent years, there has been a very substantial increase in the work loads of the Supreme Courts, a significant increase in the number of judges and an increased use of extra divisions in the Inner House. Until 1988, judges of the Inner and Outer Houses received identical salaries but in that year, to reflect current circumstances, the Top Salaries Review Body recommended, and the Government accepted, that a salary differential should be introduced.

To reflect those changes, provision has been made in the Bill for vacancies in the Inner House to be filled by the Lord President and Lord Justice Clerk in consultation, as appropriate, with the other judges. In our deliberations in Committee on these new provisions, it was suggested that it would be appropriate for there to be statutory provision for the Secretary of State also to be involved in these appointments. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) was keen on that amendment. The Secretary of State is, of course, involved in other judicial appointments to the Supreme and Sheriff Courts, and with regard to appointments to the Inner House it would seem to be appropriate for there to be some measure of accountability to Parliament.

On that basis, the Government have tabled the amendment, which provides that the consent of the Secretary of State will be required for appointments to the Inner house. The Lord President and the Lord Justice Clerk have been consulted about the amendment and have expressed themselves content with it, for their interests. The amendment meets the concern expressed in Committee, and I commend it to the House.

The purpose of amendments Nos. 54, 55, and 71 to 77 is to put beyond doubt the jurisdiction of temporary judges appointed under the provisions of the Bill. It has been the intention since the outset that judges, whether permanent or temporary, appointed under the new provisions should, like the existing senators, be able to sit in the Court of Session and the High Court, and the amendments are designed to ensure that that will be so.

Mrs. Fyfe: Will political involvement mean that henceforth the Minister might take the opportunity to monitor the appointment of women judges, whether they be temporary or permanent, Inner or Outer or superior or inferior?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The principle is that they are appointed on merit.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): I thank the Minister for making these changes, but during the recess I have had a better idea than the one that I suggested to him, and I should like to put it on record in Hansard.

The Bill provides that the Lord President and the Lord Justice Clerk shall consult such other judges as they think appropriate. It seems proper that they should consult all the judges. One of the greatest Scottish traditions, for judges, peers and other matters, is that those who are part of the fraternity should judge who is appropriate to act on their behalf. The Senate of the College of Justice is a collegiate court. Until the life peerage was introduced, which some of us greatly regret, the peers of Scotland elected from their number those whom they thought worthy to be in the House of Lords, and peers created before 1707—I am not sure whether the Dukes of Hamilton were—are entitled to nominate which of their children shall succeed them. I hope that the Minister appreciates that terrible duty. The concept of democratic selection is an important matter.

With the greatest respect to my hon. Friend the Minister, I must say that he is not being quite truthful with the House when he says that the purpose of the amendment, which seeks to leave out the words:

[Sir Nicholas Fairbairn]

"and the High Court of Justiciary", is to put beyond doubt that the people named are allowed to appear. No judge is appointed as a judge in the High Court of Justiciary. He is appointed as a Senator of the College of Justice, and he takes the oath in the Court of Session and not in the High Court of Justiciary. He is entitled to appear in the High Court of Justiciary, although the amendment does not say that. It says merely that, for the purposes, he is a Lord Commissioner of the Senate. I say with respect through my hon. Friend to his civil servants that they have realised that they got it wrong historically and they have corrected it. However, when we correct a mistake, let us not pretend that we are trying to put matters beyond doubt.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: It seemed a rather curious provision when it was first put forward that promotion, as I suppose that it would be regarded, from the Outer House to the Inner House should be left to the Lord President of the Court of Session and the Lord Justice Clerk who, after all, are the people who occupy the chairs of the two appellate divisions of the court. What the Minister has now told the House that he is prepared to accept represents a proper compromise, not least because those appointed to the office of Senator of the College of Justice are appointed by the monarch, but on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for Scotland.

To introduce the Secretary of State into the procedure by which a judge may be promoted from the Outer House to the Inner House seems entirely consistent with the procedure adopted when judges are appointed in the first place. For that reason, I welcome what the Minister has said. It reflects a proper balance of the interests that we have discussed. The Minister has properly reflected the argument in Committee in what he has told the House that he is willing to accept.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 55, in page 39, line 32, leave out 'and the High Court of Justiciary'.—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Clause 36

ADVISORY AND SUPERVISORY FUNCTIONS OF THE DIRECTOR

Amendments made: No. 56, in page 42, line 36, after 'section' insert '15(10A) or'.

No. 57, in page 42, line 38, leave out 'or (11)(c)'—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

New clause 13

RESTRICTION ON NUMBER OF PERSONS IN LICENSED PREMISES

'.—(1) After section 38 of the principal Act (power of licensing board to make byelaws) there shall be inserted the following section:—

"Restriction on number of persons in licensed premises.

38A.—(1) A licensing board, when granting a licence, may attach a condition to the licence limiting the number of persons to be admitted to the premises in respect of which the licence is granted.

(2) The holder of a licence to which a condition under subsection (1) above is attached or any employee or agent of his shall be guilty of an offence if there is a breach of such a condition."

(2) In section 17(6) of the principal Act (appeal as to conditions attached to licence) after the expression "38(3)" there shall be inserted the expression ",38A(1)".

(3) In Schedule 5 to the principal Act (offences and penalties) after the entry in respect of section 38(4) there shall be inserted the following entry:—

"Section 38A(2)	Breach of condition attached to licence	Yes	Yes	level 3 on the standard scale".'.

—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

In Committee in another place, an amendment was moved enabling a licensing board, in granting renewal of a licence, and after consulting the fire authority, to fix, in the interests of public safety, the maximum number of persons entitled to be within the premises concerned from time to time and to make that number of condition of the licence.

On behalf of the Government, the then Minister of State said that he was aware of the problems of overcrowding in public houses in the Borders in the summer months that had given rise to the amendment, notwithstanding that under the Bill the fire authority will be added to the list of competent objectors to applications and that boards will have increased powers to impose restriction orders on licensed premises. He said that the Government would take the matter away and consider it further with a view to returning to it during the later stages of the Bill. I must say to the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) that members of his own party made that proposal.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: Name them.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The proposal was put forward on behalf of the noble Lord Mackie of Benshie, who used to be a Member of this House.

I remember the former Secretary of State, Willie Ross, being asked by an hon. Member who represented a Cunninghame constituency when he had last been in a Scottish pub. His reply was, "Not as long as I can remember."

I believe that there is a serious safety risk. I could go through the evidence from the police and from the firemasters in certain circumstances. The point was made in the other place that there were similar provisions for restrictions on numbers in other enactments in respect of which similar difficulties could be said to exist in terms of the concentration of people in particular parts of the building. Lord Tordoff doubtless had in mind, among other enactments, section 41 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982, which provides that a public entertainment licence shall be required for the use of premises as a place of public entertainment, and that a licensing authority may attach conditions to such a licence limiting the number of persons to be admitted to the premises. So far as we are aware, enforcement of that provision has not given rise to any difficulty.

A number of licensing boards have already invited the Secretary of State to consent to amendment of byelaws to include a provision that would enable the board to limit the number of persons in licensed premises. However, in our view, such a provision could not be framed in a way that was not ultra vires, and the Secretary of State has been powerless to act.

I should mention that the chief constables of Grampian and Central, and the firemaster of Grampian have all written to express their concern about the lack of control of numbers in licensed premises. They suggest that, in some cases, it can lead to extreme danger to the public as a result of overcrowding. They are concerned that there are no powers under present licensing legislation to enable them to act.

The Scottish Office shares that concern and sees the new clause as an important additional public safety measure. In our view, it should not lead to widespread restrictions on numbers being imposed. We should expect licensing boards to consider the circumstances carefully when they have it in mind to impose such a condition, to do so with due regard to any concern of the applicant and to set such a condition only when they are satisfied that the measure is necessary in the interests of public safety. The premises, for example, may be regularly crowded for social events such as birthday parties and discos. The new clause is deliberately widely drawn so that boards will be able to specify the condition in the terms appropriate to a case. It will, of course, be open to the applicant to appeal to the sheriff against the terms if he so wishes.

Mr. Wilson: I thought for a moment that the Minister was going to give us a wee song, perhaps something like, "I knew a man who knew a man who couldn't get a drink in Peebles". The difference is that the man who could not get a drink in Peebles is a Member of the House of Lords. It is a tradition with these people when there is a slight irritation to think, "We'd better get some legislation through because we couldn't get to the bar at the common ridings."

This is a foolish and potentially dangerous proposal. If it is generally enforced, it will cause infinitely more problems than it will ever resolve. In his somewhat puzzling closing remarks, the Minister seemed to suggest that he did not want to see it enforced. Why on earth is it being put on the statute book when there are already many other ways of addressing the problem?

It is worth looking a little more closely at the origins of the new clause and also pointing out that we heard nothing of it in Committee. If we had, it would have received the usual savaging from Committee members of all parties. It was best withheld as a little surprise package for tonight.

It was not, alas, Lord Mackie of Benshie in person who introduced the new clause. It was Lord Tordoff who, according to the Minister, thinks of little else but the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. I have been asked who Lord Tordoff is. I am sure that the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) will be able to give us copious biographical details. Unfortunately Lord Tordoff had to do the job because Lord Mackie of Benshie, he apologised, could not be present as he had an engagement at the cathedral in Lincoln involving laying up the colours of his old squadron. In the course of researching this matter, I am bound to wonder at the crowded social life that Lord Mackie enjoys.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: I know that we are not supposed to know anything about Members of the other place. Has Lord Tordoff ever been in Scotland and, if so, has he ever been in a pub in Scotland?

Mr. Wilson: Perhaps he got his title from what he perceived to be the instruction shouted at him when he entered a pub in Scotland.

The plot thickens because Lord Tordoff informed the House of Lords:

> "The amendment arises out of discussions between my hon. Friend Mr. Archy Kirkwood and the police, and correspondence between my right hon. Friend Sir David Steel and the Ettrick and Lauderdale District Council"— this is the exciting bit—

> "following experiences in the Roxburgh district."

In his peroration, Lord Tordoff declared:

> "It is because of that considerable perturbation in the Borders that I move the amendment."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 17 May 1990; Vol. 409, c. 412-13.]

8 pm

I thought to myself, "Perturbation is building up in the Borders, so by the time we reach the new clause, the Liberal Benches will be crowded with perturbed Borderers." Only a few minutes ago, I saw the distinguished former leader of the Liberal party, the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel) entering the Chamber. What is more, he had brought with him the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown). I thought to myself, "Here is a true measure of the perturbation in the Borders. The right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale not only comes here in person; he brings the leader of his party with him." But then they left. So where is testimony to the source of the disease? Where are the hon. Members ready and willing to support the proposal?

Mr. Menzies Campbell: It is too crowded.

Mr. Wilson: I do not think that there is any danger of the Liberal Benches becoming too crowded.

Where is the first-hand evidence of the circumstances that gave rise to this nonsense in the first place? Alas, we are not to hear from the perturbed representatives of Border constituencies—unless, that is, the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East is acting as their surrogate. Perhaps he will be the Lord Tordoff of these proceedings.

I accept that the power in the new clause is an enabling power. The new clause does not say, "This must happen" but allows licensing boards to set limits if they so wish. But once the power exists, it will be used. The licensing boards are not noted for their coyness. They do not usually say, "There are things that we can do but we decline to do them." If the power exists to set limits, they will set limits.

Such limits will become part of the normal licensing procedure and the important point is that they will apply on a year-round basis. They will be in force every day of the year. For 360 or even 364 days of the year, they may be perfectly sensible and reasonable limits. What I find irritating and unacceptable about the new clause—and this is why I have referred to its origins and to common ridings and riots in Roxburgh—is that it is aimed specifically at overcrowding in pubs on the big day in the small town. It is aimed at the big day in the local community—the one day in the year, perhaps, when the pubs will be en fête and overspilling and when people will be pouring into them in a general atmosphere of bonhomie.

[Mr. Wilson]

For that one day in the year, there may not really be enough pubs to cope, but everyone adjusts and things go along very well. They certainly go along very well in every community—large or small—that I know in Scotland. If pubs have to observe a limit to avoid being found guilty of a criminal offence, there will have to be a man at the door —like a MacBrayne purser—standing there clicking them in and clicking them out, or perhaps even a turnstile, to ensure that the number of people in the pub does not exceed the legal limit.

Let me go back to my home town for an example. I am not familiar with the Border ridings, which may, indeed, be riotous occasions, but I think the Cowal games—the ones I know best—are quite a good example. I should not like to be the guy standing at the door of a pub during the games weekend saying, "We can have 150 inside; would the other 500 mind waiting outside in an orderly queue until there is room in the pub?" I am sure that neither Lord Tordoff nor Lord Mackie of Benshie imagined themselves being outside in the queue. No doubt they thought that they would be inside among the 150. The new clause would cause infinitely more problems than exist at present.

The problem would also arise on the night of the big football match, when pubs near the ground are inundated with people. Of course, people exercise their judgment: if the pub is so crowded that it is clear that they are not going to get a drink, they will not stand there waiting. I know that people should not drink on the way to football matches—it is very wicked—but some of them do. The pubs are crowded when people go in for a quick drink between work and an evening kick-off. Under the new clause they would be told to stand in a queue by a man on the door regulating the number of people in the pub to avoid a criminal offence being committed. I know that I am approaching the matter in a light-hearted way but I say in all seriousness that, in this, I can see the potential for trouble. It is ridiculous to legislate without taking account of the real circumstances that are bound to arise.

Another objection, raised in the other place by Lord Macaulay of Bragar, is that there may be only one man standing at the door in a pub where there are three bars. Two of those bars might be empty while the other is going like a fair. That would mean that we should have to have three men standing at each pub door to ensure that each space within the same licensed premises fell within the law. The new clause is impractical and unworkable and anyone who has anything to do with the licensed trade will confirm that.

There are already many ways of countering overcrowding. We already have legislation on the statute book. In the notes that the Minister kindly supplied to us, he points out that, in preparing the new clause, the Government had regard to section 1 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 and that they also took account of the fact that, under the present Bill, the fire authority will be added to the list of competent objectors to applications, and boards will have increased powers to impose restriction orders in relation to the hours of opening of licensed premises. I repeat that there are many ways of approaching the matter, although I shall not go into all of them now. The most sensible way of dealing with serious overcrowding is for the police to exercise their right to enter and say, "There are too many people in this pub; please get some of them out." That is how matters function on a practical basis. It would be wrong, foolish and misguided to legislate as is proposed. It gives me no pleasure to do so, but I confidently predict that the new clause would create an awful lot more problems than it would solve. The Minister should take it away and reconsider it.

Sir Hector Monro: The hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) has put the case for the opposition so well that not a great deal needs to be added. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will think twice about proceeding with the new clause. He knows that it would have had no hope of getting through the Standing Committee—for the very good reason that it is impracticable. I am the last chap to want to legislate for something that is practically impossible.

The new clause seems to have stemmed from Lord Mackie's visits to Border common ridings. As someone who has been to many dozens of common ridings—in the Borders, in Dumfries and Galloway and even in Strathclyde—I know that they are conducted with great good humour, that the police always manage the crowds with great sympathy and that the whole day goes by without any trouble. It is significant that those who advocate the new clause seem to belong to the police forces and fire services in the north-east; they are not from the Borders or from Dumfries and Galloway.

We should also bear in mind the fact that 20 Lord Mackie of Benshie would have a lot more trouble getting into a pub than 50 Members for Kilmarnock and Loudoun —on grounds of physical presence alone.

I agree with the point that the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North made about pubs with several doors and several bars. I shall not go into the rugby stories that I could tell about the length of rugby bars and so on. But with the best will in the world, how is a publican to check all his bars and doors while doing his best to sell drams and pints behind the counter?

In practical terms, the new clause would be impossible to implement, and we should think twice about proceeding with it, given that there seems to be so little evidence in its favour. Those of us with practical experience of the crowding that is alleged to cause offence would disagree with the argument that my hon. Friend the Minister is advancing.

We should bear in mind the fact that the common ridings take place in each town only once a year. However, we should also consider the many occasions when football and rugby crowds gather after matches. Those people certainly cause overcrowding, but only for a relatively short period. Why should they not do that? Why can we not get together in a huddle and have a drink if we want? There is no reason why we should be prevented from doing that.

The world may be a great nanny society in which people are not allowed to do anything; sooner or later we will not even be able to eat or drink. It would be very disappointing if the Government, who encourage freedom of choice, were to prevent me from going to the pub of my choice after a good rugby international at Murrayfield, particularly when we have all been so good at the match and have had nothing to drink. It seems very hard for the Government to stop us having anything to drink when we leave the game simply because there are too many people in a pub.

It is beyond one's comprehension to imagine the hard-pressed police behaving like Securicor and, as the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) said, checking people into the pub and then out again and even counting two if they are on a stretcher. The burden that we would be placing on the police force at a time when the police are particularly hard pressed is unimaginable.

We need more practical evidence from those involved in these affairs before we grant such tough powers to the licensing boards to allow them to tell a publican that he cannot have 100 people in his pub on a Saturday night or 50 people in at any one time while the police, the publican and his staff must also somehow ensure that the law is enforced. There may be good intentions behind the new clause, but it would be bad legislation.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I should begin by declaring an interest. If new clause 13 is accepted, it may do much to create work for lawyers and especially work for those who, like me, from time to time practice in licensing law.

Although the Minister referred to my next point in his speech, and the issue is not reflected in the Bill, it is objectionable that a discretion is to be conferred on licensing boards without any sign of the factors upon which that discretion is to be exercised. The Minister referred to public safety. However, there is nothing in the new clause about public safety, convenience, comfort, nuisance, undue disturbance or anything else which features elsewhere in licensing legislation. It is unreasonable to confer on licensing boards a discretion as unfettered as this.

A license holder's only remedy to the provision would be to invoke the appeal provisions in clause 39, which provide a fairly restricted basis on which an appeal may be taken. If a board imposes a series of arbitrary limits on the number of people who may be admitted to a licensed premises within its jurisdiction, virtually all such impositions will go to appeal. Apart from creating work for lawyers, the Minister will ensure that the work of the sheriff court in Scotland is severely prejudiced and curtailed.

One should confer no discretion on an administrative body unless it is essential that that discretion is required in the public interest and no other way of preserving that public interest can be found. In the hands of responsible licensing boards that would create no difficulties, but from time to time, boards act irresponsibly or unreasonably. They are sometimes motivated by considerations other than the merits of the application before them. The Minister should not confer yet another discretion on licensing boards willy-nilly.

One of the important changes to the law effected by the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976, with which the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) had so much to do, took away the unfettered discretion from licensing boards. At that time, Parliament thought it necessary that a new system of licensing should be created in which there was less discretion and in which decisions were more easily understood and more amenable to analysis and explanation. I believe that that was the correct way to proceed and I believe that the new clause contradicts that.

So far, the evidence in support of the new clause is pretty thin. I respect the views of Lord Tordoff and Lord Mackie of Benshie, because they are as entitled to their views as anyone else. However, their views are worth no more than mine or the views of the hon. Member for Falkirk, East, the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) or anyone else with any experience of public houses in Scotland—and I include the Minister in that. No doubt, when he should have been reading the newspapers and discovering what was happening in the General Medical Council, he was in public houses around the country considering whether this proposal was necessary to preserve the peace and quiet of the people of Scotland.

The new clause is not necessary, it is ineptly framed, and it confers a discretion which is not needed and which may be abused. Those seem compelling reasons why we should not accept it.

8.15 pm

Mr. Allan Stewart: As the debate progresses, I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister is becoming increasingly convinced that the sensible course of action is to enhance his reputation for independence of mind and withdraw the new clause.

The House is in great difficulty when the Minister's justification for the new clause is that the subject was raised in another place in the context of a problem arising from the Border common ridings. The House has heard that my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), who knows about the Border common ridings, is wholly opposed to this new clause.

If the justification for the new clause arises from problems at the Border common ridings, it is surprising that my hon. Friend the Minister calls in evidence representations from Grampian police and Central police. We can be reasonably assured that they do not have a particular expertise in what happens at the Border common ridings.

My hon. Friend the Minister also said that he did not expect there to be many restrictions on numbers in practice, although I may have got him wrong. If he does not expect there to be many restrictions in practice, why has he tabled the new clause? I do not want to labour the point about the Standing Committee. My hon. Friend the Minister has done his best with this Bill and has faced severe difficulties not of his making. However, if the issue was raised in another place and if an assurance was given that the Government would consider this provision, why was it not introduced in Standing Committee? That is where the provision should have been considered in detail. When hon. Members on both sides of the House do not want to stay up late, the House is placed in great difficulty if new provisions are brought forward on Report which are completely unrelated to the discussions that took place in Committee.

I do not want to detain the House, but I want to repeat a point which has been underlined by hon. Members on both sides of the House. The people in the licensing trade to whom I have spoken believe that the new clause is unnecessary and, for reasons given by hon. Members tonight, that it is impractical and unenforceable. The House should not pass such legislation. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will recognise that and that he will greatly enhance his already high reputation by withdrawing the new clause at the end of this debate.

Mr. Harry Ewing: I am beginning to be seriously worried about the Minister. The new clause reads like something that was said to him as a joke in a pub but which he has taken seriously and translated into the proposed legislation. As the Minister listens to the debate, surely he will come to the conclusion that he should withdraw the proposal. The legislation is founded on a number of points that the Minister put to us.

Lord Mackie of Benshie and I are very good friends. I have shared a drink with the noble Lord on many occasions. All I can say is that if there is a pub in the Borders in which Lord Mackie could not get a drink, it must be some pub. I have been in his company often in much bigger crowds than we get in pubs in the Borders and I have never noticed Lord Mackie having any difficulty in getting himself a drink, or in getting me one for that matter. I place no great emphasis on the fact that Lord Mackie had difficulty in getting a drink in a pub somewhere in the Borders.

The Minister told us that his hon. Friend the then Minister of State in another place was anxious to deal with the problem of overcrowding. I am the first to concede —this is the one concession that I shall make to the Minister—that the then Minister of State, Lord Sanderson, certainly knows a thing or two about overcrowding. Since he became chairman of the Tory party, he has fairly cleaned out the office in Chester street. If there was any overcrowding there, the noble Lord cleared it out.

The Minister told us that he has had two letters, one from the chief constable of Grampian and another from the chief constable of Central.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: It's the same fella.

Mr. Harry Ewing: I agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman. I have a feeling that it is the same fella. The present chief constable of Grampian took up his post on 1 September—[Interruption.] He was previously the chief constable of Central. I want to see those letters because I honestly believe that it was the same chief constable who wrote both letters.

Hon. Members are ridiculing the new clause because it deserves to be ridiculed. It is simply not capable of implementation. If there is one thing that we should not do when legislating, it is to introduce provisions that are incapable of implementation. All that we are doing is badly affecting the people in respect of whom the legislation would be applied—that is, the licensing board, licensees and, as the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) said, the police force. They simply could not enforce it.

I have been watching the civil servants' Box. I have great affection for the people who occupy the Box. My right hon. and hon. Friends on the Opposition Front Bench will be working with them in a year's time, so I keep in with them. This afternoon the personnel in the Box changed at regular intervals depending on which part of the Bill and which clause we were debating. That is similar to what happens in a pub. A man goes into the pub, has a drink and comes out. Is the Minister trying to tell the House that we shall have someone standing at the door, saying, "There can be 150 in there. There are 149, so whoever is at the top of the queue can go in"? That is absolute madness.

Licensed clubs operate on a different basis. The licensing board is certainly responsible for granting a licence to a licensed club, but the licensed club is under an obligation to submit a list of members on a three-yearly basis before the licensing board will grant a new licence to a licensed club.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): To the sheriff.

Mr. Ewing: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan).

Before it will grant a new licence, the licensing board sees the official list of members. What will the licensing board do if the club has a membership of 800 people—every member is entitled to get into the club as that is part of the conditions of membership—but the capacity of the premises is only 300? Will the licensing board refuse a licence because the club has been successful in attracting 800 members but has accommodation for only 300? All those points serve to make the clause look more and more ridiculous. The Minister should say, "I have seen the light. I will withdraw the new clause because I know that it is not practicable."

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: It is offensive that such a new clause should be introduced when it was not considered in Committee. That is the first of my propositions. Lest the Minister think that I shall be too serious, I shall give him one promise. I shall give him a way out, but I shall come to that at the end of my speech.

I am glad to say that the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) denied Christ Benshie before the fire, and Lord whoever-he-was whom I had never heard of who has never been in Scotland.

I wish to say various things partly in replication of what other hon. Members have said. As my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) said, it is idiotic to base the number allowed in a public house on the number of those who use it annually or occasionally. As the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East said, it is manifestly unfair to reverse the intention of the 1976 Act to take arbitrary powers from the licensing authority. It has every form of absurdity. I shall point to the practicalities to demonstrate the absurdity.

The licensing authority—I am arguing for the moment without giving away my secret exit for the Minister—may say, "You may allow only 200 people in." I have in mind that bar at the end of Rose street, where people went on their way to Murrayfield, with that nasty woman, Ma Scott. The licensing authority may say, "You may allow only 200 people in Ma Scott's bar." After being at Murrayfield, 90 per cent. of the people who drink at Ma Scott's bar stand on the pavement outside anyway. Are they part of the people who are supposedly in the bar?

Along comes diligent Police Constable Brian Wilson, accompanied by Sergeant Harry Ewing. He goes into the public bar and, as everyone sways around saying, "Wasn't that a great game?", he says, "Stand still everybody, I am going to count you." Unfortunately, the pub is already so full that they cannot get around to count them. Eventually they manage to push their way through to the loo entrance at the back in the far corner to make sure that there is nobody in there to be included in the numbers. They manage to count 200 people in the pub.

One person then says, "I am actually a bartender," "Sorry, we will start again. You go outside. I am just counting the drinkers." He counts all the drinkers—199. He knocks at the locked door of the loo, and there are two people in it—a pair of gays who were not there to have a drink—and he says to Ma Scott, "You have committed a criminal offence; I have counted these people and there are 201 in here. Did you realise that?"

Can anyone imagine a greater absurdity? Meanwhile, in addition to those to whom I have alluded, there are people waiting outside the pub, like people waiting outside a loo, saying, "Come on, hurry up—I'm desperate." It is fatuous. I have never heard such junk. I have never heard any junk like that being thrown at us at this stage in a debate.

8.30 pm

The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) pointed out the important criterion of public safety and the role of fire officers. Mr. Oliver, formerly chief constable of Central Scotland and now the chief constable of Grampian, has written two letters about these serious matters, but when was a chap last burned in a pub? When was a chap last suffocated or asphyxiated in a pub? When was a chap last trampled to death in a pub? I suppose that in the history of Glasgow pubs the answer would be that if the punter realised that the fellow who runs the "Ship Bank Vaults" had one extra fellow in there, he might just stab him to death and say, "You're dead, I've saved you from being prosecuted, mister."

I should like to give the Minister a way out now. When granting a licence, a licensing board may attach a condition to that licence limiting the number of persons to be admitted to the premises in respect of which the licence is granted. As all hon. Members know, the ultimate lie that a Minister can tell, which is fed to him from the civil servants' Box to get him out of a difficulty, is "Unfortunately, the drafting is defective." The great secret is that nothing here says "at any one time". So the licensing board, when granting a licence, can say, "Until you lose your licence, you are only allowed to admit 100 people into your pub."

If it wants to be really sadistic, a licensing board could say, "Yes, Mr. Grant, we are granting you your licence and we are very impressed with the money that you have spent to comply with the safety regulations and the fact that you have lavatories for the disabled, the incurable and the blind, and facilities for dogs and cats, but we will only ever allow you to have one person on those premises. Do you still want your licence, Mr. Grant?" It has nothing to do with overcrowding. The provisions state simply that the number of people who will ever be allowed on the premises is limited. The drafting is therefore defective. If that is not a lifeboat into which a Minister can be pushed by those in the Box, there is no other known craft that can save him. There we have it.

The other thing that I find particularly infuriating is that, essentially, it is an English argument to say that someone is not allowed to enter a pub if a policeman, a fire officer or even a chief constable wearing two different chief constable's hats takes the view that he thinks that you might not enjoy the experience. I do not particularly mind that. I go into pubs—some of which are empty, some of which are full—and I can tell the House that before I have had my first drink, I would have a hell of a job counting the people up to see whether there are more people than there are supposed to be.

This is nonsense. If the Minister does not withdraw the new clause, he will be a laughing stock. If he does not withdraw this piece of mad Lewis Carroll fantasy, it will be passed into the laws of Scotland by the English majority in this House who have not heard one word of the argument. Furthermore, it will be passed by people who have probably never been in an English pub or any other pub. The day I receive a letter from a constituent stating, "Do you realise, Sir Nicholas, that I had to wait for half an hour for a drink in an overcrowded pub after Celtic beat Rangers?", I shall be very surprised, and the day I find a Scotsman who thinks that there is a danger of his being crushed on the way to get a drink, I shall be even more surprised. Let us throw this new clause in the swill bin where it belongs.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): Before the Minister accepts the lifeline that has been thrown to him by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn)—at least, I hope he will do so—I must express my own anger that the new clause has been tabled at this stage. We spent many hours in Committee discussing all aspects of the Bill, but only now, at this very late stage, has this particularly ludicrous new clause been tabled.

The practicalities of trying to implement the provisions have been highlighted by many hon. Members. It almost seems as though we are considering an employment opportunity scheme whereby we could have flying squads of counting agents dashing around the villages and small towns of Scotland when they have their gala days or common ridings.

I should like to pick up a point made by the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) and to talk about the importance of the big days for small communities when their pubs are extremely busy and perhaps overcrowded. I remind the Minister that in many small communities in areas such as the one that I represent, the big days or big weeks around an agricultural show are vital in sustaining the economies of those communities.

If the Minister visits Keith in Banffshire on the two days of the Keith show, he will find not only that the show ground is extremely busy, but that the pubs, the tourist shops, the restaurants, the fish and chip shops and the grocer are all busy because people from all around are buying from other businesses in the town. That is vital to those communities. The same would be true if the Minister were to visit Dallas, Garmouth, Kingston or Spey.

If the Minister were to visit any of those small communities on their gala day, he would see that that is when the tourists are there and that that is when the pubs and many other small businesses are busy and taking the money that will help to sustain them during the many other weeks when nobody else will be there apart from members of the local community.

Such businesses deserve our support. If the Minister brings in such a ludicrous new clause, which would detract from many of the fetes and gala days, he will be doing a great disservice to the rural communities of Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This has been an interesting and colourful debate. I advise my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) that the drafting is based closely on the previous Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 which my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) piloted on to the statute book and on which my hon. and learned Friend himself may have advised on the drafting when he was Solicitor-General for Scotland. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] However——

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: If my hon. Friend the Minister can find any contribution from me to suggest that the number of people in a pub, myself included, should be controlled by a licensing authority, will he please direct me to the relevant part of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am certainly not going that far, but I can reassure my hon. and learned Friend that new clause 13 does not apply to registered clubs, which in any case receive their certificate of registration from the sheriff, not the licensing board. It is also clear that boards are not administrative bodies but consist of the democratically elected representatives of local people, and they are the appropriate bodies to decide when the proposed condition should be applied.

Mr. Harry Ewing: The Minister is wrong. The certificate of registration is given by the sheriff, but the liquor licence is given by the licensing board. The sheriff does not grant liquor licences; the licensing board grants the club's licence.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information that I received states that the provision will not apply to registered clubs, but I shall certainly check the point made by the hon. Gentleman. He is correct to say that certificates of registration are granted by the sheriff, not the licensing board. The licensee has a right of appeal under section 39 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976. Section 39(4) provides that the sheriff may uphold the matter on appeal if he considers that the board has exercised its discretion in an unreasonable manner.

The background to the new clause involved representations from the police and the Grampian fire brigade. I have checked, and the letters that I received are not confidential, so I shall make arrangements to have them placed in the Library. I stress that it was not the same chief constable who wrote on both ocasions, but different ones. [HON. MEMBERS: "Name them."] I am happy to name them. One was from the chief superintendent of central Scotland police and the other from Chief Constable Lynn of Grampian police.

The most significant letter comes from Grampian fire brigade's fire master. I shall not mention the particular club about which he is concerned and about which he made many points in his letter. He expressed concern about the numbers attending discos. He stated:

"The club . . . could not point out a means of escape in case of fire and when this means of escape was identified and followed, it was found to be obstructed."

Mr. Menzies Campbell: The Minister is reading from a letter that refers to clubs. I understand that the proposal before the House applies not to clubs, but only to licensed premises. Clubs are registered under a separate part of the licensing legislation.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Yes, but the principal point made in the letter relates to discos—I shall certainly place the letter in the Library. The principal point he makes is:

"this situation is causing great concern to the Fire Authority and clearly some action must be taken immediately."

I must make it absolutely clear that the new clause is a permissive provision; it is obviously not mandatory.

Mr. Dewar: The Minister is concerned about fires, but my impression is that the premises that he says are not covered by the clause—clubs and so on—are those most likely to have fire disasters. I concede that that is anecdotal evidence, but all my memories of newspaper articles suggest that. I take the point made by the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) that it is not pubs that go up in a blaze but the very premises that the Minister says are being excluded from the provision. Surely there are other ways, through fire regulations, of covering the fire danger.

In his support, the Minister has advanced two policemen and one fire master. How widespread has his consultation been? What about Strathclyde and the licensing boards? I should have thought that it was the views of the board members who are to have the power wished upon them that should be of importance. I suspect that for most people interested in the matter, the new clause comes as an equally puzzling surprise as it does to hon. Members.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I shall go back a stage to the point about clubs. The discos to which I referred are not registered clubs, although they call themselves that —they are licensed premises, so the provision would apply to them.

That issue was raised at an earlier stage of the Bill, we promised to consider it and we received the further representations that I mentioned.

The new clause deliberately refrains from specifying circumstances in which a condition might be imposed, because we believe that it is right and proper that the licensing board should exercise its discretion against the background of its local knowledge in determining where the condition is appropriate. Any unreasonable exercise of that discretion is challengeable by means of the provisions enabling the applicant to appeal to the sheriff. Similarly, on the question of how the licence holder should ensure that the numbers in his premises are limited in accordance with the condition, we would expect licensing boards to take account of representations that applicants may wish to make during the hearing.

The 1976 Act already contains provisions imposing duties on licence holders in relation to the good order of their premises. Section 76 makes it an offence to sell alcohol to people who are drunk. The responsible licence holder can reasonably be expected to ensure also that his premises are not overcrowded where there is potential for that problem to occur.

It has been suggested elsewhere that that would require electronic counting equipment. The advocation of the condition in particular cases would be a matter for the licensing board. It is important to bear in mind that, should proceedings be taken against the licence holder for breach of the condition, the police and the licensing board would no doubt have regard to the seriousness of the breach and the risk to public safety that had occurred or was likely to occur.

The new clause is intended to reduce significantly the risk to public safety from overcrowding of licensed premises. It is framed in general terms to give licensing boards maximum flexibility in determining when and how its use would be appropriate, taking account of the concerns that the applicants may have.

8.45 pm

Sir Hector Monro: Surely my hon. Friend is not going to leave the matter like that. He has not explained how the condition will be breached. Hon. Members on both sides have shown the impossibility of controlling the number of people in a pub on a busy night, surely, as the new clause has received universal opposition, he will think again.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Let me make it plain that, when somebody applies for a licence—for example, for a wedding party—and intends to invite a large number of people, through the by-laws a restriction may be placed on the numbers involved.

Mr. Wilson: I seriously begin to wonder whether the Minster has a clue what he is putting through. If we were talking about a specific licence for a specific function, it would be different. It is clear from the new clause that the figure would apply 365 days of the year to the premises and take no account of specific circumstances. The Minister must not put through this ridiculous piece of legislation on the basis of a personal misunderstanding of what it is about.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The consideration that weighs most heavily with me is that of safety, which has emanated from the Grampian police and fire master. I have concluded my remarks.

Mr. Wilson rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the Minister giving way?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) has already spoken, he needs the leave of the House to speak again.

Mr. Wilson: With the leave of the House, I shall briefly seek to sum up. To put it at its mildest, the balance of the argument has been against the Minister. The points that have been raised from both sides of the House remain conspicuously unanswered. If we were arguing the merits of the case tonight, we should have to cancel the Division because the No Lobby would be overcrowded. I hope that hon. Members from outwith Scotland who have been listening to the debate will at least pass on to their colleagues outside that every Scottish Member who has spoken, including every Conservative Member, apart from the Minister, has not only opposed the provision but ridiculed and roasted it, for excellent reasons. If people troop in to vote the measure through, they bear the responsibility for it.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: The Minister has said that his prime consideration is public safety. He is also in charge of the Scottish Development Department—it is under his authority. It might say that it was not going to put in a pedestrian crossing in a certain place because only 22 people had been knocked down so far, so it did not qualify. How many people have ever been crushed or burned in pubs in Scotland? The answer is none, so why are we passing legislation to protect people from something that has never happened?

Mr. Wilson: The hon. and learned Gentleman is absolutely right. Another aspect that the Minister has not mentioned is that other crowds will be created by this. They might not be inside the pub but they will be outside, so instead of being happy customers they will be extremely dissatisfied people, perhaps outside in bad weather, and they will see no rational reason why they are not allowed inside the pub.

The Minister has also not mentioned that we are creating a new criminal offence. It will not result only in a black mark at the next licensing board; the person who administers the pub and allows in a number above the quota will be guilty of a criminal offence. That is outrageous.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that certain licensing boards regard behaviour outside the licensed premises as capable of being relied upon to establish that the premises are not being properly managed? If an artificial limit on the permissible numbers inside is created, and as a result people congregate outside, when reliance may be placed on their conduct as a reason for removing the licence, the consequence of such a proposal may be that innocent people will suffer the loss of their licence, not simply a breach of condition.

Mr. Wilson: That is another excellent point. If we were playing games, I could go around the Chamber and hon. Members could adduce additional arguments against the proposal. If the measure had been discussed in Committee, it could have been better examined. We are getting no answers and we expect none, but very serious points have been raised.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: There is a perfectly good solution: if anyone in the pub is sober enough to count up to the limit, all he will do is buy pints and pass them out to those standing outside—not a very good idea.

Mr. Wilson: The hon. and learned Gentleman confirms my point. Football or rugby crowds have never been examined in this context. Does anyone seriously think that in these circumstances——

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I have given further consideration to the matter and, given what has been said, I think that there is a case for consulting more widely than merely with Grampian police. That means that we shall not be able to deal with the matter conclusively in this Bill, but I shall withdraw the new clause and we will consult more widely——

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): Hear, hear.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman had better wait until he gets back to his constituency, where he will find that the police take a view different from him.

Mr. Canavan: They usually do.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Indeed. My hon. Friends have validly stated that there should be wider consultation, so the matter cannot be dealt with in the context of this Bill.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 14

WHOLESALE SELLING OF ALCOHOLIC LIQUOR

'.—(1) After section 90 of the principal Act there shall be inserted the following section—

"Wholesale selling of alcoholic liquor.

90A.—(1) A wholesaler or his employee or agent who barters, sells, or exposes or offers for sale alcoholic liquor shall be guilty of an offence unless—

(a) he does so from premises which are used exclusively for wholesale trading (whether solely of alcoholic liquor or not); or

(b) he does so from licensed premises, a licensed canteen or a registered club during the hours in respect of which it is lawful to sell alcohol by retail from or in these premises, that canteen or that club.

(2) A wholesaler or his employee or agent who sells alcoholic liquor to a person under 18 shall be guilty of an offence.

(3) A wholesaler or his employee or agent who causes or permits a person under 18 to sell alcoholic liquor without that sale having been specifically approved by a person of or over 18 shall be guilty of an offence.

"Section 90A(1)	Dealing wholesale other than from permitted premises	Yes	— level 5 on the standard scale
Section 90A(2)	Wholesaler selling liquor to person under 18	Yes	— level 3 on the standard scale
Section 90A(3)	Wholesaler permitting person under 18 to sell alcohol without approval	Yes	— level 1 on the standard scale".

(4) Section 67 of this Act (penalties for offences) shall apply in respect of offences under this section as if references in that section to a licence-holder were references to a wholesaler.

(5) Section 71 of this Act (defence of due diligence) shall apply to any person charged with an offence under this section as if the reference in that section to a licence-holder were a reference to a wholesaler.

(6) In this section,

"licence-holder" includes the holder of a licence under Part III of this Act; and

"wholesale" and "wholesaler", insofar as they relate to the sale of alcoholic liquor, have the meaning given in section 4(1) of the Alcoholic Liquor Duties Act 1979 in relation to dealing in alcoholic liquor.".

(2) In Schedule 5 to that Act, after the entry relating to section 90(c) there shall be inserted—

—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause seeks to remedy an anomaly that has arisen in the control of the wholesale of alcohol. The Finance Act 1981 removed the excise licence requirements for wholesalers of alcohol and repealed the provisions contained in section 94 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 with the effect that wholesalers of alcohol are no longer subject to any controls. Thus, anyone can call himself a wholesaler and sell alcohol in quantity without requiring a licence. The licensed trade, licensing profits and the police have expressed concern about the present position.

We have consulted wholesale and retail interests, the Law Society and the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities on the possibility of introducing appropriate controls, including restrictions on the sale of alcohol to and by persons under 18. All those who responded agreed that there should be controls over wholesale of alcoholic liquor.

We have, however, no wish to impose unnecessary restraints on the great majority of entirely respectable wholesale operations, but we recognise that the present statutory provision leaves it open to people to deal in wholesale of alcohol from unsuitable premises, such as garages, or to existing licencees to circumvent the restrictions of their licences – for example, by trading in wholesale quantities on Sundays. In Committee there was unanimous opposition to our proposal that off-licences be permitted to open on Sundays, and we therefore consider it right that we should close the loophole which permits wholesale on Sunday under existing statute.

The new clause creates an offence for a wholesaler, his employee or agent to barter, sell, expose or offer for sale alcoholic liquor unless he does so from premises exclusively used for wholesale trading or from licensed premises, a licensed canteen or a registered club during the hours when it is lawful to sell alcohol by retail in these premises, that canteen or club.

The new clause makes provision in subsections (2) and (3) for it to be an offence for a wholesaler, his employee or agent to sell alcohol to anyone under 18, or to permit the sale of alcohol by anyone under 18 without the sale being specifically approved by someone over 18. Subsection (4) applies the penalty provisions in section 67 of the 1976 Act, which apply to a licence holder, to a wholesaler, and subsection (5) applies to a wholesaler the defence of due diligence provisions in section 71 which applies to a licence holder. Subsection (6) defines the terms "licence holder", "wholesale" and "wholesaler" which appear in the new clause. Sub-paragraph (2) inserts into schedule 5 of the 1976 Act, which lists the penalties for offences against the provisions of the 1976 Act, the new penalties contained in subsections (1), (2) and (3) of the new clause.

Mr. Wilson: This is an astute and well drafted clause, as one would expect of the Minister, and we wholly support it.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I warmly congratulate the Minister. An important loophole has been closed. There was a real problem of abuse, and I hope that the House will agree to the new clause.

Mr. McAllion: As the Minister said, the new clause makes it an offence to sell alcohol to people under 18 in certain designated places. It also makes it an offence for someone under 18 to sell alcohol in such places, but it does not make it an offence for such a person to consume alcohol in these places.

As the Minister knows, Dundee district council has instigated a campaign against under-age drinking and has pioneered new byelaws under which it prohibits the consumption of alcohol in designated public places. The council is campaigning for the Government to legislate to make it an offence for under 18-year-olds to consume alcohol in public places. Will the Government listen sympathetically to the council's request and look for the earliest possible opportunity to introduce such legislation?

Mr. Harry Ewing: I thank the Minister for his sensible decision to withdraw new clause 13. New clause 14 makes much more sense, closing, as it does, the Sunday loophole to which the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) referred.

The measure relates primarily to cash-and-carry establishments between Monday and Saturday. I reiterate what I said in Committee about the wholesale selling of alcohol and the retail selling of alcohol by or to persons under 18 years of age. We shall solve the problem only when we introduce provisions that make it compulsory for supermarkets and cash-and-carries to sell alcohol separately from all other goods. People purchasing alcohol should be served separately: the people on the check-outs are far too busy to see whether the person passing through the check-out is over or under 18. I would not blame them if an offence were committed, because they are under tremendous pressure. We should do the same with alcohol as we do with tobacco. One cannot select one's own tobacco; one must be served with cigarettes and tobacco in a supermarket or wholesale outlet. We should deal with the under-18 problem more firmly.

9 pm

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: There are three trial schemes for experimental byelaws operating in Scotland now. In the light of the success or failure of the schemes, which will be reviewed in due course, we shall consider taking the matter further.

I give way to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke), as I know that he is interested in this matter.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): I hope that the Minister will agree that I have not taken up too much of his, the Committee's or the House's time during consideration of the Bill. The Minister was kind enough to give me an interview when I was making representations on behalf of Monklands and Strathkelvin district councils, both of which were interested in the scheme and would have liked to have been the subject of the experiment.

The Minister has said that, in the three districts where the experiment is taking place, developments are being monitored. He presumably hopes that he will soon be able to make a decision on its success or otherwise. How soon can we look forward to that? Even at this stage, is he in a position to say whether the exercise has been productive or otherwise?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It will be a few months before I am in a position to say that. However, I shall look into the matter and write to the hon. Gentleman, because I know that he is very interested. The nearest of the schemes is in Motherwell, which is not far from his own constituency.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time and added to the Bill.

Clause 41

PERMITTED HOURS

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 19, in page 47, leave out lines 32 to 36.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 20.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: After a lengthy debate, the Committee agreed the amendment in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart)—who is here tonight—to remove section 64(4) from the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976, with the intention of enabling licensing boards to grant occasional or regular extensions of the permitted hours of public houses on Sundays, which now run from 12.30 pm to 2.30 pm and from 6.30 pm to 11 pm. At the conclusion of the debate, I explained that the effect of the amendment would be to enable licensing boards to grant extensions of the permitted hours of public houses on Sundays for the periods before 12.30 pm and after 11 pm. I also suggested that a clarifying amendment would be needed on Report.

Both in the substantive debate and as a result of the changes following my statement, a range of views were expressed about the intentions of the Committee. Several hon. Members referred to the need to put public houses and hotels on the same basis; others argued that public houses should not be open before 12.30 pm. In summing up, the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) said that he was under the impression that the amendment not only dealt with the afternoon break, but provided also for later opening at the discretion of the licensing board.

Amendment No. 19 deletes from clause 41 the references to extensions from Saturday night to Sunday morning. This provision is now inserted in amendment No. 20, which introduces into clause 42 an amended section 64(4) to empower licensing boards to grant occasional or regular extensions of permitted hours on Sundays in respect of public houses only to premises to which section 59 of the 1976 Act applies—restaurants in public houses—or after 2.30 pm. That will enable boards to grant late-night as well as afternoon extensions on a Sunday, if they consider it appropriate.

In considering applications, the licensing board will be required to refuse an application if the grant would cause undue disturbance or public nuisance in the locality. This is on all fours with the test for Sunday opening within the permitted hours, which is specified in clause 42(4).

Mr. Wilson: I fully support the amendment: it gets the balance right—a balance that the Committee wanted. On the one hand, there is a general tightening up on the granting of late licences, while the Sunday anomaly has been removed. On the other hand, every member of the Committee—indeed, I think, most hon. Members—would support the view that there should not be Sunday-morning opening. If that were accepted, the balance would tilt too far in the other direction. The Minister has the balance about right.

I should like to place on record the representations that I received at a meeting on Friday with representatives of the Scottish area of the National Association of Licensed House Managers. They are opposed to Sunday opening for the understandable reason that that is the only time at which some of them can be with their families. I respect that consideration. I voted for longer Sunday opening and I shall not renege on that now. The licensed trade will have to address the matter. One cannot deal with the problem faced by that small group of people by a general denial of what is perceived as an extension of other people's freedom of choice. Plainly, that is a problem for that group of people, and I hope that the licensed trade will look at ways of avoiding the need for such managers to be as constantly on the premises as they seem to be at present.

The managers also said that nobody should be under any illusion about the fact that the consumer pays for the extension of opening hours. As they have said, the extension of opening times throughout the 1980s has been accompanied by an increase in the price of drink that is higher than the increase in the retail prices index. They maintain that that is significantly related to the extension of opening hours. The consumer should be aware of that.

As I have said, I think that the Minister has struck the right balance. The boards have a special responsibility to ensure that risks of disturbance and intrusion upon other people's rights are taken into account, especially in relation to late opening on Sundays. The boards will have to exercise that power with care. I support the amendment and welcome what the Minister has brought back from the Committee.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for his consideration of this matter following the debate and vote in Committee on my amendment. I did not intend, and I do not think that any Member of the Committee intended, that the debate would result in opening on a Sunday morning. The Minister has struck the right balance, and I hope that the House will support the amendments.

Mr. Harry Ewing: For the benefit of those outside who will read the report of our proceedings, I should like to place on record my understanding of the position on Sunday. I hope that the Minister will confirm or correct my interpretation. It is that the licence holder has to make an application to the licensing board to open between 2.30 and 6 pm on a Sunday and that the board has a discretion about whether to grant that application. For an extension after 11 pm, the licence holder would make an application against the background of the changes to the principal Act, which rightly introduces restrictions on extended hours after 11 pm. I hope that the Minister will confirm that there will not be automatic opening between 2.30 and 6 pm but that the licence holder has to apply to the licensing board, which will have the power to grant or refuse the application.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I confirm what the hon. Gentleman says, but the time is not 6 pm—it is 6.30 pm.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 42

SUNDAY OPENING OF LICENSED PREMISES

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I beg to move amendment No. 92, in page 48, line 29 after '(a)', insert

'in subsection (1) after the words "applicant or" in line 7, the words "or any partner or director thereof or any person having a substantial interest therein,"

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider amendment No. 93, in page 48, line 41 at end insert:—

'(4A) In section 31 of the principal Act, (suspension of licence on receipt of complaint), in subsection (2)(a) after "licensed holder" insert the words "or any director or partner thereof or employee or agent with the responsibility for the day to day running of the premises, or any person having a substantial interest therein, or any person on whose behalf or for whose benefit the premises are managed".'.

Mr. Campbell: I shall begin by again declaring an interest. I have already declared a professional interest in that from time to time I have practised before the licensing board and from time to time I am consulted by those with an interest in licensing matters. It is appropriate to make that declaration of interest because the issue about which I shall speak is one upon which I have been professionally consulted by Dundee district licensing board. However, it is a matter of general application because circumstances have been presented to the Kirkcaldy board and, more recently, before the Renfrew district licensing board. That shows that the issue to which the amendments are directed has application throughout Scotland.

The issue arises out of the grounds upon which an application may be refused or a licence suspended. Section 17(1) of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 sets out fair grounds upon which a licence may be refused. The first of those is that "the applicant . . . is not a fit and proper person to be the holder of a licence".

Some controversy has arisen about whether, in the case of a limited company that applies for a licence, the licensing board is entitled to look behind the legal personality of the limited company and at the character of its directors, to determine whether they are fit and proper persons to be the holders of a licence. It is argued by some that, because of the way in which the legislation is framed, the board would be entitled to look at the character of the company and at the character of the manager of the premises, but not at the character of the directors of the company. That has caused some concern in a number of instances.

It follows from that that, if an application is made under section 17(1) of the principal Act for the suspension of a licence, one of the grounds of which provides that the licence holder is no longer a fit and proper person to be the holder of a licence, if the licence holder is a limited company it is not possible to look at the character of the directors of that company.

The practical consequence of that is that, although a limited company that applies for a licence and obtains it may have a board of directors comprised of men of total probity and acceptability, the shares of that company might be transferred and the directors of the company changed. It may be that the new directors of the company would not, under any circumstances, be the sort of individuals to whom a licensing board would have been disposed to grant a licence. In some cases, that is perceived by licensing boards to be a considerable restriction on their quite legitimate and, in my view, perfectly proper power to restrict the issue of licences to persons—I use the word in its broad sense—who are fit and proper people to receive such a licence.

The most recent case, which the Minister may already have to hand, involves Renfrew district licensing board. It was reported in the 1990 Scottish civil law reports on page 436. I shall read from the rubric of that decision. Sheriff Stoddart of Paisley held that "the board had misinterpreted ss. 17(1)(a) and 17(3) and were not entitled to look at the characters of any persons other than the company itself and its proposed manager."

That means that it was and would be quite improper for a board to look at the character of the directors of the company that had applied for a licence.

There is some controversy about whether that is the correct view, but it is a recorded case in which a sheriff took that view. Consequently, in the minds of a number of licensing boards in Scotland there is a doubt about the precise nature of their powers. The purpose of the amendment and of the related amendment No. 93 is to seek to remove that doubt. The words that we seek to insert at the appropriate place are:

"any partner or director thereof or any person having a substantial interest therein".

The phrase, "any partner thereof" relates to the fact that in Scotland a partnership may have a legal personality separate from its partners. That is why it is necessary to make a reference to "any partner". I explained earlier the reason for the words "or director thereof", and the words

"or any person having a substantial interest therein"

will deal with the circumstances in which the majority shareholding may be in the hands of an individual who would not otherwise be regarded as a fit and proper holder of a licence.

9.15 pm

Amendment No. 93 relates to the circumstances in which, under section 31, an attempt may be made to suspend a licence. At present, the only ground given is that the holder is no longer thought to be a fit and proper person. Amendment No. 93 would insert the words

"or any director or partner thereof or employee or agent with the responsibility for the day to day running of the premises".

That harks back to section 11. It refers also to "any person having a substantial interest therein, or any person on whose behalf or for whose benefit the premises are managed."

That refers to the terms of section 17(1)(a).

I hope that the Minister will feel well disposed towards the amendments, which are meant to reflect substantial judicial uncertainty as to precisely what interpretation section 17(1)(a) will bear and to assist licensing boards, which are worried that a corporate veil may be available to individuals who might otherwise not be considered proper persons to hold licences. By creating a £100 off-the-shelf company having two £1 shares, and by using a person of good character to serve as an employee or agent, people who under no circumstances would be admitted to the onerous responsibilities of holding a licence would be able to subvert the considerable concern that chief constables, licensing boards and members of the public may feel at the fitness of certain individuals to have the responsibility for the sale of exciseable liquor.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): Concern is felt among members of licensing committees when they suspect that, as the hon. and learned Gentleman suggests, an individual has created a company and is hiding behind another person with the clear intention of circumventing the licensing authority's original decision to refuse a licence because of that individual's character.

Mr. Campbell: The hon. Gentleman makes the point most succinctly.

The amendments are an attempt to prevent people who would otherwise not be entitled to a licence from obtaining and enjoying the benefits of one by the device of creating a company and employing a person of good character as their manager or employee. Given the sophisticated licensing system that we now have north of the border, such a deception should not be possible. I hope that the Minister is sympathetic to the principle, even if he is not in agreement with the wording of the two amendments.

Mr. McAllion: I add my words of support to those of the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell), because there is growing concern in Dundee that an unwelcome situation could rapidly develop. If the sheriff court appeal decision is upheld—I understand that it has gone to the Court of Session—the licensing board might have to accept that it is not in a position reasonably to refuse licences to individuals who are not fit and proper persons.

In a recent case in Dundee, the applicant for a licence had a record of theft and drug abuse, but the licence was refused more because it related to premises which had been used for the sale of pornographic material. It was refused, but if those people had set up a shell company and hidden behind it and the people who managed it on their behalf, if the sheriff court decision had been upheld, the licensing board believed that it would have had no alternative but to grant a licence to the shell company, thereby allowing people to gain control of a licence who are not the kind of people who could be considered as fit and proper to hold it.

It is not merely the licensing board which is concerned. The local authority and the police are also worried about this development. As they pointed out, it is the wording of the 1976 Act which is wrong. It is too loose and is open to interpretation. That loophole has to be closed by the Minister. I hope that he will listen carefully to the amendment and will accept it.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: We have heard an interesting legal argument. The amendments would considerably widen the fit and proper person criterion in section 17 of the 1976 Act to enable the refusal of a licence and, in section 31, the suspension of a licence.

I understand that the interpretation of the "fit and proper person" criterion, where the applicant or licence holder is a corporation or company, has been raised in particular cases. The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East has mentioned one case which bears out what I believe to be the position. The issue has been whether criminal records of directors and companies are relevant to consideration of the criterion.

The view has been taken that the fact that one partner or director was not a fit and proper person did not necessarily mean that the partnership was not fit and proper to hold the licence, especially if another person was responsible for the day-to-day running of the premises. Also, it has been maintained that a number of factors may be relevant to the consideration of a company's application, such as whether the company has any criminal convictions, whether there is a history of any difficulties with other licensed or unlicensed premises owned or managed by the company, and whether it obeys the law on the health and safety of its employees. In the Government's view, that interpretation and the existing statutory provisions are appropriate and adequate and there is no justification for widening the criteria in the way that the amendments propose.

The licensing board should be concerned with the operation of the licensed premises, rather than with past actions or reputations of persons with an interest in the company which owns the premises. If, through the subsequent actions of directors or partners, the company acquires convictions or a poor reputation for licensing, those should be relevant considerations in relation to the exercise of powers under sections 17 or 31.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I may not have made myself clear. If a certain individual with criminal convictions applies for a licence, the chief constable may object to the application on the ground that he is not a fit and proper person. If the same person buys a company for £100 off the shelf, with two £1 shares, and obtains a reputable person to manage the premises on a day-to-day basis, making himself a director, through the device of the corporate veil he is able to obtain a licence that no licensing board would have given to him. In the face of that, how can the Minister say that the Government are satisfied with the legislation?

I do not know whether the Minister has had the opportunity to read Sheriff Stoddart's judgment. He said that the board "were not entitled to look at the characters of any persons other than the company itself and its proposed manager".

I know that there is some controversy, but that is the view of one sheriff. In that sheriffdom, Renfrew district licensing board will be bound by that view.

Is the Minister seriously telling the House that it is right for someone who, by reason of their character, would not be entitled to obtain a licence none the less to be able to create a company for £100 and use that mechanism to obtain a licence? Surely that cannot be the Government's view. If it is, public opinion will be surprised.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. and learned Member has put his point of view. The relevant considerations are any difficulties that a company might have had with other licensed or unlicensed premises that it owned or managed.

The criterion used by the hon. and learned Gentleman to amend the sections in the way proposed would widen the criterion beyond what was originally intended, and beyond what we consider to be appropriate or necessary. I hope that the hon. and learned Gentleman will not press his amendment.

Mr. Ernie Ross: I think that we shall be pressing the amendment to a Division. The Minister did not listen to what was said by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell). We do not want such a company to have a licence in the first place. The Minister suggests that an individual who is unable to get a licence under the normal licensing procedure should be allowed to form a company and that we should then wait and see whether that company turns out to be a good company. We do not want either that person or his company to have a licence. In a number of instances, however, that has happened. The Minister misses the point completely.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I see the point clearly. If a company is run by several people, the fact that one person may not be a fit and proper person does not necessarily mean that the company is not a fit and proper body to have the licence.

Mr. Dewar: I have listened with interest to the point made by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell). He made a reasonable and persuasive case. It does not seem to be in the public interest that people who, because of their past record and character, would be laughed out of the licensing court should be able to buy a £100 company which they wholly control, since they own the entire equity, hire a manager of apparent respectability and happily thereafter enjoy the fruits of holding that licence.

I suppose that it is possible to argue that, while the manager is in place, everything may be reasonably well run because of his integrity, but that is a matter for argument. One can envisage the pressures that might develop which would make the position less satisfactory. Apart from that speculative point, it is clear that the beneficial owner of the company would pocket the profits. I do not believe that that was ever intended. Certainly we should not wish to defend that position.

I hope that the Minister will not take it amiss when I say that he is being a little obtuse in misunderstanding a simple point and the thrust of the hon. and learned Gentleman's arguments. I ask him to address the question in its simplest form. Let us assume that two partners who have been in trouble with the licensing courts over the years, who have a bad record and who are unlikely to be regarded by the police as suitable for holding a licence, buy an off-the-shelf company, provide themselves with that fig leaf and the additional cover of a manager of no known bad form and then sit back and enjoy the fruits of holding their licence. Can that be satisfactory? Is it defensible? Yet that is happening. There are precedents for the fears that have been expressed. The Minister ought to think again.

Mr. Ernie Ross: It is not just that. We have discovered that such companies own more than one public house by means of this procedure. That is even worse. People who are not fit and proper persons to hold one licence now hold a number off licences by means of the shady deal of creating companies.

Mr. Dewar: My hon. Friend reinforces the point. I hope that I have made it clear that we sympathise with the thrust off the amendment. We hope that the Minister will be able to adopt a more flexible view than that which he has adopted in the past few minutes.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The amendments might deal with the problem, but they are widely drawn. For example, they require the board to consider what constitutes a substantial interest. At this stage, we cannot agree to amendments which raise important and difficult legal issues of that nature.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I do not know whether I was wrong to detect a sudden burst of reasonableness in what the Minister has just said. Is he saying that he is willing, having heard what has been said fairly vociferously on the Opposition side of the House, to take the matter away and consider it? He should remember that the Bill must be considered by another place. If he is not saying that—he shakes his head to show that he is not—I shall feel compelled to press the amendment to a vote.

I give the Minister one last chance. It will look pretty peculiar to the public of Scotland if the Minister is not willing to take the opportunity to prevent the abuse that the hon. Members for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) and for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) have outlined in such stark and eloquent terms.

9.30 pm

It cannot be sensible to allow people who as individuals would not be allowed the responsibility of running licensed premises to create, through the corporate veil, a wholly dud mechanism to deceive the licensing board, for that is effectively what it is. The deception may be understood by the licensing board, but deception it undoubtedly is. It drives a horse and cart through the efforts of licensing boards to control the fitness, propriety and character of those who make applications before them. I urge the Minister, who has shown a willingness to respond to the force of argument, to give one last consideration to the point, because I assure him that if he does not give the sympathetic consideration for which we are arguing, public opinion in Scotland, and perhaps opinion on licensing boards, will find it difficult to understand his position.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Amendment made: No. 20, in page 48, leave out line 50 and insert—

'(7) In section 64 (extensions to permitted hours), for subsection (4) there shall be substituted the following subsections—

"(4) A licensing board shall not grant an application from the holder of a public house licence for an occasional or regular extension of permitted hours on Sundays except—

(a) as respects premises to which section 59 of this Act applies and for the purposes of that section; and

(b) in the case of other premises, as respects any period or periods after half-past two in the afternoon, and the board shall refuse to grant such an application if it finds that the extension of permitted hours would cause undue disturbance or public nuisance in the locality.

(4A) Nothing in subsection (4) above shall prevent the granting of an application for an occasional or regular extension of permitted hours on a Saturday for a period which continues into Sunday morning.".'.—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

New Clause 20

SUPERVISED ATTENDANCE ORDERS AS ALTERNATIVES TO IMPRISONMENT ON FINE DEFAULT

'.—(1) A court may make a supervised attendance order in the circumstances specified in subsection (3) below.

(2) A supervised attendance order is an order made by a court with the consent of an offender requiring him—

(a) to attend a place of supervision for such time, being 10, 20, 30, 40, 50 or 60 hours, as is specified in the order; and

(b) during that time, to carry out such instructions as may be given to him by the supervising officer.

(3) The circumstances are where—

(a) the offender is of or over 16 years of age; and

(b) having been convicted of an offence, he has had imposed on him a fine which (or any part or instalment of which) he has failed to pay and either of the following sub-paragraphs applies—

(i) the court, prior to the commencement of this section, has imposed on him a period of imprisonment under paragraph (a) of subsection (1) of section 407 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975 (power of court, when imposing a fine, to impose also imprisonment on default) but he has not served any of that period of imprisonment;

(ii) the court, but for this section, would also have imposed on him a period of imprisonment under that paragraph or paragraph (b) of that subsection (power of court to impose imprisonment when a person fails to pay a fine or any part or instalment thereof); and

(c) the court considers a supervised attendance order more appropriate than the serving of or, as the case may be, imposition of such a period of imprisonment.

(4) Where, in respect of an offender, a court makes a supervised attendance order in circumstances where sub-paragraph (i) of paragraph (b) of subsection (3) above applies, the making of that order shall have the effect of discharging the sentence of imprisonment imposed on the offender.

(5) Schedule (Supervised attendance orders: further provisions) to this Act has effect for the purpose of making further and qualifying provision as to supervised attendance orders.

(6) In this section—

"local authority" means a regional or islands council;

"place of supervision" means such place as may be determined for the purposes of a supervised attendance order by the supervising officer; and

"supervising officer", in relation to a supervised attendance order, means a person appointed or assigned under Schedule (Supervised attendance orders: further provisions) to this Act by the local authority whose area includes the locality in which the offender resides or will be residing when the order comes into force.'.—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 95, 94 and 96.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The need for the new clause and the amendments arises as a consequence of clause 51(3), which restricts the use of community service orders to cases in which the court would otherwise have imposed a custodial sentence. Although cheaper than imprisonment, community service is still a relatively scarce resource and, if it is to make a real impact on the numbers sent to prison, it needs to be targeted effectively on more serious offenders. Research has shown that, in many cases, community service has been used in place of other non-custodial disposals in circumstances where imprisonment would have been unlikely.

Dr. Godman: What consultations have taken place with social work departments about the implementation of the proposal? Presumably social workers will play a key role. Do they need further training, or does the Minister believe that they are now entirely competent to perform the task that they will be called upon to perform?

9.45 pm

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Consultation took place in April and there was strong support for the proposal. About 10,000 people go to prison for fine default and it was felt not only that it would be better if they paid, but that it would be better if those who could not pay had a supervised attendance order of this type.

One likely result of the restriction of the use of community service is an increase in the number of offenders who receive fines and hence in the number of fine defaulters. At present, imprisonment is the only penalty available to the courts for fine default. As I said, some 10,000 people are imprisoned every year in Scotland for that reason. If we are trying to encourage the use of non-custodial penalties, such as community service for offences serious enough to justify imprisonment, it would be inconsistent to countenance an increase in the numbers going to prison for fine default when the original offence did not merit custody.

We believe that the solution is to offer the courts a limited alternative to prison for use in fine default cases. We have called this a supervised attendance order, which would be used only for fine default and would be the only penalty other than imprisonment available to the courts in default cases.

The supervised attandance order is intended to punish by imposing a fine on the offenders' free time and by the imposition of regular discipline through punctual attandance and satisfactory behaviour with a sanction throughout of return to court and, ultimately, the possibility of imprisonment for non-compliance.

The new order has several features in common with community service orders and the schedule follows closely the procedures laid down in the Community Service by Offenders (Scotland) Act 1978, but there are important distinctions. Supervised attandance orders will be of short duration. They will last for between 10 and 60 hours rising in discrete units of 10 hours while community service orders have a minimum of 40 hours and a maximum of 240.

Offenders on community service perform unpaid work of benefit to the community often organised on an individual placement basis. The intention is that offenders on supervised attendance orders will be placed on group activity that can be provided at low cost. As well as unpaid work, sessions will be devoted to tackling anti-social behaviour such as alcohol misuse and to drug education and responsibilities to society.

It is intended to introduce supervised attandance orders on an incremental basis commencing with sheriff courts and subsequently to extend their availability to the stipendiary magistrates court and the district courts. We propose that the orders be supervised and managed by local authority social work departments in accordance with agreed national standards and that local authorities should be reimbursed in full for the agreed costs of provision. I can tell the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) that I have every confidence in social workers and that this is something that they will welcome and be able to implement with great efficiency and effectiveness.

Dr. Godman: Like the Minister, I have every confidence in social workers, although he might suggest that I have to say that, given that I am married to one. In each and every case, will the supervising officer mentioned in new clause 20(2)(b) be a fully qualified social worker?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I shall answer that when I reply to the debate. It is better that the hon. Gentleman should have a correct answer in a few minutes than that I should give an answer off the top of my head.

Dr. Godman: This is an important question.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Of course it is. I believe that in most cases it would be a social worker, but I want to confirm whether that will be so in all cases.

Mr. Ernie Ross: The Minister said that the cost of activities carried out under the supervised orders would be wholly reimbursed to the local authority. Will it get the money beforehand or will it have to claim it afterwards?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I shall check that, but I imagine that the authority will get the full funding beforehand. I shall let the hon. Gentleman know the answer.

In line with our present initiative in respect of other services such as probation, parole and social inquiry reports, we propose to form a consultative group, including representation from local authorities, the judicial and other relevant interests, to draw up guidelines to supervised attendance orders and to discuss the administrative and financial aspects involved. I should expect the point that the hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) mentioned to be looked at specifically by the group drawing up the guidelines.

Mr. Ian McCartney (Makerfield): As an English Member, I am interested in the point that the Minister is making, in the sense that what happens in Scotland usually eventually finds its way to England. I do not think that the Minister adequately answered the point that was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross). Does the measure, for example, meet the needs of retraining or additional employment? A social work department in Scotland may require to employ one or two additional social workers to deal specifically with referrals under the system and, because of that, it will have revenue consequences for the employment or retraining of staff specifically to deal with the issues raised in the new clause. Will there be new resources to deal with that?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman is quite right to raise that specific point. That precise issue will be looked at by the consultative group that is discussing the financial aspects involved. It also bears on the question that I was asked by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow, about whether the supervising officer would always be a social worker. The answer is, not necessarily. Community service supervision is provided by non-qualified staff under the general management and control of social workers.

During the passage of the Bill in another place, various amendments were tabled which were intended to simplify and standardise the level of proof in respect of breaches of probation and community service orders. At that time the Lord Advocate advised that he was in sympathy with the intention of the amendments and that the Government would consider bringing forward an amendment that would meet their objectives at a later stage. Our proposals for supervised attendance orders in corporate such intentions by specifying that the evidence of one witness shall be sufficient to prove failure to comply with an order. The proposed amendment to schedule 7 achieves the same effect in relation to the Community Service by Offenders (Scotland) Act 1978.

The hon. Member for Dundee, West asked whether 100 per cent. funding would be made before or after expenditure was incurred. I am informed that an allocation will be made in advance, based on the projected number of orders, and then adjusted in the light of outturn numbers. The answer is exactly what the hon. Gentleman would wish.

I commend the amendments to the House as a practical and humane alternative to the present provisions for dealing with fine default. I believe that they will be widely welcomed in Scotland.

Mr. Dewar: This is an important debate which I fear, if no other arrangements for our business can be made, will take a considerable period. Therefore, I hope that the House will bear with me if I set out some of the considerations fairly fully. I am sure that arrangements could be made for a more sensible disposal of the business, but I am awaiting news about that.

Of course I appreciate the intentions behind the new clause as the Minister has explained them, but I am still a little surprised that we are facing the new clause. I discovered the proposals because I happened to be listening to early morning radio last Saturday when the ever efficient British Broadcasting Corporation's Scottish arm—I do not mention any particular individual—happened to comment upon the matter. That comment also included the suggestion that it was all part of the implementation of the thoroughly unpleasant speech made by the right hon. and learned Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Waddington) at the Conservative party conference——

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): It was a splendid speech.

Mr. Dewar: The hon. Lady may well think that it was a splendid speech, but she will not be surprised to know that that confirms all my prejudices. It is a happy state of affairs when we reinforce each other's prejudices so completely and with such enthusiasm.

I have read the speech that the Home Secretary made at the Conservative party conference. It does not seem to throw much light on this new clause. I therefore exonerate him from that charge.

In passing, however, I must add that the matter of the prison population which is, of course, connected with this new clause, is also bound up with the changes in parole that we shall presumably face as a result of the Kincraig report. When the Minister replies to the debate, I very much hope that he can say something about that. I further hope that we shall not see any legislation in the spirit of the Home Secretary's speech, and that the Kincraig report recommendations will not be a Scottish insert in the penny dreadful which is what I expect next Session's criminal justice Bill for England to be if the right hon. and learned Member for Ribble Valley has his way. If there is to be a major piece of legislation on parole, with all the ramifications for the courts and the prison system, I shall expect it to be taken as a Scottish measure in a Scottish setting. I hope that the Minister can reassure me on that point.

Having made those preliminary points, I now turn to the new clause in some detail. I was interested in what the Minister said. The notes that he was good enough to circulate to me two or three days ago referred to the research suggesting that community service orders, which are analogous to the supervised attendance orders that we are discussing, were often imposed where a fine would be the appropriate alternative. The point was made—and was reinforced in statutory form in this Bill—that the Government intend that community service orders should be imposed only where the alternative would be imprisonment. I do not for a moment dissent from the general value of that and believe that it is sensible that the community service orders should be used for the purpose for which they were designed.

The Minister's theory, as I understand it—I hope that I am not misrepresenting him—is that, because a number of community service orders were used where the proper alternative would have been a heavy fine and as, in future, that heavy fine will be imposed rather than a community service order, we shall have more heavy fines and more non-payments as a result of clause 51(3). As I understand it, that is the mainstream of the Minister's argument to justify the new clause.

Dr. Godman: I am concerned about something that the Minister said earlier—that those supervising such offenders when carrying out attendance duties may not be social workers. Given my hon. Friend's wide experience, where does he think that such supervisors will be found? Paragraph 3 of the Minister's explanatory memorandum states that such attendance would cover constructive use being made of time and activities, alcohol and drug education, employment seeking and application, and responsibility to society. Who on earth will supervise someone in those circumstances other than the social worker who has had some training and experience in probation work. I say that because it is important, and I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) has not overlooked it.

Mr. Dewar: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I have not overlooked the matter, and shall come to it later in my speech. I may say in passing that I have a voyeur's experience of social work. [Interruption.] It may be that, as someone who is married to one, my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) has had a voyeur's experience of social work as well.

Dr. Godman: My experience is legitimate.

Mr. Dewar: I will not go into that, but I was a professional observer——

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Ordered,

That the debate be resumed tomorrow.

Health Authorities (Membership)

10 pm

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): I beg to move,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Family Health Services Authorities (Membership and Procedure) Regulations 1990 (S.I., 1990, No. 1330) dated 2nd July 1990, a copy of which was laid before this House on 5th July, be annulled.

I understand that it will be convenient to discuss also the second motion,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Regional and District Health Authorities (Membership and Procedure) Regulations 1990 (S.I., 1990, No. 1331), dated 2nd July 1990, a copy of which was laid before this House on 5th July, be annulled.

To save time, I propose to confine my remarks to the regulations relating to regional and district health authorities. For the convenience of the House, I state that we intend to divide the House on those regulations at the end of the debate.

The debate's shortness is not a measure of its importance. The regulations provide for the creation of health authorities across England and Wales and give those countries health authorities explicitly modelled on the board of directors. Each health authority is to have five executive directors and five non-executive directors. There is no room within that small scope for representatives of the local authorities. At the very time when every progressive writer on health policy is urging us to break down the barriers between the health service and the social services, the Government have chosen to break the link between social service authorities and health authorities.

There is no prospect of community care ever succeeding if the local authorities which provide the community services are kept outside the doors while the health authorities decide which patients to put into the communities. In addition, no room has been found within those health authorities for the representatives of the people who work for them.

For the first time, so far as I am aware, the regulations write into law the offensive principle that, if one is a paid employee of a trade union, one will be debarred from that civic office. The full flavour of the regulations is contained in regulation 13, on which it is worth dwelling. Regulation 13(a) provides that one is disqualified for appointment if one has within the preceding five years been convicted; sub-paragraph (b) provides that a person is disqualified if he or she has been bankrupt; sub-paragraph (c) provides that someone is disqualified if he or she has been dismissed; and sub-paragraph (h) provides that someone is disqualified if he or she holds any paid appointment or office with a trade union. Convicts, bankrupts and trade unionists are clearly an unsavoury bunch.

Such institutionalised discrimination is thoroughly repugnant. People who work for trade unions are entitled to the same chance as anyone else of serving their communities on their local health authority. They should not be penalised because they work for an organisation of which the Government disapprove. Even more worrying is the fact that there is precious little room on the health authorities for the representatives of the people who use the hospitals.

This debate is not a theoretical one about how the regulations might work in the abstract. Characteristically, the Government did not wait until after the debate before going ahead with the appointments. They have already appointed people to almost every place on both regional and district health authorities. If the prayers are carried this evening, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State will tomorrow be in the embarrassing position of signing a thousand letters to appointees explaining what has happened.

I have the evidence of the people whom the Government want to run the authorities and I should like to share some of that evidence with the House. The most remarkable feature of those who have been appointed to the new health authorities is that they come from a dramatically narrow occupational base. I have completed a survey of 700 new members of these health authorities. There are exceptions to the rule. There are occasional areas in which it would appear that progressive chairs of district health authorities have succeeded in retaining a balance on health authorities, but the overwhelming majority of health authorities look more like local chambers of commerce than a public service.

The single largest professional group among non-executive members are company directors. Of the 700 whom we have surveyed, no fewer than 400 have a commercial background as industrialists, business men, accountants and lawyers.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): Not enough.

Mr. Cook: In fairness to the Secretary of State, I must defend him against that claim by saying that, after a decade of decline in Britain's manufacturing base, he is to be congratulated on finding so many industrialists with whom to stuff the health authorities. I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for his honesty. He has given a clear signal to the House and to the nation that he intends the NHS to be run as just another commercial business. The notion that he frequently puts about—that the health authorities will be the voice of the consumer—is singularly droll, given the evidence of the people who have been appointed to the health authorities.

This clutch of businessmen have spent their entire working lives on the opposite side of the fence from the consumers. It is not even obvious that they are consumers of the very health services that they are now appointed to run. There are some interesting conflicts of interest which would have bothered a previous Government, whether Labour or Conservative. East Hertfordshire health authority now contains a marketing manager of Glaxo, a retired manager of International Computers Limited and a director of Blue Arrow. All three of those companies are major contractors to the NHS. Why is it all wrong that paid employees of staff unions should be on the health authorities, because there would be a conflict of interest, but all right for paid employees of suppliers to the NHS to serve on the same boards?

I concede that there may be a case for having a representative of the local business community on the local health authority——

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): Very good.

Mr. Cook: I would not go so far as to suggest that they should command a clear majority of places, but I would concede a case for having a representative of the local business community.

[Mr. Cook]

A remarkable feature of the appointments is that many of them are not even local business men. In Hull, none of the non-executive members lives in Hull. In Leicester, none of the non-executive members lives in the city of Leicester. In Lancaster, four out of the five non-executive members do not live in Lancashire. In Greenwich, the local authority representatives have been replaced by a double glazing executive from Bromley and a computer executive from Chislehurst—[Interruption.] If the Secretary of State is interested in speaking in the debate, I am sure that he will succeed in catching the Chair's eye at the appropriate time. He seems to have overlooked the fact that it is not customary in this House to make one's speech while another hon. Member is on his feet.

This House insists—Conservative Members have themselves insisted in recent legislation—that all members of local authorities must live in the area covered by those local authorities. Why should it be so different for the health authorities that the Government appoint?

There are of course a few stragglers surviving from the local councils, not because they are dominated by those councils but because they have been picked by the Secretary of State—or, if he wishes to be pedantic, picked by those whom he has picked on the regional health authorities. I hope that Conservative Members will forgive me for reminding them that, despite the wonderful illusions of presentation, Conservative councillors are currently a minority on local authorities throughout Britain. However, one would not know that from the councillors selected for appointment to the health authorities, which contain a healthy majority of Conservatives. Indeed, three fifths of all councillors appointed to the health authorities are Conservatives. In addition to those councillors, we have counted five chairs of Conservative constituency associations and one vice-chair of the Bow group.

At the very time when eastern Europe is booting out the party nomenclatura, the Secretary of State is busy filling health authorities with new Conservative nomenclatura. In some cases, the appointments are almost designed to promote conflict with the local authority. In Shropshire, the Conservatives are in opposition, and the chair of the social services authority is Labour. Of the five non-executive members appointed to the Shropshire health authority, three are councillors and all three are Conservative. Such appointments are an abuse of patronage—an abuse all the more serious because the posts are no longer filled out of a sense of duty: they are now paid posts, with part-time salaries of £5,000 for 20 days' work. Ministers cannot treat that patronage as a private pork barrel for friends of the Conservative party.

I wish to make it clear that the next Labour Government will not regard itself as bound by those appointments. [Interruption.] If the Secretary of State cares to listen, rather than lecture as I know is his preference in all circumstances, he may hear what the Labour party's position is. In the short term, we will replace many of the appointments with people who represent the local community, live in the local community and use the national health service.

In the longer term, we will scrap those health authorities, restore the representatives of local authorities and rebuild the partnership between the health authorities and the social services authorities. We will drop the ban on people who work for those who work for the health authorities. We will create health authorities that will be there to serve the local communities, not to serve a Secretary of State in Whitehall, and who are therefore accountable to their local communities and not to a Secretary of State.

The Labour party would bury the regulations with the short shrift that befits such an abuse of central power.

10.12 pm

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): I want to contrast the two statutory instruments.

I do not share the concern of the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) about the employment of business people and business techniques in the running of the health service; for a long time some of those disciplines should have been there and used, and the employment of some of those people is therefore entirely appropriate. However, I do share his feeling that there should not be appointees —especially on the district health authorities or the family health services authorities—who are not local. It seems entirely wrong for us to appoint such people to those authorities, although I do not share his view in relation to a regional health authority. I reserve judgment on the operations of the regional health authorities: I want to see how they settle down, and whether they perform better than their predecessors.

I welcome the changes that have been made to the district health authorities, which are generally welcomed in my constituency by those who take an interest in the health service—apart from those who lost their seats. I shall contrast that with what is happening in the family health service authorities in my constituency and in the other area that I know well, which is where I live in Bedfordshire. Things are not going well on the ground in either of those areas. It appears that the chairmen do not know their areas very well. Why have I still not been briefed about the identity of "Mr. Mustard" in the family health services authority in my county? I wrote asking about that three weeks ago and it seems strange that I have not yet been told. Perhaps no one in Northampton has heard of him, but I am sure that he is an accomplished gentleman in the field of business. We wish him well in his assignment.

The original briefing on family health services authorities stated:

> "The previous statutory framework for sub-committees within which FPCs worked has been largely removed."

That may be so, but the family health services authorities are now appointing hosts of associate members. What on earth is the difference between sub-committees, which on the whole were reasonably effective, certainly in my constituency, and this host of associate members? The matter seems to be getting out of hand and I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State will take to task any family health services authority that appoints many associate members.

I hope that the war between the Department of Health and the medical profession is over. Our health service cannot be run without the good will of the medical profession, especially at family health service level. One of the problems is representation on the FHSAs. We must listen to medical professionals who are prepared to give time and energy and who know their areas exceedingly well. They are not listened to at the moment but I hope that in future they will be.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): First, I should like to raise a couple of technical points. The National Association for Mental Health, MIND, is concerned about the implications of recent changes. It has made it clear to me that it is worried about the accountability of the new-style DHA members and the decisions taken about detained patients under the Mental Health Act 1984. I should like the Minister to comment on that. MIND says that the new regulations will remove the link that health authority members must have with the Mental Health Act Commission. MIND sees that as a retrograde step because it reduces the accountability which is healthy in relation to psychiatric patients who may be compulsorily detained by regulation.

MIND says tha the new regulations meean that the new-style health authorities and hospital trusts are not required to have health authority or trust members represented on the committee that decides on issues about detained patients. I am sure that the Minister is aware of the seriousness of that, especially for patients who have had their liberty removed by the exercise of the legal provisions of the Mental Health Act. MIND says that there is no doubt accountability by the Mental Health Act Commission to the DHA or the trust. Even at this late stage, I hope that the Government will consider that technical point.

I should like to restate the concern expressed in Committee by Opposition Members about the way in which the regulations will completely remove the formal links between local authorities and district health authorities on the issue of joint planning for community care. That is strange at a time when we see good examples in many parts of the country of local authorities and health authorities working together on community care. We are trying to refoirm community care and many Opposition Members support some aspects of the legislation on community care. However, the arrangements now before the House will destroy the formal liaison that exists.

I shall now refer to democracy in the national health service. I am proud to have spent all my life in a society that has enjoyed the tremendous achievement of the Labour Government of the 1940s. The NHS is supported by the vast majority of the electorate. From the word go, however, one of the major failures of the NHS has been the lack of any real democratic accountability to the patients, its users. Under this and previous Conservative Governments, there have been moves away from the limited accountability that existed in the organisation prior to 1974. The reorganisation in 1974 moved accountability further away from the patients; the 1983 changes added to that problem, and the 1990 changes remove any element of local accountability in the NHS.

I am a supporter of community health councils: indeed, I am a former vice-chairman. However, if they posed any challenge or threat to Government policies and were a bulwark of defence of the NHS, I am sure that the Government would have abolished them in recent legislation. I shall continue to support CHCs, but their powers were emasculated some considerable time ago.

I want to be parochial and deal with the problems of Wakefield and question the sort of people who have been appointed to the new health authority. I speak as someone who served on a health authority for a number of years and, as I said, on a community health council. I take a close interest in health issues in my constituency. It has always struck me as strange that since the Wakefield district health authority came into existence, it has never appointed a chairperson who has lived within the area. Is there a problem with Wakefield? Are our people unsuitable to be chairpersons of health authorities? Why cannot someone who lives in the area be appointed? The chair of a health authority is an important job. What is so wrong with my constituents that they are not suitable for and do not have the ability to hold the chair of the local health authority?

It is interesting that, including the chair, one third of the non-executive members live outside the area served by the health authority. That is not an academic point; it is important. If someone is in the position to make important decisions about the treatment of patients in the NHS, occasionally it might be useful for that person to be a patient and to sample the facilities available. I recently attended a clinic with a member of my family and I was appalled to see the number of people crammed into it. Large numbers of elderly people were standing because no chairs were available.

I am not attacking the consultants or the nursing staff, who do their level best to ease the problems, but there is something radically wrong with a management that fails to provide chairs for people in their 70s, 80s and 90s while they are waiting for treatment. Sometimes they have to wait two or three hours before receiving basic treatment. I should like those who are making the decisions to sample the facilities, because they would then realise what people have to tolerate. I suspect that a number of those who serve on the health authority in Wakefield would never go anywhere near the NHS.

Another issue, which was a problem with the previous structure of health authorities and will be an even bigger problem now, is when such very busy people, with all their commercial and business interests, will find the opportunity to visit hospital wards and clinics, as they should, to see what is happening at the grassroots level. I do not suggest, nor do I need to suggest, any political bias in the appointments in Wakefield, but half the non-executive members who live in the area live in one electoral ward. I am sure that it is a coincidence, but it is the only ward in the entire Wakefield district to elect Conservative councillors. People who know the area will appreciate that Sandal is not representative of the Wakefield district, but it is very well represented on the new health authority.

One third of the people of Wakefield live on council estates. Would it be unreasonable to expect at least one member of the health authority to live on a council estate and therefore have some insight into the problems of the working class?

We should have health authorities that are composed entirely of people who live in the areas that they serve and who actually use health service facilities that are, or are not, available, as the case may be. The membership of the authorities should genuinely reflect the aspirations, needs and views of the local community. Why should not they include a few working-class mums who have experience of sitting in a clinic for two or three hours, waiting for treatment? Such people would properly be able to express the views and real concerns of the service users.

Why should there not also be direct democratic accountability? Why shy away from health authority elections? I would go further even than my own party and suggest that we should go from door to door, telling people that they should vote for a particular health authority candidate. We would also be able to learn what the public want, in the way that we do when canvassing in local or general elections.

My plea, more to the next Labour Government and to my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench than to the present Tory Government, is that we should move towards direct elections, for I am sure that they would be welcomed by the vast majority of our constituents.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): In Lancaster we are lucky in the calibre of our district health authority, whose members include people of wide experience who know the area well. They are led by our exceedingly able existing district chairman, who has piloted huge improvements and innovations so that our local health service is at or near the top of any list of criteria or league table that one cares to use.

I am a great believer in encouraging the state of marriage, and I feel sure that the Government share my views. I am therefore puzzled by the regulations, because, while the Government have removed the advantage of unmarried couples living together in respect of mortgages, and the advantage of unmarried couples living together for social security purposes, they have reinstated in the regulations the disadvantage for a married couple living together in respect of the declaration of interest.

I refer to regulation 13(6) of SI 1330, and to the words "the interest of one of a married couple living together" and to regulation 20(5) in SI 1331, which refers to the situation "in the case of married persons living together." Why should they be at a disadvantage? I should like an answer.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): In Committee stage on the National Health Service and Community Care Bill, my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins) referred to the new district health authorities as a system of management that Queen Victoria would have recognised when she surveyed the crowned heads of Europe, and he was absolutely right. Everything leads back to the Secretary of State, and my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) was also correct when he said that the new set-up is centralisation in an extreme form.

In the case of Calderdale district health authority, off go the two council representatives, who happen to be elected Labour councillors, and the trade union representative, and on come the business men, with only one exception. We have the same chair as before in Alan Templeton, an ex-director of the Halifax Insurance Company. During his chairmanship, he has presided over every cut that the Government have proposed, even using his casting vote to get rid of the NHS's own laundry service, a decision which was followed by a few disastrous years.

The newly appointed vice-chair, Barry George, was vice-chair of the previous district health authority. From the positions that he takes, he is obviously a Thatcherite. Until recently, he was employed as an architect. A new member of the authority, Clifford Fee, is a long-time Tory party member. He is a former chair of Halifax Conservative Association and recently retired from the family business. His new post should pay about £250 per meeting, which is a nice little earner for a recently retired business man. We have Dr. Hughes, who was previously a board member and is a fairly reactionary, right-wing medic. When I was a member of the district health authority, he only came alive when there were cuts to be made. He always voted for them.

Another new member of the board is a solicitor, and not someone whom I have heard had any interest in or knowledge of the national health service until his recent election to the board, which has already met and voted through a round of cuts which will lead to the loss of 99 beds. I imagine that the solicitor is a Government supporter because he voted for the cuts without any previous experience, as far as anyone can tell, of the national health service.

The one saving grace is that a woman, Jackie Stark, has been elected to the board. She was the only person to vote against the cuts, and she has spent most of her life working for the voluntary sector. Apart from that one exception, we have middle-aged men with business backgrounds who will slavishly follow any cuts that the Secretary of State suggests.

Today I learned that the latest infant mortality rates in Calderdale were shocking. In Calderdale the rate is 12·6 per cent., in Yorkshire and Humberside it is 9·1 per cent., and in the rest of England and Wales it is 8·4 per cent. The perinatal statistics—deaths in first week or stillbirths—were 12·9 per cent. in Calderdale, 8·5 per cent. in Yorkshire and 8·3 per cent. for England and Wales as a whole. Given those statistics, I must ask myself what on earth this Tory-appointed group of people were doing voting for cuts in beds and cuts in maternity services.

I know that the Secretary of State and his Ministers have received representations from a group of people in Calderdale about planning permission for a 40-bed private home for people with learning difficulties. I mentioned the issue when I was on the Committee on the National Health Service and Community Care Bill. That plan is totally at odds with the district health authority's philosophy of care for such people. The group making representations came out of hospital recently and are speaking up on behalf of their friends in Stansfield View, who are totally opposed to the home.

I think that there is a hidden agenda and that Stansfield View will be emptied while 40 people with learning and physical difficulties are still waiting to come out. If planning permission is given—it seems that it will be—they will end up in a totally unsuitable home, situated between a canal and a river, on a rat-infested industrial site. The business men appointed by the Secretary of State will happily go ahead with that, but it bodes ill for the people of Calderdale.

I am disgusted at the deliberate way in which the Government have put their friends into lucrative part-time jobs. I hope that the rest of the country and the people of Calderdale realise that those whom the Secretary of State has placed on the board will earn about £250 an hour and they will make all the wrong decisions.

Mr. David Evennett (Erith and Crayford): I support the regulations, and do not share the concerns that have been expressed by Opposition Members this evening.

Change for change's sake is never a good idea, but change to improve the system should be supported. Following the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) is always an experience, but her view of democracy in the health service is totally wrong. Democratic control over the NHS is represented by Parliament and by the Secretary of State. That has always been the case and it always will be. We are the guardians of the national health service.

The Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), is living in the past. He and the hon. Member for Halifax seem to want to see their old friends, the Labour councillors and the trade union members, restored to the health authority—people who were not elected but nominated on a political basis. By means of the regulations, the Government intend to introduce better management and more management experience into the national health service.

Mrs. Mahon: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Evennett: No. The hon. Lady has had her opportunity to speak. It is high time that she listened to some common sense.

If the management of the national health service is to be improved, new people with management and business skills must be persuaded to offer their services. The NHS is a much valued and much loved national institution. However, we hear much criticism of the NHS in our constituency surgeries. The criticism that is most generally voiced, in both general and specific terms, relates to the local management of the NHS.

Unfortunately, there have been many examples of poor management. Although more money has been poured into the NHS, so that more patients can be treated, the criticism that is expressed—it is a valid criticism in certain areas—is that there has not been more effective and efficient utilisation of resources in the interests of patients. We need good management at all levels in the NHS to ensure that patient services are, and continue to be, first class.

How can good management be achieved? Local councillors were not elected to the district health authorities; they were appointed. Why should local authorities appoint health authority representatives? Of course there must be liaison between local authority social services and the NHS, but we need better management. Therefore, if we can appoint people who are better qualified to serve NHS management at local level, we should do so.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Evennett: Yes, I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Lofthouse: If we accept that better management is required and that better management should be provided by people with experience of management in manufacturing industry, why is it necessary to go miles away from local health authority areas to pick such people? Does it mean that no suitable people can be found in the area?

Mr. Evennett: The point is that we want the best people, wherever they may come from, so that they can provide expertise for the management of the NHS.

In conclusion——

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Evennett: No, I shall not give way. The hon. Gentleman never listens. If he did so, he might learn something. We have had too many sedentary interventions from him over many years.

We want to improve the NHS. We have put more money into it, and more patients have been treated. What we need now is a better management structure in the interests of patients.

10.37 pm

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): I echo the concern expressed during the passage of the Bill, both on the Floor of the House and in Committee, and also tonight about regulations of this nature that are the consequence of the Bill having been passed.

The hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) referred to the number of business men who have been appointed. We should not be surprised about that. The thrust of the reforms is to put the NHS on a more business-cum-private footing. From the Government's point of view, therefore, it is entirely consistent that business men should be put in charge of the NHS. As has been acknowledged, however, certainly on this side of the House and to a certain extent by Conservative Members, the sad thing is that all too often the business men and others who have been appointed have no direct local contacts. That is inappropriate when we are talking about the management of the NHS.

Why is it, one wonders, that people have so often been moved in from other parts of the country to serve on district health authorities? I suspect that the reason is partly that, in some parts of the country, the political complexion is such that it may not be as easy as the Secretary of State would wish to find people of both his and his Government's cast of mind to serve on the authorities. Therefore, people have to be shipped in from elsewhere.

There is a more practical reason. If someone lives in a local community and is facing pressures and having to take difficult decisions—if he is the subject of letters in local newspapers, of people phoning him at home and of people making their concerns known to him when he is shopping —that is something of a strain. It is much easier to take cold-blooded decisions resulting in cuts, closures and a diminution of the health service when someone does not have to face the people whom his decisions will adversely affect. That is one of the reasons why the thinking of the Secretary of State in making these appointments is so clear.

Mr. Cryer: Is there a possible third reason—that if, as is unlikely, the Tories are re-elected, they have in place, free from any local accountability, a remote character ready to take the next step of privatising the national health service?

Mr. Kennedy: I would be straying a bit wide of the regulations if I answered that, but given the motives and the means that this legislation have given rise to, one cannot, being as generous as possible to the Government, dismiss the possibility of such a change following under a future Tory Administration. That should be said loud and clear; I welcome the hon. Gentleman's intervention.

It is regrettable that, in addition to the other examples that have been given of the trade unions and local authorities, the Government resisted an amendment moved in Committee—their track record on these appointments confirms how useful that amendment would have been—to improve the comparatively meagre number of nurses who have been appointed. At the time of the original Griffiths management report and the recommendations that flowed from it, the Government were reluctant to concede a central role in the management of the health service to the nursing profession. They conceded it in due course, which was welcome.

Further down the line of management, that absence of guaranteed or direct nursing input has been replicated in the appointments that have been made. The Secretary of State was given lists of nominees by the regions from which to choose non-executive members. Nurses appeared on those lists, and some of the executive members are nurses, but the regions of Wessex, Yorkshire, South West Thames and North West Thames have no nursing representatives on the new bodies.

That is not good for the health service, especially when the thrust is towards a business or management-orientated health service to deal with such items as throughput, which, as any nurse could advise those bodies, is not a mark of success. If people are discharged from the hospital sector into the community before they have recovered, their chances of recovery may be damaged and another statistic may be added to the admissions column a few weeks later. Throughput is not a categoric or sufficiently illuminating indication of success in the health service. Nobody would be better advised to tell a health authority that than a nurse, but all too often nurses have not been appointed.

The classic example of a lack of local knowledge occurred recently. We all know the very tragic circumstances that gave rise to the by-election campaign in Eastbourne. The Conservative candidate is known to us as the former Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe. He was recently adopted, and at this stage his knowledge of Eastbourne is not full and detailed. That was borne out by his statement during the campaign pointing to the success of one of the local hospitals. A photograph of that hospital was subsequently produced which showed it to be a pile of rubble.

That highlights the dangers of having people who do not have sufficient local knowledge expounding the virtues of the health service in a given locality. It was a classic example which considerably embarrassed the local campaign and, I suspect, the Conservative party nationally.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): It was a successful demolition.

Mr. Kennedy: As the hon. Gentleman says, it was a successful demolition. It remains to be seen whether a phoenix will rise from the ashes. One lives in some doubt about that.

The new system is unrepresentative and undemocratic. It will put more and more power in the hands of central Government at the expense of local communities. For that reason, we shall be joining the Labour party in opposing the regulations.

10.45 pm

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): I welcome the revision of the membership of the regional and district health authorities, and of the family health services, as much as anything because the previous membership of those bodies, even if drawn from a wider catchment, were remarkably out of touch with the areas and the populations that they claimed to represent. How rarely do I remember any of those authorities holding a public meeting in my constituency to explain the problems they were up against. The whole question of public accountability by those bodies has not left much of a mark on me.

One of the weaknesses of these authorities always seemed to lie in the fact that, apart from the officers, most of the members were not sure what job they were meant to perform or whom they represented. In those terms, to have a more businesslike approach or, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State said, to make a more effective decision-making team seems to make good sense and to be wholly welcome.

However, business efficiency and effective decision-making, although important—no one would dispute that every health authority requires that expertise—may be too narrow an approach. Nobody disputes the need for the NHS to be able to draw on business acumen and, as the internal market develops, that ability will become ever more important. However, what requirement is there for the new, non-executive officers to be NHS patients? That question has already been asked by the Opposition.

I believe that the members should be not only directors but consumers of the authorities if they are to have a valuable input into the discussions of those authorities. The regulations seem to have the single drawback that they lay too little stress on the voice of the consumer or on how the new bodies are to be accountable to the communities they serve. They are appointed for four years, but not by local people. Is their sole remit business efficiency? If so, what proposals are there for giving the voice of the patient some way of being heard?

Community health councils have also been mentioned. I suggest that, up to a certain point, they can fulfil the job of being the consumer's voice. However, if we want them to succeed as the consumer's voice in the newly shaped national health service, surely one of the non-executive members should be the chairman of the local CHC or there should be room for co-opted members on the new bodies. After all, if we are concerned with business acumen, and with restructuring and reshaping the national health service to give it a more businesslike approach to its massive task and to the huge funds it handles, we should follow big business down the road of having either a customer relations director or a customer relations manager among those who are non-executive, co-opted members.

In welcoming the changes, I believe that there is still a gap in what has been proposed. We should give the patient's voice rather more time to be heard than seems to be possible with these proposals.

Mr. Ian McCartney (Makerfield): I promise you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I shall take only a couple of minutes. I saw you raise your eyebrows when I rose, and I know that a number of hon. Members wish to participate. I am glad that you can take a joke.

I am probably one of the few hon. Members who knows the wrath of the Secretary of State. In his earlier office of Minister for Health, he sacked me from my local family practitioner committee. Conservative Members will probably say, "That is the only good decision that he has made at the Department of Health." I was sacked purely and simply because I had been put on the committee by the local authority and was asking pertinent but awkward questions about the administration of the committee. The right hon. and learned Gentleman could not find a local authority member with whom to replace me because there were no elected Conservative representatives in our area at the time. He left the position vacant rather than making a fresh appointment from among the local authorities.

The Secretary of State has a long history of attempting to remove from authorities people with political views that he does not like, including some of the most efficient and hard-working people in the national health service, who have been withdrawn from service over the years.

The present regulations represent the final nail in the coffin of public accountability and public and local representation in the national health service. My authority, which looks after 340,000 people, has the following criteria: one must not live or work in Wigan, and if one is a member of the local authority or a community group that has comments to pass about the running of the health authority one will be excluded. Amazingly, when the present chairman of the health authority was appointed he said that he knew nothing about the running of the authority but that he was a quick learner.

Since then, Mr. Hague has, indeed, learnt quickly. He has learnt about hospital closures because he is constantly closing hospitals. He has learnt about privatisation through his wholesale closure of hospitals and as he has privatised care for the elderly and the mentally ill. He knows something about contracts. At almost every health authority meeting, when the first item on the agenda is reached, the "public interest" is invoked, a resolution is passed and the public are thrown out. The authority then proceeds to talk about contracts for companies such as Takare. In privacy, the authority may change the whole system of contracts so that Takare is the only company that can apply for and obtain contracts. In private, the authority consistently acts against the public interest.

A Mr. Robertson, the retired chief executive of Robertson's jam, is to be appointed to the family health services authority. At least the health service in Wigan can look forward to jam tomorrow. Mr. Robertson is somewhat coy when it comes to whether he lives in the borough. The press statement sent to local Members of Parliament says that he lives somewhere in Cheshire. The members of the health service authority representing the professions also live anywhere but Wigan—in Cheshire, in Lancashire, in Bolton and in other parts of Greater Manchester but not in the local community.

I should have no personal objection to the Conservatives even controlling the health services authority if they lived in the borough and if they used, and were accountable for, its services. But that is plainly not the case. The Government are a centralising Government who are taking for themselves complete political control of the health service by means of appointees who do not live in or care for the local community and who do not care for the national health service. Many of those appointed have been appointed for one reason—their sole objective during their two or four-year term is to privatise as much of the health service as they can, preferably before the next general election. That is why I welcome the statement by my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), that at the earliest possible opportunity Messrs. Robertson and Hague et al will be sacked and replaced by people who live and work in the community and who have a commitment to the national health service.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I am a bit surprised that the Secretary of State for Health has left the Chamber. He should be ashamed of himself. He should be here listening to what we are saying because the Opposition totally disagree with his proposals. Indeed, one or two observations have also been made by Conservative Members—[Interruption.] Ah, the Secretary of State must have heard me because he has just returned to the Chamber.

We know what is going on. We know what the Secretary of State is doing. He frittered around with transport before he came to social services and I remember well what happened. The Secretary of State has made a mess since he took over his flaming job. He is now moving towards more closures for the national health.

The Secretary of State need not frown because I shall put him in the picture. He is coming to my constituency on Saturday for "Europe Week" and he will stand on a platform with the Conservative candidate for the next general election. [Interruption.] That is not a big joke. It is a serious matter. I warn the Secretary of State that he is going to get an earbashing on Saturday.

The Secretary of State obviously has some influence on cuts and the way in which a local health authority should spend its money. The Secretary of State knows where the King's Mill hospital is because he lives just down the road in Rushcliffe. I do not know what his constituents think about him there, nor do I know what people think of him in the city of Nottingham after what the Secretary of State has done there.

The Secretary of State must be aware of the finances that have been made available for Central Nottinghamshire district health authority. He has appointed people to carry out his dirty work. That is what it is all about. There will be no come-back. They sit around the table and tell the manager what she has to do—and the manager is a lady in Central Nottinghamshire. That wonderful lady has done a first-class job since she was appointed, but she will not be able to do the job that she should be doing because the Secretary of State has appointed all those bosses from all over the damn place and has sacked the real link with the community.

The Secretary of State talks about community care and he gets the Prime Minister to say the same things. They say that they care about the facilities that are provided in the community. At the Victoria hospital in Mansfield there are a number of bungalows provided for the mentally handicapped. They were built so that the parents of mentally handicapped children could have some respite. The children could move into the bungalows to allow the parents some freedom, a change and a rest. Two of those bungalows are to be closed, yet the Government talk about caring for the community. They could not care less. One of my colleagues made a good point earlier: every step that the Secretary of State has taken with regard to the NHS has been a step towards privatisation.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am sure that the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) will agree that I cannot leave it to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health to answer all that.

I am glad that I shall be meeting the hon. Gentleman in the Asda carpark at Sutton in Ashfield on Saturday. The hon. Gentleman's predecessor used to campaign with me for Europe and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will join me on Saturday. I hope that he has heard that the Labour party has undergone a conversion and the party's policy is now also in favour of "Europe Week". I look forward to visiting King's Mill again. I know it extremely well.

Mr. Haynes: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Clarke: No, after the hon. Gentleman has heard me out on King's Mill.

Mr. Haynes: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In my contribution I have not mentioned Europe—[Interruption.] Wait a minute—except for "Europe Week." That is all. That is what the Secretary of State is coming to. That is all I have said about Europe.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I very much——

Mr. Clarke: The last time I visited King's Mill hospital was to open a major extension that the Government had financed. I look forward to the expansion of services in Central Nottinghamshire health authority. To which of the new appointments to Central Nottinghamshire health authority does the hon. Gentleman really object? He is a fair man. He is not as partisan as he likes to make out on the Floor of the House. He knows perfectly well that we have appointed people who are interested in a better health service in central Ashfield. Would he please not lark about trying to claim that he seriously objects—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) has to go in for jobbery because he needs votes to be elected to the national executive. The hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes)—I nearly said my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield—knows perfectly well that he does not really object to any of the people whom I have appointed to Central Nottinghamshire district health authority.

Mr. Haynes: He has got a bloody neck. He really has got a neck to make a comment of that sort.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That sort of coarse language is uncharacteristic of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Haynes: I withdraw it, but I still mean it. I have not been laughing. The Secretary of State is still laughing—he has been laughing throughout the debate. He thinks that this a damn joke. This is a serious matter. We are all complaining about the rundown of the national health service in our own areas, and now the Secretary of State has appointed bosses who jump to attention when he says so. He is pouring money into their pockets. No doubt they will get an increase pretty soon—[Interruption.] A part-time job with a damn good salary to go along with it, but to do his dirty work.

The reason why ward closures are taking place is that people are frightened of overspending by the end of the financial year. The reason why people are overspending is that this Secretary of State has cut services in the Central Nottinghamshire district. That is having a serious effect on the Ashfield constituency. I wanted to get up and say it, and I have said it.

11.2 pm

Ms. Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North): I shall be very brief, as time is passing by all too quickly in this important debate. My points are about North Staffordshire district health authority. We do not want business men who have no knowledge of the local area or of local services wheeled in to deal with the management of the national health service. My hon. Friends have made it quite clear that there is a hidden agenda—that the changes are taking us one step nearer to the privatisation of the national health service.

Nurses who have been recruited in north Staffordshire and nurses on Project 2000 ask me whether I realise that they are afraid that there will be no jobs by the time they finish their training. What do business men know about decisions that are made behind the scenes by the Government? It is absolutely impossible to train the number of nurses who are needed.

A further point to which I object very strongly is that, having reduced the numbers on the district health authority, we now have to wheel in ex-members of the district health authority to deal with nurse regradings. They are paid in the region of £40 a day. Why cannot some concern be introduced? Why could we not have had people who are prepared to do that work, have knowledge, put in the time and visit all the different facilities in the area?

The community health council in north Staffordshire has made it clear that it thinks that it is totally out of order that it can no longer as of right sit on the district health authority. That is entirely wrong. We have heard so much about the interests of consumers, or patients, but there are moves afoot for the health authority to meet behind closed doors and for business men to run the NHS.

In north Staffordshire, a health profile report has been commissioned by the Stoke-on-Trent city council. It has identified huge amounts of ill health within Stoke-on-Trent. How can key decisions on health be made if there is no link between those who have been democratically elected? How are we to deal with the great problems posed by ill health under such undemocratic arrangements? I do not want the NHS to be run on entirely commercial lines.

11.5 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): Although no one would realise it after listening to the contributions of Opposition Members, the regulations are designed to demonstrate the Government's commitment to improving the delivery of the national health service and to ensure that the health care that the British people enjoy from the NHS will continue to improve. The regulations are part of the programme which gives effect to the Government's commitment to more effective management within the NHS. That is understood by my hon. Friends the Members for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) and for Newbury (Sir M. McNair-Wilson), and I thank them for their support.

The NHS is a vast organisation—it is the largest employer in Europe. It is not a business, and we do not pretend that it is. It is, however, a huge organisation, and it can and should benefit from more business-like management, more effective management and by securing the best use of the resources that are devoted to it by the taxpayer on behalf of the patient. That is the purpose to which the motions are directed.

Mr. Lofthouse: If that expertise is required, why is it that a member of the Pontefract health authority is the managing director of the Rockware glass group—his factory is on the border of my constituency and an adjoining one and he lives in Rotherham—and another is a doctor's wife who lives in Wetherby, which is 20 miles away? I do not have the full list of the members at my disposal. Is there not a doctor's wife or a business man within the Pontefract health authority who has the expertise to do the job?

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman is advancing an argument which was introduced on several occasions by one or two of his hon. Friends. If the purpose of the health authority is to secure the good management of health resources within its area, why does he consider it vital that every member of it should have what he deems to be the right postcode? That would not seem to be the critical factor when someone is nominated to serve on the health authority.

I must tell Opposition Members who feel so strongly about postcodes that their view is not shared by the majority of those who are involved daily with the management of the NHS. I have heard less adverse comment about the commitment to a more effective, slimmer and more efficient health service than about all the other principles that come within the NHS reforms. It is hardly a secret that the reforms have generated a degree of interest and controversy. Even the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) could not make a leak out of that.

Within the national health service, this set of proposals is almost entirely uncontroversial. It is only Opposition Members, who are so consumed by the conviction that every decision in the NHS management should be regarded as political, who see this as a controversial initiative.

The hon. Member for Livingston has not answered in his mind the fundamental question—what a health authority is there for: is it a political forum or a management organisation? Is it there to hold an interesting debate about the quality of health care and the ideas of its members about health care in a particular area, or is it an organisation charged with the effective use of health service resources in a particular locality to produce the best health care it can for the patients who live there? I have no doubt what the answer is, but the hon. Gentleman does not seem to have sorted it out in his mind.

Let us consider the charges that he levied against the regulations this evening. He said that there was no representation as of right on the health authorities for the local authority of the district. That is correct, but there is no representation on the health authorities for anyone else either. They are not there as representational organisations—that is not their function, but the function of the community health council within the context of the health service.

When we are asked to whom the health service is accountable, the answer, as my hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Crayford correctly said, is that, since the day of its inception, the health service has been accountable to Health Ministers, not local bureaucracies, in whatever form they have existed during the history of the service.

Mr. Morgan: That is splitting hairs.

Mr. Dorrell: To talk of parliamentary accountability is not splitting hairs; it is an important matter.

Mr. Morgan: When the Minister describes the health authorities as management organisations, he surely forgets that health authority members also acted as lay representatives when anybody was appointed to a senior position in a hospital. They were also asked to take particular care of one hospital and acted as lay representatives on grading appeals for nurses. Surely, if they are management organisations, numbers on them are suddenly reduced from 20 plus to five and the position is not thought through, we are then confronted with the problem of what to do with functions other than those of the business whizz kid management organisations, that the previous health authority members carried out.

Was there ever better evidence of a Government proposal that had not been thought through than this evidence that they are going back to the ex-members of health authorities that they have just sacked and asking them to do for money what they previously did for nothing when sitting on grading appeals for nurses?

Mr. Dorrell: Never have I heard better evidence of the tail wagging the dog. Are the authorities there in order to provide a quarry for people to perform those important, valuable functions, or are they there as a group of people whose job it is to manage the health service within a locality? I have already made clear my answer to that question.

Mr. Cook: I shall carry the Under-Secretary back to the comment that he made a moment ago—that it is not his intention that the health authorities should be representative. I would certainly agree that the Government have achieved that objective through the appointments. But he made the case that the job of representation is a task for the community health councils. If he is to rely on them to inject a note of representation into decision making in the health service, will he now issue an instruction to all those health authorities which, since August, have withdrawn observer status from the community health council at their meetings and simultaneously refused to send members of the new authorities along to community health council meetings?

Mr. Dorrell: Certainly not because the purpose of representational organisations such as CHCs is to have sufficient roots in the community to be aware at all times of the community's needs and represent those to the health authority. Through the local Member of Parliament or whatever organisations they wish to approach, they should ensure that their views about the health authority's policies are known and understood. That is the legitimate function of the CHC. It is not part of its function to second-guess and become involved in the management process. The two functions are separate and should be seen as such.

The second point made by the hon. Member for Livingston was not dissimilar from the one that he made in his intervention a moment ago. He took us to task for debarring from membership of health authorities paid officials of unions whose members are employees of the health authority in question. The straightforward reason for that is that it clarifies whose task is that of representation—whether it be CHCs representing patients, or paid union officials representing employees—and whose that of management. The two tasks are separate and can be better discharged if they are understood by all parties to be separate.

Thirdly, the hon. Gentleman said that members of the health authorities were overwhelmingly business men. His mathematics was interesting. He quoted the percentage of business men as 52, a figure that included laywers. As a lapsed business man, I am bound to say that I do not regard lawyers as business men.

We make no apology for having sought to introduce to the structure of the health authorities people with experience of managing large organisations. We believe that that will provide more efficient management of our public health service.

Once the hon. Gentleman had got those three weak arguments off his chest, he degenerated into wild accusations about political bias. That was when he showed himself in his true colours. He left behind the measured tones of his initial arguments and began accusing us of all sorts of political malpractice—including the introduction to this country of the principles of nomenclatura. He showed that he understood those principles so well that he intends to apply them in reverse in the unlikely event of a Labour Government being elected.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) asked why the associate membership—in the context of FHSAs—should continue to contribute to the work of the authority in addition to the slimmed down authority itself. I believe that that is a more efficient way to proceed than past methods. The narrow, smaller group will have the responsibility for evolving the policy of the authority in the area, but that does not stop its members calling on the wider group of associate members to discharge some of the less central functions of the authority.

That has always been explicit in the model that we have advanced for health authorities' discharge of their functions. To some extent, it also answers the point made earlier by the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan)——

Mr. Michael Morris: If the associate members are to discharge such a valuable function, am I to understand that they are not to be paid? Are they supposed to do the work on a voluntary basis?

Mr. Dorrell: They will continue to do the work on the same basis as before. The smaller group will be paid for the additional responsibilities of full membership of an authority.

The hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) said that he was proud of the NHS, and had always regarded himself as a lifelong supporter of its principles and the way in which it had been introduced; he then said that he felt that our proposals represented inadequate democratic accountability in the running of the service. He has not reconciled himself to the fact that those two statements are fundamentally contradictory.

The NHS that was introduced in 1947 was a national service, accountable to Parliament, whose democratic accountability was—through Ministers—to the House of Commons. It is not, and never has been, a system of different local health services accountable to a local elected body. If the hon. Gentleman can persuade his hon. Friends that that is what Labour policy should be, I shall watch with interest—and I shall be very pleased to argue against it, because I do not believe that it represents either an efficient way in which to use resources or a just way in which to provide health care. But the hon. Gentleman cannot claim to be a supporter of a national health service and then, in his next breath, argue for the disintegration of the NHS into a series of locally democratically accountable health services.

Mr. Hinchliffe: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Dorrell: I will give way once more, but I cannot engage in a debate on every point.

Mr. Hinchliffe: Throughout its history, the NHS has involved local people—either councillors or members of hospital management committees—who live among people who use the service, and who use it themselves. My objection to the structure set up by the Government is that there is no accountability to local people; the Government's model involves people who do not live in the area concerned, and who have nothing to do with activities such as visiting hospitals and clinics and seeing the problems that face the NHS daily—nothing to do with participation. The Minister has not responded to that point.

Mr. Dorrell: Several Opposition Members have convinced themselves that the health authorities are being staffed with people who—almost to a man—have no connection with the area in which they work. That is a travesty of the truth. Certainly we have not insisted on what I call the postcode test; but the vast majority live either in or very close to the health authority districts in which they will serve, and all will quickly develop a deeper knowledge of the authorities in their areas than any previous generation of health authority members.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) raised an interesting point about whether we were discriminating against married couples. If we had listed every conceivable relationship that could lead to a conflict of interests which should properly be declared, these measures would be enormously lengthy. There is a specific requirement for the interest of the spouse of a health authority member to be regarded in the same way as the interest of the member himself, or herself. Beyond that, however, it depends on the understanding, or desire to act properly, of each member of the health authority, whom we expect to declare any commercial activity that might give him or her an interest. The provision to which my hon. Friend referred is not intended to give carte blanche to anyone whose relationship falls outside that test not to consider whether he has an interest that he should declare.

The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) asked whether nurses should be represented on health authorities. He should remember that, under the reforms to be introduced in April, health authorities will be the bodies purchasing health care on behalf of a resident population. The Government continue to think it important that there should be a medical input into the management of units within the NHS: that is, that the management of hospitals—whether they are trusts or directly managed units—should involve such input. It is not obvious to me, however, that it is essential to have a "nurse input" into what is basically a contracting organisation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newbury asked whether there should be a stronger voice for the patient in the form of a customer relations director. My hon. Friend does not seem to place as much emphasis as I do on the fact that the health authority itself is customer/patient-centred. After April, the whole purpose of a health authority will be to look at the health needs of everyone in a defined geographical area and to devote all its efforts to trying to secure the best possible health care for the resident population for which it is responsible. The idea of a customer relations director in an organisation that is totally directed to that purpose is somewhat otiose.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: Many organisations that do nothing but serve the customer for commercial purposes think that it is best to have a customer relations manager. Why should the health authorities be different? If they did not have to take it upon themselves to assume that they know what the customer wants and that they are always right, they would listen to what the customer says.

Mr. Dorrell: The difference lies in the phrase "for commercial purposes". A commercial organisation serves the customer, but also has to serve shareholders. That is not the case with a health authority, whose sole task is to use public money to secure the best quality health care for its resident population.

The House heard an interesting discussion between the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney), the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) and the absent hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer). They convinced themselves that the Government had embarked upon a programme of privatisation of the national health service. None of the hon. Gentlemen explained why, if that was the case, we did not take the opportunity in our White Paper on the future of the NHS to explain such a policy and the reasons for it.

Mr. McCartney: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Dorrell: I have given way a great deal.

Mr. McCartney: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Surely the Minister should not be allowed to attack hon. Members and then to refuse to allow interventions. Let us have a free debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. Dorrell.

Mr. Dorrell: Those three hon. Members satisfied themselves, although I think no other hon. Member, that there was a paper tiger lurking in the bushes—the privatisation of the NHS. They then had a heroic battle in which no doubt they convinced themselves that they were the victors. It was not instructive for any of us.

The regulations represent a major improvement in the way in which the health service is run and everyone who works in the service knows that. The argument about the future of the service is not just about the level of spending. It is also about how best we can provide for the efficient management of the NHS in order to ensure that that money buys the best possible health care for the patient. The Opposition have not taken a single step into that part of the argument. We have heard no proposals from them about how they would ensure maximum improvement and efficiency in the service. The Government proposals will improve efficiency, and I commend them to the House.

Mr. Robin Cook: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question put,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Regional and District Health Authorities (Membership and Procedure) Regulations 1990 (S.I., 1990, No. 1331), dated 2nd July 1990, a copy of which was laid before this House on 5th July, be annulled.—[Mr. Robin Cook.]

PROCEDURE

Motion made,

That this House agrees with the recommendations contained in the First Report of the Select Committee on Procedure of this Session (House of Commons Paper No. 379).—[Mr. Wood.]

Hon. Members: Object.

QUESTIONS TO MEMBERS, ETC.

Motion made,

That with effect from the beginning of the next Session of Parliament Standing Order No. 17 (Questions to Members) and Standing Order No. 18 (Notices of motions, amendments and questions) be repealed and the following Standing Orders be made—

Time for taking questions

(1)—Questions shall be taken on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, after private business has been disposed of.

(2) No question shall be taken after half-past three o'clock, except questions which have not appeared on the paper but which are in Mr. Speaker's opinion of an urgent character and relate either to matters of public importance or to the arrangement of business.

(3) Any questions tabled for written answer on a day on which the House does not sit by reason of the continuance of a previous sitting shall be deemed to be questions for written answer on the next sitting day and shall appear on the Order Paper for that day.

Notices of questions, motions and amendments

(2) A notice of a question, or of an amendment to a motion standing on the Order Paper for which no day has been fixed or of the addition of a name in support of such a motion or amendment, which is given after half-past ten o'clock in the evening shall be treated for all purposes as if it were a notice handed in after the rising of the House.

(3) A Member shall indicate on the notice of any question whether it is for oral, written or priority written answer.

(4) Where a Member has indicated that a question is for priority written answer the Minister shall cause an answer to be given to the Member on the date for which notice has been given, provided that the requirement of notice shall be the same for such questions as that prescribed in this order for questions for oral answer.

(5) Notice of a question for oral answer may not be given on a day earlier than ten sitting days before the day for answer, provided that, where that earliest day would otherwise fall on a Friday, the earliest day on which such notice may be given will instead be the previous sitting day.

(6) Notice of any question for oral answer must appear at latest on the notice paper circulated two days (excluding Saturday and Sunday) before that on which an answer is desired.

(7) When it is proposed that the House shall adjourn for a period of less than four days, any day during that period (other than a Saturday or Sunday) shall be counted as a sitting day for the purpose of calculating the period in paragraph (5) of this order.

(8) When notice shall have been given of a Motion for the adjournment of the House for more than three days Mr. Speaker may cause to have printed and circulated with the Vote a memorandum superseding the provisions of paragraphs (5) and (6) of this order and instead setting out the earliest day on which notice of questions for oral answer may be given for each of the first ten sitting days after that adjournment, provided that each such day shall as far as practicable fall on the same day of the week as that on which the question is to be answered and shall not be fewer than fourteen days before the day for answer; and also setting out the latest day for notice of questions for oral answer on each of the first two sitting days following that adjournment provided that each such day shall not be fewer than two days (excluding Saturday and Sunday) before the day for answer.—[Mr. Wood.]

Disabled Children (Mobility Allowance)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Wood.]

11.40 pm

Mr. Terry Patchett (Barnsley, East): I am most grateful for the opportunity of raising this issue on the Floor of the House as there has been burning contention in my constituency and nationwide about the great injustice whereby sufferers under the age of five are denied mobility allowance.

A lot of money has dribbled through the Government's fingers, and many rich people have got richer. The Government had the money and, with a little effort, could have provided for the sad cases in which young couples have disabled children under the age of five but are denied benefit.

In July I asked the Secretary of State if he would bring forward proposals to amend the Social Security Act 1990 to grant disabled under-fives the right to mobility allowance. As expected, the Government announced that they had no plans to do so. I am bitter about that. When reading the document, "The Way Ahead", I noticed that once again those children are denied that benefit.

While I appreciate that this is a national issue, a case in my constituency highlights the seriousness of the problem. Mr. and Mrs. Jow in Bolton on Dearne were blessed with triplets, but unfortunately two of them suffer from cerebral palsy, which denies Mrs. Jow the chance to go out to earn a living to supplement her husband's income as she is a full-time carer for the children. As they suffer from different degrees of the problem, the two children go to separate schools, which creates a transport problem and extra expense. Five or six times each month, they have to go to hospital, and—believe it or not—while there is a guideline of five years of age for benefits, it costs just as much to run a car for a three-year-old as it does for a five-year-old.

I am pleased that in recent months the Government have set a precedent in relation to attendance allowance and have wiped out the age limit there. I am therefore hopeful that the Minister will think carefully about this matter when she responds to my comments.

I do not intend to go on at length as I am sure that all hon. Members present, including the Minister, are aware of the problem. It is a crying shame that so many rich people have benefited while other people suffer this terrible financial burden and the country cannot help them out. It is a disgrace that the Government will allow them to live in such hardship when a few pounds could help them out and make a great deal of difference to the quality of their lives.

I have explained the case of the triplets, two of whom are disabled. Mr. and Mrs. Jow have another child—four children in all—and the two invalids should be receiving mobility allowance. They are not the only case in my constituency. I know of at least a dozen similar cases.

I cannot understand the hard and fast stance that the Government have taken on this matter, given that they relented and recognised the problem for attendance allowance. I see no difference with mobility allowance. Nor can I see any difference in the price of petrol to run a three, four or five-year-old kiddie to hospital.

I hope that we can convince the Government that they ought to recognise that this is a problem. To solve it would not break the bank. It would help many young couples who suffer this heavy financial burden. It is the Government's duty to assist those people.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mrs. Gillian Shephard): I congratulate the hon. Member for Barnsley, East (Mr. Patchett) on raising this subject so soon after our return from the summer recess and for the responsible way in which he has put the case. I know that he tried to raise the subject during the debate on the Consolidated Fund Bill before the summer recess but was unsuccessful because his name was too far down the list. However, both of us were briefed on that occasion, too.

The hon. Gentleman generously referred to the fact that the Government have made changes in the arrangements for disabled children and for disabled people in general. The Government are very much aware of the difficulties faced by disabled people and by the people who look after them. I am particularly conscious of the problems faced by the parents of severely disabled young children.

I was interested to hear which case the hon. Gentleman would raise to highlight his concern. The problem has concerned him for some time as he has tabled a number of parliamentary questions about it. The case that he raised relates to triplets, two of whom are disabled. The hon. Gentleman raised specifically the question of entitlement to mobility allowance, but he also referred to other areas of disability provision. Therefore, I should like to place mobility allowance in the wider context of the total social security provision that is made for disabled people and their carers.

In the past few months there has been an increase in the amount of help provided for families with disabled children. The social security system offers a network of provision for families with disabled children, in addition to mobility allowance. Extra help is available in the premiums which are paid with the income-related benefits —income support, housing benefit and community charge benefit. Help for carers is given through the invalid care allowance. The main benefit for disabled children, however, is attendance allowance, which provides £37·55 per week for people—children as well as adults—who need attention or supervision both during the day and at night, and £25·05 per week for those with lesser attendance needs.

When attendance allowance was introduced in 1971 the lower age limit was set at the age of two. The Government have been aware of the case that has been made on behalf of families with disabled children—that many handicapped children have additional attendance needs.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): The Minister may remember that my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise) and I pressed her colleague, the Minister of State, to review the decision that children under the age of two were not, until recently, entitled to attendance allowance. When the Government decided to conduct a review and then to give about 3,000 families entitlement to the £37 attendance allowance for children under the age of two, why did they not also take the opportunity to consider what my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, East (Mr. Patchett) has advocated—a review of the age limit which bars those same familes from entitlement to mobility allowance for young children? That is the nub of this Adjournment debate.

Mrs. Shephard: I shall deal later with the distinction between the criteria used for attendance allowance and for mobility allowance. With the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist), I was a member of the Committee which considered these matters in great detail. I am sure that he is as glad as I am that the Government were able to make the change in the attendance allowance. I shall deal later with what the Government believe is the essential difference between the criteria for the two allowances. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that some 3,000 families have gained from the change.

Invalid care allowance may also be payable where a person has given up work to look after a child who is receiving attendance allowance. A family with a very severely disabled baby can qualify for as much as £65 a week extra. If there are two severely disabled babies, they qualify for £65 a week extra and £37·55 for the other baby. At a time when there are many pressing demands on the social security budget, the House will agree that that represents a significant improvement for families with disabled babies.

When my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced the abolition of the lower age limit for attendance allowance on 25 October last year, he also announced some other changes to the benefit system to help families with disabled children. First, the child's disability premium, which is paid with income support for families with a disabled child, was aligned with the adult rate. That meant an increase from £6·50 to £15·40 a week. It took effect in April and it is estimated that it will help 20,000 families.

A further change that will help families with disabled children came into effect at the beginning of this month. From October, we have introduced a carer's premium of £10 a week into income support for those receiving invalid care allowance. We hope that that will help 30,000 carers. The premiums in income support carry through into the calculations for housing benefit, giving help with rent, and community charge benefit.

• I should like to draw the House's attention to the surveys undertaken by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys into disability and its effects on expenditure for families with disabled children. Its findings showed that the extra expenditure as a result of disability was obviously affected by the severity and type of disability, but the relationship was less clear for children than for adults. Children require a certain amount of care and attention, and the amounts of extra expenditure varied little in the lower categories—about £4·55, rising to a peak of an average of £12·53 a week in the highest severity category. The higher rate of attendance allowance is £37·55 a week and the lower rate is £25·05 a week. There is a considerable gap between those figures.

The abolition of the lower age limit for attendance allowance showed that the Government were concerned about the needs of families with young handicapped children. What I wish to say about mobility allowance must be considered in the light of the full range of social security provisions and the improvements that we have made rather than in isolation.

To explain that, it would be helpful to remind the House of the background to mobility allowance, which was introduced in 1976 as a cash benefit to help severely disabled people with the extra costs that they incur in getting out and about. The Government of the day decided that, in the light of the resources available, the main medical eligibility criteria for the allowance should be inability or virtual inability to walk due to physical disablement. That means, in practical terms, that entitlement to the allowance is based on an assessment of walking ability.

Since mobility allowance was introduced, the lower age limit has remained at the age of five. The choice of the lower age limit is a matter of judgment, in which two important factors must be borne in mind. The first is the walking ability of young children and the second is the deployment of finite resources. All of us are born unable to walk and all healthy children require supervision and guidance for a few years to make use of their walking ability. There is a case, therefore, to place a lower age limit on mobility allowance.

The assessment of walking ability involves difficult judgments. Children acquire walking ability from 10 months upwards, but it may be difficult to pinpoint an age below five at which one could make a simple and dispassionate judgment about walking ability. I quote the words of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) when he was introducing the allowance in a debate in 1975. He said:

"very young children are given mobility help whether able-bodied or disabled."

The choice of age five represents the judgment of successive Governments on where it is reasonable to draw the line. To reduce the lower age limit—or to abolish it—would cost several million pounds. All decisions to spend money are a matter of competing priorities—more money here means less money to spend elsewhere. The cost of reducing or abolishing the lower age limit for mobility allowance might well be a lower priority for social security spending than some of the other measures that have already been introduced by the Government specifically to help families with young, disabled children.

Mr. Nellist: I am grateful for a second opportunity to intervene. Does not the Minister have a sense of déjà vu? She reminded the House that she served on the same Committee as I was on. We got the same arguments about the attendance allowance and the need to wait until two years before one could assess whether a disabled baby would need the additional help of the attendance allowance. My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, East (Mr. Patchett) has given a family case in his constituency. We are talking about people about whom doctors say that, from an early age, their parents will have many problems in trying to cope. If the children were put into the care of local authorities, or of a hospital, we should be talking not about £30, £50 or £60 a week, but about £150, £200 or £250 a week of the nation's resources to look after them. Cannot the Minister see that this is the same argument as we got on the attendance allowance?

Mrs. Shephard: I certainly have a sense of déjà vu. To quote again from the right hon. Member for Wythenshawe, he said:

"we are trying to spread the finite resources as equally and as well as we can.—[Official Report, 11 June 1975; Vol. 893, c. 503.]

I could not put it better than the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East when he says that there is a sense of déjà vu.

Mr. Patchett: On assessment, I recognise the Minister's argument to a certain extent. However, surely we are speaking about cases that are confirmed and that require hospital treatment. That means that transport is needed. I thought that the intention of the mobility allowance was to assist couples with the problem of transport. The issue of assessment does not come into it when it can be confirmed, by doctors and from medical evidence, that the cases require hospital treatment and, therefore, transport, which the children would get if they were five years of age. As I said earlier, I do not follow the logic of saying that the cost of petrol for the journey to the hospital is negligible when, if the children were five years of age they would have some assistance. I am arguing about confirmed cases.

Mrs. Shephard: I understand that the hon. Gentleman feels strongly about these particular cases, as everybody would. However, I have tried to demonstrate that that particular family and others in a similar position are given extra resources to meet the extra needs of those children when they are very young through the attendance allowance and through other help such as income support and invalid care allowance, which I have already outlined. That is the way in which the extra needs are provided for financially through the social security system.

We have, of course, extended the upper age limit for the payment of mobility allowance from 75 to 80—because the oldest recipients were due to reach the original upper limit. The extension was an interim measure introduced while we were considering the findings of the OPCS surveys of disabled people. I do not want to belittle the concern for the family that the hon. Member for Barnsley, East feels, but I must remind him of my earlier quotation from the OPCS survey about the level of extra expenditure for disabled children. I have tried to illustrate the fact that the expenditure that the survey found necessary is far exceeded by what is given through attendance allowance and through the other allowances available through income support.

Let me say something about the other responses to the OPCS surveys and about "The Way Ahead", the basis for the Government's new structure for benefits for disabled people. Mobility and attendance allowance are to be subsumed by the new disability allowance. I believe that I am right in saying that the hon. Member for Barnsley, East has a copy of "The Way Ahead". He will therefore have seen that, while we intend to remove altogether the upper limit of 80 for the payment of mobility allowance when that allowance is incorporated in the disability allowance, we do not have any plans to extend the age limit downwards.

In the past 10 years, we have spent a great deal on developments for disabled people. The proposals that we outlined in "The Way Ahead", along with the changes that we announced last October, will add about £300 million to our expenditure on benefits for the long-term sick and disabled by 1993. We estimate that about 850,000 people will receive extra help.

In addition to the extension of the upper age limit for the mobility allowance from 75 to 80, we further extended the allowance in the changes that we announced last October. We introduced special arrangements from last

[Mrs. Shephard]

April to help deaf-blind people who need to be accompanied when they are out of doors because of their dual handicaps. We have estimated that that change will help about 3,000 people, including quite a large number of children.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): I greatly appreciate the benefits that are already available to such unfortunate families. But surely the main reason for the debate is this. The two children to whom my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, East (Mr. Patchett) referred are aged four. What is the difference between taking two children aged four to hospital and taking two children aged five to hospital? There is none, and some families might find it extremely difficult to purchase a motor vehicle to transport their children without the mobility allowance. If we accept that the mobility allowance is necessary, should not we reduce the lower age limit? I realise that there are financial constraints, but I should have thought that only a small amount would be required to reduce the age from five to two.

Mrs. Shephard: I appreciate the concern of the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) who often takes part in debates on disability and who speaks with much knowledge of families with such difficulties.

I had hoped that I had made the position clear. We are faced with a combination of the difficulty of assessing young children for mobility allowance, given that they would anyway need some help in being mobile and the lack of resources. That was stated clearly by the right hon. Member for Wythenshawe when mobility allowance was introduced. I cannot put it better than the right hon. Gentleman, who said that there were two constraints—the difficulty of assessing young children and the question of finite resources.

All the hon. Members who have spoken have given a sympathetic account of their concern for young children with disabilities. I hope that I have tried to express the Government's concern and the ways in which we have tried to help families with disabled children with the undoubted extra expenses that they incur as a result of having disabled children.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mrs Shephard: I think that I am an hon. Lady, but I shall certainly give way.

Mr. McKay: I am sorry. It must be my bifocals.

Surely the Minister's argument about why the age limit cannot be reduced from five falls when we consider that the allowances given to children at the age of three are also given to children aged four, five and six. At five an additional allowance, the mobility allowance, is available. Is the Minister trying to tell us that the assessment arrangements and the ability of people to assess have not changed since 1974?

Mrs. Shephard: No, of course I am not saying that. I am saying that perhaps children have not particularly changed since 1974. I refer the hon. Gentleman to the debate that took place at that time and the right hon. Member for Wythenshawe stated then that he thought that school age was about the right age at which to set the mobility allowance.

However, all Opposition Members tonight, including those wearing bifocals, which is obviously a particular handicap in recognising Members on the other side of the House, have demonstrated their sympathy for disabled children. I have tried to explain the network of provision that we are trying to extend through social security to families with a disabled child.

I have explained how the allowances have been brought in, slightly changed and increased. It might be worth while stating that over the past 10 years expenditure on the long-term sick and disabled has risen by £4 billion in real terms. There has been an increase of 98 per cent. in those receiving invalidity benefit; an increase of 77 per cent. in those receiving non-contributory disability benefits; a 200 per cent. increase in those receiving attendance allowance; and a 547 per cent. increase in those receiving mobility allowance.

I recognise that the line that I am taking is a disappointment to the hon. Member for Barnsley, East because I know that he feels strongly about this particular case. I just want to remind him of the improvements that we have been able to make and I thank him again for making such a serious and responsible presentation of his case to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at seven minutes past Twelve o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

Steel Industry

1. Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next expects to meet representatives of trade unions in the Scottish steel industry to discuss the future of steel in Scotland.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): I met representatives of the Ravenscraig trade unions on 11 October. My hon. Friend the Minister for industry and local government met representatives of the Dalzell trade unions on 15 October. I am prepared to meet them again as occasion demands.

Mr. Robertson: The Secretary of State will be aware of the deep and passionate concern in Lanarkshire not only among the trade unions but throughout the community about the future of Ravenscraig and Dalzell. We want to know whether, at yesterday's meeting with the chairman of British Steel plc, he received answers to the questions put by the shop stewards at Ravenscraig, which he undertook to put at any meeting that he had with Sir Robert. Did he receive any answers to those questions? Did he receive any assurances from British Steel about co-operation with the Scottish Development Agency inquiry into the Scottish steel industry? What confidence can the people of Scotland have in any assurances given by British Steel, given its past record and the contemptuous way in which it has treated the Secretary of State for Scotland?

Mr. Rifkind: With regard to the representations of the trade unions, I did as I undertook when I met Mr. Brennan and gave Sir Robert the detailed questions to which he and his colleagues wished answers. I put to Sir Robert the utility of trying to respond to those questions as much as he felt able to do. With regard to British Steel's attitude to the SDA study, in response to my representations Sir Robert Scholey said that British Steel would co-operate with the Scottish Development Agency study on the prospects for the steel industry in Scotland. He further said that he intended to have a meeting with Sir David Nickson, chairman of the Scottish Development Agency, to discuss that matter. Sir Robert gave me a full assurance that British Steel would not dismantle or remove any plant from the hot strip mill in advance of its proposed closure next April.

Dr. Bray: Will the Secretary of State invite British Steel to join the Government, perhaps other steel companies and the European Commission in a study of the treatment of Ravenscraig as a development plant for the introduction of the next generation of new technology, which is more efficient and produces higher quality steel, including thin-slab casting? Is he aware that that is within the policies of the steel strategy of the European Community, his research and development strategy, his energy policies and his environmental strategy and that it would qualify for state aid under the European Community state aids regime?

Mr. Rifkind: I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's interest in this suggestion, because he has raised it in the past. I hope that British Steel will fully consider any proposals, including that mentioned by the hon. Gentleman, to find out whether this is a potential project which should attract investment by British Steel and get support from a wider circle.

Mr. Devlin: Will my right hon. and learned Friend tell the trade unions that the long-term viability of the steel industry can be guaranteed only if decisions on future investment are made for valid commercial reasons and not for political reasons? Will he tell the trade unions that the most commercially competitive and productive plant in this country is at Teesside and that it would be a tragedy to dismantle it because of the political machinations of the Labour party in Scotland?

Mr. Rifkind: I cannot comment on the details involving the Teesside plant, to which my hon. Friend understandably referred, given his constituency interest. I think that there is now agreement on both sides of the House that the steel industry's future must be decided on commercial grounds. When I met the trade unions, they emphasised their view that commercial considerations should apply. Of course, there must be a debate on what the commercial conclusions should lead to and on whether one should argue in favour of Ravenscraig or against it. Naturally, we in the Scottish Office hope that British Steel will fully take account of the commercial case for investment not simply at Ravenscraig but at Dalzell.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that, in effect, the meeting yesterday between himself and the chairman of British Steel was a meeting between two private citizens, because the right hon. and learned Gentleman has effectively given up his ability to influence British Steel's decisions in spite of Ravenscraig's commercial viability? Can he tell the House when the SDA's study on the future of the steel industry in Scotland is likely to be available and whether it is likely to be available in sufficient time to contribute to reversing this disastrous decision?

Mr. Rifkind: If the hon. Gentleman, on behalf of the Liberal party, is calling for the renationalisation of the steel industry—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Well, unless that is what he is doing, he exposes the bankruptcy and double standards of his earlier question. We expect the preliminary conclusions of the SDA's study to be available by Christmas and final conclusions early in the new year. On that basis, I am particularly pleased that British Steel is to co-operate with the study. Obviously, there will be limits with regard to commercially confidential information. It is important to note that British Steel will co-operate with the study, that Sir Robert will discuss the study with Sir David Nickson and that no irreversible action will be taken on the plant until the study's conclusions are known and can be taken into account.

Steel Industry

2. Dr. Reid: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to meet the chairman of British Steel to discuss the Scottish steel industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: I met the chairman of British Steel yesterday when we discussed matters relevant to the steel industry in Scotland.

Dr. Reid: British Steel's commitment to co-operate with the SDA's study and the guarantee that the hot strip mill will not be dismantled, destroyed, cannibalised or removed before the study's completion are two steps forward, and it would be churlish of me to say otherwise.

However, can the right hon. and learned Gentleman give an assurance that British Steel will be more co-operative with the SDA in supplying information on Ravenscraig than it has been up to now with him? Given the rumours that now constantly sweep the Scottish steel industry, can the right hon. and learned Gentleman confirm that the works that were not mentioned—the Clydesdale tubes plant at Bellshill, were on the agenda for discussion yesterday? Can he give me a categorical assurance that he was given no information by the chairman of British Steel that would indicate an imminent or serious threat to the Clydesdale tubes works?

Mr. Rifkind: I asked Sir Robert about the Clydesdale works and he was not able to give me any decisions or conclusions reached by British Steel. He emphasised the difficult position faced by the seamless tubes sector and indicated, as has been said publicly in the past, that British Steel was looking for ways of identifying a possible future for at least part of that project. I do not conceal from the hon. Gentleman my concern about that plant's future, for reasons with which the House is familiar.

Like the hon. Gentleman, I welcome the willingness to co-operate with the SDA's study and particularly the agreement not to dismantle any part of the plant in advance of the study's conclusions. Clearly, part of the purpose of the SDA study is to seek to identify commercial opportunities for the steel industry in Scotland. It ought to be relevant for British Steel to wish to co-operate with that effort and with the report's conclusions if such opportunities are identified.

Sir Hector Monro: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is inexplicable that such a highly profitable company should refuse to give a coherent reason for the closure of the hot strip mill? How can we possibly test the commercial judgment of British Steel if we cannot have the facts on which it has based its decision?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is correct, and it is for precisely that reason that I and others have said that we cannot say whether the conclusion reached by British Steel is or is not justified. Clearly, one would have to have access to the information before one could be expected to agree or comment in any detail on the commercial judgment of British Steel.

Mr. McAvoy: In supporting all that my hon. Friends have said about the Scottish steel industry, may I ask the Secretary of State whether he is aware of the contribution made to that industry by the highly skilled work force at Clydebridge and Cambuslang in my constituency? Will the Secretary of State undertake to ensure that Clydebridge is also high on the agenda for his discussions with the British Steel chairman?

Mr. Rifkind: Yes. I can confirm that we are equally concerned with all employees and all aspects of the steel industry in Scotland. The SDA study does not concern itself with only one plant; its authors have deliberately and expressly been asked to consider the prospects for the steel industry in Scotland as a whole and that includes the plant to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

Mr. Holt: May I advise my right hon. and learned Friend that, since his meeting yesterday with the chairman of British Steel, the board of British Steel has met? I have been in contact with the company, which has assured me that its expansion plans and other works on Teesside will go ahead, that it is not being influenced by the Scottish lobby on this matter and that the expansion of jobs in my constituency—which no Labour Member in the north-east of England has tried to defend—will go ahead.

Mr. Rifkind: Clearly, those are matters for British Steel. I do not believe that it is helpful for any part of the United Kingdom to seek to achieve benefits at the expense of any other. We are all seeking to achieve a healthy steel industry in the United Kingdom as a whole, and I believe that all my hon. Friends will share that view.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Has the Secretary of State had the misfortune to read the ill-informed, sloppy and uninviting academic report that describes Coatbridge as one of the worst towns in the whole of Britain? Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman accept that this once-proud iron burgh is still suffering from the fact that the iron and steel masters, having made their money, have pulled out? Will he ensure that other towns do not have the same experience, especially at a time when steel is as competitive as it is today?

Mr. Rifkind: Many towns—it is perhaps true of every town in the United Kingdom—have had, at some time in their history, to adapt to new industrial requirements and the changing patterns of industry. I have no doubt that the genius and ability of the people of Coatbridge will enable them to cope with the effects of any difficulties that they have experienced in recent years and to attract new industry, employment and prosperity for those who have the good fortune to live in the town.

Mr. Sillars: Is the Secretary of State aware that the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) has managed to give us much more information about British Steel's investment than the right hon. and learned Gentleman has? Is he aware of his responsibilities to the Scottish people? Is he further aware that one cannot talk about the future of the Scottish steel industry without reference to what is happening on Teesside? Did he ask the chairman of British Steel about the foundation already laid for the pipe mill at Hartlepool, and is he aware of the link, through the pipe mill, to a single plate mill strategy? Is he aware that if that goes to Lackenby, it will be at the expense of Dalzell? Did he ask those questions? What was the response?

Mr. Rifkind: I have two things to say in response to the hon. Gentleman. First, the bulk of our discussions was about the prospects for the steel plants in Scotland. I raised with Sir Robert the claim that I believe was made by the hon. Gentleman at the end of last week that he was privy to information that the decision on the Dalzell plate mill would be delayed for two years. I regret to say that I was informed that the hon. Gentleman's allegation was, as usual, complete nonsense.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: Having heard that Coatbridge is allegedly the worst place in which to live, is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that Perth and Kinross has been adjudged the place with the highest quality of life and the best place to live in Scotland—no doubt because of its representation?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. and learned Friend's most excellent representation of that worthy borough and county at least in part explains his reputation with the nation as a whole.

Mr. Dewar: Does the Secretary of State agree that it is little consolation for the stewards at Ravenscraig to be told that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has urged upon Sir Robert the utility of responding as far as he is able to do to their questions? Is not it time that the Secretary of State delivered his promises, got to the facts and forced British Steel to come clean about the reasons behind the decision to close the strip mill?

However, may I welcome what the right hon. and learned Gentleman has said about British Steel not dismantling or removing any plant from the strip mill in advance of the report commissioned by the Scottish Development Agency? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman make it clear that there will be no removal of any plant before the publication of the report and before a proper assessment of its findings? I ask him to clarify that, because his earlier answer stated that there would be no removal in advance of the proposed closure, which is a very different circumstance. We want a guarantee that there will be no removal until the report is available and has been assessed. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman guarantee that, when the report is available, he will be prepared to meet Sir Robert Scholey and to go to battle on behalf of the Scottish steel industry if the report reaches positive conclusions about its future which, I am sure, is what all hon. Members hope?

Finally, does the right hon. and learned Gentleman remember that on 16 May when he first dealt in the House with the proposed closure of the strip mill, he deplored the decision and its implications for the work force and pledged:

"we shall seek to persuade British Steel to reconsider its proposal".—[Official Report, 16 May 1990; Vol. 172, c. 887.]

Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman still trying to do that?

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, I certainly am. On the hon. Gentleman's earlier point, I have no doubt that it will be desirable for me to see Sir Robert again in the next few weeks or months, depending on how matters develop.

I have two points in response to the hon. Gentleman's other questions. First, the categorical assurance that Sir Robert gave me was that there would be no dismantling of the plant or of any part of it before the proposed closure in April next year. Secondly, however, Sir Robert also stated his intention to co-operate with the SDA study. I would find it inconceivable—[HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"] I am answering the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). I would find it inconceivable that British Steel would wish to take any action that would be inconsistent with the proper consideration of the conclusions that that study might reach. We expect the study to come to its preliminary conclusions by December of this year and that will give an early opportunity at least to consider the general conclusions, proposals or ideas. There will be further opportunities early next year. That matter will need to be dealt with in the spirit as well as the letter of the assurance that was received from Sir Robert Scholey.

Mr. Speaker: I allowed a long run on that important matter, but we must now move on more rapidly.

Council Houses

3. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many council houses have been sold to sitting tenants in Scotland since May 1979.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): Since April 1979 more than 210,000 public sector houses in Scotland have been sold to sitting tenants. Included in this figure are more than 147,000 sales by local authorities. Owner-occupation now amounts to 50 per cent. of the total number of houses in Scotland.

Mr. Knox: Does my hon. Friend expect that the extension of the rents-into-mortgages scheme to local authority tenants, which was announced last week, will result in a significant increase in home ownership in Scotland?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Yes, I certainly do. In the course of time eligibility will be open to 320,000 local authority tenants—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Griffiths) is putting up five fingers. I must point out that ten times as many as that will have bought their homes under the trial scheme by the end of the month and that there will be 200 by the end of March. In the first year of the right to buy only 10 Scottish special housing association tenants bought; it takes time for the process to gather momentum.

The average weekly payment under the rents into mortgages scheme will be about £18 and the average weekly council rent is £20·89, so this is a very good opportunity for those in a position to afford it.

Mr. McAllion: Has the Minister read the copy of the Dundee house conditions survey that was recently given him? Did he fully comprehend the awful state of housing that it describes? Eighteen thousand council houses are riddled with damp and condensation; 15,000 require urgent repairs; 4,000 require whole window replacement. Will he get it into his skull and into the skulls of all his fellow Ministers that rents into mortgages do nothing to alleviate these Dickensian housing conditions? Will he therefore undertake to send a loud and clear message to the Treasury that what is required is massive new investment in the housing stock across Scotland? If Ministers are not prepared to fight Scotland's corner they must move aside for those of us in the Opposition who are.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In the past Dundee district council was taking more than a year to process council house sales. If it had processed them more quickly it would have received considerably more funds for its public sector stock. I am also advised that this year we increased net public expenditure for housing by about £40 million as compared with last year as a result of the drop in right-to-buy receipts. We shall consider the representations made to us by the hon. Members for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) and for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) in the final allocations that will be made later this year.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my hon. Friend agree that the failure of Dundee council to run its housing stock is an argument for encouraging more owner-occupation and a smaller public sector, not a larger one? Would he like to suggest that Dundee corporation sorts out its problems instead of running an independent foreign policy, linked as it is with Nablus on the west bank of Israel?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I strongly agree that home ownership is an aspiration of a large number of Scots who do not have the opportunities now, and I believe that they will have them in future. I also suggest that authorities such as Dundee, which I shall visit again shortly with the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion), would be well advised to do what they are doing—to work closely with housing associations, and to explore all the possibilities, including the possibility of using its land bank—this applies to authorities that have land banks—[HON. MEMBERS: "They are doing it."] I am glad to hear that.

Constitutional Status

4. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has had in the current year regarding the constitutional status of Scotland within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Rifkind: Nineteen letters regarding the constitutional status of Scotland have been received during the current year.

Mr. Wallace: Will the Secretary of State also tell us when he expects to receive the report commissioned by leading Conservative business men in Scotland on the future government of Scotland? In the meantime will he take some time to look at the experience of West Germany where, over many years, decentralised powers and administration have gone hand in hand with business and economic success?

Mr. Rifkind: The first part of the hon. Gentleman's question appears to refer to a newspaper report in The Scotsman, which referred to certain business men, who were not named, who had asked an academic, who was not referred to, to produce a report that no one had requested. It is an interesting bit of newspaper speculation, which, as far as I am aware, has no foundation in truth.

The hon. Gentleman will know that the West German experience bears no relation to the proposals put forward either by the Labour party or by the so-called constitutional convention, which wants to create unilateral devolution with an assembly in Scotland but no significant or fundamental change in the rest of the United Kingdom. That would create the dangers and the additional level of taxation that would be so damaging to Scottish prosperity.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the people of Scotland are right to regard the conclusions of the so-called self-appointed constitutional convention with complete boredom and indifference? Would not it be better to pay full heed to the opinions of leading business men such as Mr. Ewan Marwick of the Association of Scottish Chambers of Commerce who has consistently opposed devolution in the light of his outstanding personal knowledge of business and industry in the west of Scotland, including Paisley?

Mr. Rifkind: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend about the important contribution to the debate made by Mr. Marwick and his colleagues. My hon. Friend asked about the constitutional convention. I hope that in one respect people in Scotland will not treat the views and recommendations of the so-called convention with boredom or indifference. It is important for the public to be aware that that convention and the Labour party are proposing that the people of Scotland, under such an assembly, should be subject to an additional level of income tax which would not be paid in any other part of the United Kingdom. The damage to Scottish jobs and prosperity which would result from that would be devastating for the future of Scotland.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: If the Secretary of State is so concerned about the people of Scotland, why is he so rigid in his opposition to the idea that people should have the right democratically to express through a referendum their views on Scotland's constitutional future? Given that his party has one stance, that the constitutional convention is bringing forward a devolution package and that my party supports the idea of independence in Europe, does he not think that there should be an opportunity for the Scots to have a choice on these matters? Is it the case that, like the Prime Minister who is afraid to debate constitutional matters in relation to Europe, the right hon. and learned Gentleman is just a big fearty on Scottish constitutional matters?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Lady is unwise to draw such a conclusion, because she will be aware that her party and mine declined to take part in the so-called convention precisely because we believe that talking shops of that kind are unlikely to be of any practical benefit to people. She will also be aware that the nationalist proposal for a referendum has had very little support from other political parties or from other expressions of opinion with interests in constitutional matters. It has been seen as a slogan by her party with little else to commend it.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that if Scotland wishes to remain part of the United Kingdom, and all the indications are that it does, any change in its unique constitutional position would have to be agreed and accepted by this House and by the other place before such change could be implemented? Any attempt to persuade the people of Scotland about measures that would never get through the House must be either flawed or fraudulent or both.

Mr. Rifkind: What my hon. Friend says was the experience of the last Labour Government. It is right that all the citizens of the United Kingdom should take an interest in these matters. Apart from anything else, there are several hundred thousand if not millions of Scots living in England. Under the SNP proposals they would become foreigners in the country in which they are presently our fellow citizens. The people of Scotland are well aware that the United Kingdom as a nation has existed for almost 300 years and that the proposals of those who seek fundamental constitutional change would cause serious damage.

Mr. Dewar: Is not it a mark of the Government's desperation that when they look for an independent authority to quote on this issue they come up with an inexperienced parliamentary candidate, Mr. Marwick? If the concept of what the Secretary of State is pleased to call unilateral devolution is so objectionable in principle, why did the right hon. and learned Gentleman resign Front Bench office in the Conservative party over its failure to support what was a unilateral scheme? Does he agree that it is silly to spread daft scare stories about well-thought-out constitutional convention schemes which would give a greater say to Scots over Scottish affairs within the framework of the United Kingdom and which command widespread public support? Does he not realise that in so doing he sounds every day a little more like the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth), and that that is doing his reputation no good at all? The Secretary of State managed to make the report in The Scotsman sound like an everyday chapter from life in Chester street at Scottish Conservative party headquarters. Does he not recognise that a growing concern is clearly surfacing about the totally negative attitude of the Conservative party to the government of Scotland? The Conservatives really must make some bid in this field if they are to retain any credibility at all.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is in danger of trivialising a serious issue by the nature of his question. The House will have noted with some interest that the one remark to which he did not respond was the clear and unmistakable proposition from his party that Scotland will be saddled with an additional level of income tax as a result of the proposals for a Scottish assembly. The failure of the so-called convention to address itself to the serious implications for the Scottish economy and Scottish jobs requires us to treat its conclusions with contempt and indifference.

Health Boards

5. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will increase the funding of health boards in Scotland.

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Mr. Michael Forsyth): Yes, additional allocations will be made to health boards to take account of the changes in the VAT rules affecting construction. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be delighted to welcome today's announcement of £150,000 towards establishing cochlear ear implant operations and surgery within Lothian district.

Mr. Griffiths: I welcome that drop in the ocean. Will the Minister acknowledge what everyone else in Scotland and in Lothian knows—that when it comes to choosing between creating patient choice or cutting patient services, the Government will cut services every time? When 14,000 patients at the Longmore hospital exercised their choice by expressing their wish that that world-famous hospital be kept open, the Secretary of State backed its disgraceful closure. In view of the incompetent handling of that issue by Lothian health board, will the Minister and the Secretary of State intervene and save Longmore?

Mr. Forsyth: Only the hon. Gentleman could complain about cuts in services in response to an announcement of a new service being established in Lothian. To describe as a drop in the ocean a service which will enable deaf people to hear is symptomatic of the hon. Gentleman's approach to the health service.

The hon. Gentleman said that Longmore is to be closed, but he knows that the service that it provides in terms of breast cancer treatment will continue at the Western general hospital at a unit in which £2 million is to be invested by the health board. That will bring the facility into a hospital where there is an oncology department, with the result that the service to patients will be improved.

It is unworthy of the hon. Gentleman to misrepresent the splendid efforts of Lothian health board to improve services for his constituents throughout its area. The hon. Gentleman delivered a letter about Longmore hospital to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State, under the gaze of the cameras, but we did not receive the letter until two days later because he left the Department and posted it. Therefore, he may be unaware of the background, but he should pay tribute to the efforts that Lothian health board has made in respect of Longmore.

Mr. Strang: Does the Minister appreciate that an important element of the chronic underfunding of the health service in Lothian is the inadequate money allocated to it to tackle our AIDS problem? Is he aware that around one twelfth of the people identified as HIV positive in the United Kingdom are in Lothian but that the district receives less than 1 per cent. of the total budget for the United Kingdom, that the short-stay drug crisis centre has been postponed because of lack of money, that there is no long-term residential resettlement centre and that the cost of dealing with people with AIDS and those who are HIV positive will double every year from now on? When will the Government give us the money that we need?

Mr. Forsyth: I know that the hon. Gentleman follows these matters carefully, so he will know that the sum provided for AIDS care in Scotland is £15 million. I believe, from memory, that the share that Lothian receives is £5 million, the bulk of it going to the new unit to provide care for AIDS patients. He needs to distinguish between HIV-positive cases and cases of AIDS. He will be aware that the planning which has gone on in Glasgow, Dundee and Lothian towards provision for AIDS patients has taken account of projected numbers, and we have committed ourselves to providing the necessary resources.

Mr. Ian Bruce: What is the comparison between the funding of Scottish health boards and of English and Welsh health boards? Has my hon. Friend's Department any information about the efficiency with which that money is being used in terms of how it is translated into patient care?

Mr. Forsyth: It is well known that the Scottish health service is better funded than the health service south of the border—for example, by about one third in its hospital services. One of the interesting points about the proposal by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) for the funding of a Scottish assembly is his argument for the principle of equalisation. The health service in Scotland spends twice as much as the health service south of the border on care for the elderly. In the south, that burden lies with local government—yet local government in Scotland still spends more than local government in the south. My hon. Friend was right to draw attention to the considerable investment in the health service in Scotland.

Housing Survey

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to publish the report of the Scottish housing conditions survey; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The results of the national house condition survey will be published in the summer of 1993.

Mr. Hogg: Is not it true that the report is not being published because it would harm the Government's prospects in the general election, because the Minister is ashamed of what it will reveal about disrepair and dampness in Scottish housing, leading to a crisis of homelessness, and because he will not make available the necessary funds properly to house the people of Scotland?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The physical survey of the sample dwellings will take place before the social survey of occupants. The two sets of data necessarily need to be compiled before the statistical analysis is conducted. It is not possible to publish the physical survey results in advance of the social survey, and all the results need to be considered as a whole. Unfortunately, an earlier publishing date is not feasible. The reporting timetable is customary for surveys of such complexity. The national house condition survey is not a substitute for local surveys, which I strongly urge all local authorities to carry out.

Mrs. Fyfe: Does the Minister recall that Glasgow district council carried out a local survey several years ago, but the Government have taken no action on it? Although Glasgow has the highest allocation, it still has nothing like the amount of resources that it requires.

As the survey will take the best part of three years, will the Minister undertake to visit some of the bad housing areas, such as those in my constituency, so that he can see the damp-ridden houses? He should not come to Maryhill only to open pretty, new housing estates.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Lady must be aware that I have visited 52 district councils in Scotland and have seen their housing stock. I have been to the hon. Lady's constituency several times. Although I opened a new housing project, she must appreciate that it is not possible to visit her constituency without seeing other sorts of housing. I have seen plenty of examples of damp housing. I stress that what goes into Glasgow's housing plan will be very important and will be fully taken into account before allocations are made.

On the point about local surveys, the hon. Lady is aware that Scottish Homes is spending considerable sums of money in Glasgow, and that almost £500 million has been spent by housing associations.

Transport Policy

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will formulate an integrated transport policy for Scotland.

Mr. Rifkind: The Government believe in a balanced transport policy, providing users with as much choice as possible between competing forms of transport.

Sir David Steel: Is the Secretary of State aware that during the summer an efficient Scottish transport network suffered two blows—first, the announcement by the Secretary of State for Transport that the new A1 motorway would stop short of the Scottish border and, secondly, the announcement by ScotRail that it is postponing the modernisation programme for its rolling stock due to lack of funding? When will the Scottish Office stand up to the Treasury?

Mr. Rifkind: The right hon. Gentleman seems unaware that there are two major projects for improving the A1. The dual carriageway will be extended first to Haddington and then beyond that to Dunbar. A steering group has been formed between the Scottish Office and the Department of Transport to determine what further improvements might be required.

The right hon. Gentleman must know that only 5,000 vehicles per day use the stretch of road between Dunbar and the border—one tenth of the amount of traffic using those parts of the A1 in the south that are to be upgraded under the announcement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

With the near completion of the east coast line British Rail is completing the biggest ever investment in that area, amounting to some £450 million on the electrification of the line between London and Edinburgh.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that electrification is not complete when it reaches Edinburgh, but should continue up the east coast to Aberdeen? Is my right hon. and learned Friend prepared to discuss with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport British Rail's investment criteria, which are related purely to a return on investment, not to a cost benefit analysis so that road and other forms of transport benefit? Secondly, in the light of the new situation affecting the price of fuels, will he discuss with British Rail and his right hon. Friend the relative costs of diesel and electric power?

Mr. Rifkind: I am familiar with the aspirations of people in the north-east to see the electrification of the east coast line extended from Edinburgh to Aberdeen, and British Rail's recently appointed project manager in Scotland is investigating whether further electrification can be justified. I appreciate that there is a debate about whether the criteria for a return on such investment are too strict or whether they are justified. If the use of taxpayers' funds is to be justified it is not unreasonable that British Rail should be expected to obtain a return on its investment and British Rail must take that into account. Debate on that issue will clearly continue for some time yet and I am glad that British Rail has not ruled out the electrification of that section of the line in the future.

Mr. Ron Brown: If the Secretary of State does not miss the bus at the next general election but makes a journey to the centre of Leith, he will find tenants demanding repairs to their properties which Scottish Homes, under the chairmanship of Sir James Mellon, is refusing to do.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Gentleman is on the wrong question. This one is about transport.

Mr. Wilson: May I assure the Secretary of State that the Government's anti-rail prejudices will be a major issue in Scotland, as elsewhere, in the run-up to the general election? What interest has the Scottish Office taken in the decision to postpone investment in the main west coast line from London to Glasgow? Will he tell us precisely what representations the Scottish Office has made in the past months on the disastrous proposal to abolish Speedlink freight services, thereby forcing large quantities of freight from rail, to which they had been drawn, back on to the roads? The Secretary of State for Transport said that he had not referred to electrification north of Edinburgh at the Tory party conference in answering Mr. Hirst's protestations because he could not change his autocue in time. Is the Secretary of State for Scotland capable of changing his autocue to give some backing to the expansion, modernisation and electrification of rail services in Scotland?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman should inform himself before he makes foolish accusations. If he suggests that the Government are against investment in the rail network, he is clearly unaware of the fact that the Government have authorised no less than £3,700 million investment by British Rail throughout the United Kingdom during the next three years, which is the largest railway investment that Britain has ever known. The fact that Scotland has already benefited from one of the largest electrification projects that the United Kingdom has ever known compounds the hon. Gentleman's foolishness in asking that question. As the hon. Gentleman knows, British Rail has not reached any conclusion on Speedlink. We are taking considerable interest in that matter and we are seeking to evaluate the implications in Scotland and elsewhere of implementing the proposal.

Local Government Finance

8. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities to discuss local government finance.

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Mr. Ian Lang): My right hon. and learned Friend last met the president and senior office bearers of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities on 6 July.

Mr. Ross: When the Minister met the president and office bearers, did he discuss with them the increasing difficulty that they and their members are encountering in encouraging people to pay their poll tax? Does he not realise that the inability of local government to draw blood from a stone by asking people living on poverty wages to pay a minimum of 20 per cent. is seriously challenging its ability to deliver services? Is it not time that he and his colleagues did away with the poll tax and started to deal with the serious underfunding from which local authorities have suffered for a number of years?

Mr. Lang: Part of the problem that local authorities have faced in collecting the community charge is the fact that so many Members of Parliament and councillors—in the Labour party and in other parties—have discouraged people from paying, thus leading them into considerable personal difficulty. In my view, they are embarking on a course of the highest irresponsibility. Despite that, however, authorities in Scotland now expect, on average, to collect some 95 per cent. of their budgeted targets. As the community charge accounts for only about one fifth of the total expenditure of local authorities, they will have about 99 per cent. of their total spend. In those circumstances, they should be able to meet the problem through prudent management of their spending.

Mr. Harris: Has my hon. Friend noticed that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) has moved from the Labour Benches to the Scottish National Benches? However, it does not matter——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Has this something to do with Scottish questions? The hon. Gentleman must relate his remarks to the question on the Order Paper.

Mr. Harris: It does not matter where an Opposition Member sits if that hon. Member engages in the irresponsible and reprehensible action of encouraging people not pay their community charge. That hits— [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is an experienced Member of the House, and he knows that he must ask a question and not make statements.

Mr. Lang: I had noticed that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) had moved from the Labour Benches to those of the Scottish National party. As he has moved from one socialist party to another, however, it is hard to tell the difference.

As for the attitude to the community charge, the most unfair and irresponsible posture for any party to adopt is to encourage people not to pay their fair share. The most unfair feature of all would be for those who have contributed to the cost of local services to be asked to pay the cost of those who have not. That is something that local authorities should not be asked to do.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: I think that I should call Mr. Dick Douglas.

Mr. Douglas: When the Secretary of State met COSLA, did he not say that local authorities in Scotland had fallen into the trap that he had laid for them? They are caught between a rock and a hard place. In the beginning, COSLA said that the tax was unworkable so why is it now trying to make it work by the most draconian means? I myself—and I have already been referred to—have been the subject of warrants of a dubious nature. Is it really in the mind of the Secretary of State to tell local authorities that to make the tax work they must get into the barbarous atmosphere and attitude of poinding and warrant sales? Should not the Minister go back to COSLA and say that he will review the scheme and take it away completely?

Mr. Lang: The vast majority of community charge payers have paid and are paying their community charge. The system of recovery available to local authorities is broadly the same as it was under the previous rating system. Those who are willing to ignore the irresponsible advice of politicians who tell people not to pay taxes, and are willing to pay their due to local authorities, will not have to fear the processes of recovery.

Mr. Maxton: When will the Minister stop using the rather foolish non-payment campaign being run by the Scottish National party as a shield behind which to hide and pretend that the poll tax is working? Does he not recognise that research shows that the vast majority of those who have not paid their poll tax simply cannot afford to pay it? The simple fact is that he could end the crisis tomorrow by abolishing the 20 per cent. rule, allowing a moratorium on rebates back to 1 April 1989 and improving the rebate system to make it much more generous. He must recognise that Scottish local authorities are facing a financial crisis as a result of the poll tax itself and not because a few people are foolishly not paying it.

Mr. Lang: If the hon. Gentleman is trying to tell me that Labour Members of Parliament and Labour councillors are refusing to pay their community charges because they cannot afford to do so, I have to tell him that I do not believe it. The vast majority of people have paid their community charge, and more than 1 million are eligible for a rebate, so account is taken of ability to pay. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman's irresponsible position explains why his party has inconceivably decided to go back to the even more unfair and most unacceptable payment of all, with a return to the old rating system.

National Health Service

9. Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met Scottish health board chairmen to discuss the national health service in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I met the chairmen of health boards on 29 June.

Mr. Ingram: It is unlikely that the Minister would have had an opportunity to discuss with them the report produced recently by the Institute of Manpower Studies, commissioned by the Scottish Office, which showed a worrying wastage rate among nurses because of the lack of opportunity to involve themselves in patient care and because of cuts in wage rates. Will the Minister discuss that report at his next meeting with board chairmen, which I hope will be in the not-too-distant future? Is not that report a damning indictment of 11 years of Tory policy and of the Government's attitude to the health service, which nurses are leaving in droves?

Mr. Forsyth: We are anxious to improve the opportunities for recruiting nurses and other staff to the health service. The hon. Gentleman will recognise, if he is fair, that since 1979 the number of nurses in the health service has increased substantially, as has their pay—by about one quarter in real terms. I confess that I have not read the report to which he refers, but I will do so and respond to the points that he made.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Will my hon. Friend confirm that one of the objectives of health service reform is to encourage greater public involvement and interest? In relation to the reform of local health councils, is my hon. Friend satisfied that in large areas such as Grampian there will be adequate representation of both rural and urban interests? Even rural interests can be very disparate. Will he re-examine local health council reorganisation to ensure that it will provide genuine local involvement?

Mr. Forsyth: My view, which is shared by Opposition spokesmen, is that in general it will be better to have one health council per health board, with the resources to operate as a strong organisation and on an equal footing. I shall be answering today a question tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) about the possibility, as suggested by my right hon. Friend the Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Buchanan-Smith), of having more than one health council per board.

There is nothing to prevent boards from proposing schemes which involve more than one health council, although our preference is for only one such council.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I was right. Withdraw the circular.

Mr. Forsyth: If the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) will allow me to answer my right hon. Friend's question, he may then catch your eye, Mr. Speaker.

Our preference is for health councils that are strong enough to represent the voice of the consumer effectively, but health boards may suggest schemes that provide for more than one health council, and they will be considered on their merits.

Mr. Galbraith: When the Minister next meets the chairmen of the health boards, will he discuss with the chairman of Greater Glasgow health board the continuing public utterances of his general manager, who only yesterday said that the national health service in Glasgow is "second class"? That same general manager recently issued a warning to his staff that if any of them publicly criticise the NHS in Glasgow, they will be summarily dismissed. In that, he included comments to Members of Parliament. Yet only yesterday, in the surroundings of the luxurious Gleneagles hotel, the same general manager deprecated the Greater Glasgow health board and its services, for which he personally is responsible. Why do we have such double standards, whereby the general manager can criticise the health service but the rest of the staff cannot? If the general manager can criticise, so can the rest of the staff.

Mr. Forsyth: It is the general manager's job to identify deficiencies in the health service and to put them right. I pay tribute to what Laurence Peterken has done in the health service. In Greater Glasgow health board, Lennox Castle, in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, was identified as a hospital in need of improvement by the general manager, and it has been transformed. In that speech, Lawrence Peterken was saying that it was no part of the business of the health service to continue with inadequate Victorian buildings and that we wanted an efficient service providing the highest standards of care. That is the Government's belief. Only a fool would argue that there are no problems in the health service. There are problems. The Government are the first to have tackled them for a very long time and have delivered a higher standard of patient care.

Cammell Laird (Sale)

3.30 pm

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I seek to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing an urgent and specific matter which should have immediate attention, namely,

"the proposed sale of Cammell Laird shipbuilders."

The matter is immediate because the proposed sale was announced this morning, and it is urgent because 2,000 jobs are at stake, and Birkenhead is already a black spot in the unemployment league table. If the closure takes place and a sale is not forthcoming, we shall be pushed towards the top end of that league table.

Moreover, it is also urgent because Cammell Laird is the very heart of Birkenhead and it is difficult to conceive of the town without its shipyard. The matter is urgent because Cammell Laird provides one of the great skill centres of Merseyside and if this country is to have an industrial future in the next century, it is important that those qualities are not squandered lightly.

The matter is also urgent because I wish the House to have the opportunity to show that it understands the worries, doubts and anxieties that my constituents in Birkenhead as well as people throughout Merseyside will feel today.

The matter is urgent because we wish to give the Government the opportunity to explain to the House what measures they propose to take to ensure that the sale is a success.

Lastly, the matter is urgent because, if there is no sale, this great shipyard will be closed.

While I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me this opportunity to stress the positive side of Cammell Laird to a wider audience, I believe that it is only in a full-scale debate that I and the House could do justice to what is now on offer and on sale. I want the House to take a resolution that it will not lightly allow that asset, those skills, those people and the dignity that they have shown through the years to be cast on to the unemployment scrap heap. For all those reasons, and not merely one of them, I seek to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter which he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the proposed sale of Cammell Laird shipbuilders."

I, too, listened to the news at lunchtime and I have listened with care to what the hon. Member has said about this important matter. However, as he knows, under Standing Order No. 20. I have to announce my decision without giving my reasons to the House. I have to decide whether his application comes within the Standing Order and whether a debate should take precedence over the business set down for today or tomorrow.

I regret that, in this case, the matter which he has raised does not meet those requirements and I cannot today submit his application to the House.

Points of Order

3.34 pm

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In today's vote bundle, my name appears in error against various early-day motions, including early-day motion 1398. I have received an apology from the Table Office. It intends to include a correction in tomorrow's corrigenda. My concern, and what I believe is a matter for you, is that early-day motions are read by people outside the House and are taken to be an accurate reflection of the views of those hon. Members who sign them. I am most concerned that my name should have been added to those motions. I very much hope that something can be done to improve the mechanism. I am particularly concerned about early-day motion 1398, because it is about Israel and the middle east. I believe that those who signed that early-day motion did so either because they are naive or because they are anti-semitic.

Mr. Speaker: I regret the mistake that was made. It may have arisen because of the number of hon. Members who bear the same name. However, the hon. Gentleman has put the matter right and that is probably the best way to deal with it.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On this point, and related matters, Mr. Speaker, although I know that you are not responsible for statements, you will know that the Foreign Secretary's visit to the middle east has produced a good deal of controversy on both sides of the House. I am wondering whether there is any way in which hon. Members can ensure that, when the Foreign Secretary returns to this country, there will be a statement. There is deep concern over what is happening in the middle east. Although the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) made derogatory references to a motion which I have not myself signed, that does not alter the fact that there is deep concern in the House over the killing of the 21 Palestinians.

Mr. Speaker: I share the hon. Gentleman's concern about that, as I think the whole House does, but he will have heard the Leader of the House's statement on Monday that he will take this matter into consideration.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry to prolong this, but I wonder whether you could clarify the exact situation relating to Standing Order No. 20. The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) asked for your leave to adjourn the House on a matter which for his constituency is, without a shadow of doubt, of cardinal and critical importance. In circumstances such as that, which affect Birkenhead and which, in other circumstances, might affect my own constituency, will you clarify for me exactly what scale and magnitude of disaster there has to be before an Adjournment debate can be granted on what is, for an ordinary Member of Parliament, a really desperate state of affairs?

Mr. Speaker: It is a friendly act by the hon. Member, but he will have heard me say that I am enjoined not to give my reasons to the House. However, I imagine that there are those outside the House who will be as interested as the hon. Member in what the criteria are. I have to take into consideration other opportunities that may arise and whether the matter is so urgent that it should take precedence over the business set down for today or tomorrow. These are very difficult decisions for the Chair. I hope that, as I said to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), the matter will be raised on another occasion.

BILL PRESENTED

HOMEWORKERS' RIGHTS

Mr. Keith Vaz, supported by Ms. Clare Short, Mrs. Alice Mahon, Mrs. Maria Fyfe, Mr. David Hinchliffe and Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, presented a Bill to extend to homeworkers certain rights afforded to employees by enactments relating to health and safety, employment protection and finance; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Tuesday 23 October and to be printed. [Bill 201.]

Orders of the Day

Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill [Lords]

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question proposed [16 October] on consideration of the Bill, as amended (in Standing Committee), That the clause (Supervised attendance orders as alternatives to imprisonment on fine default) be read a Second time.

'.—(1) A court may make a supervised attendance order in the circumstances specified in subsection (3) below.

(2) A supervised attendance order is an order made by a court with the consent of an offender requiring him—

(a) to attend a place of supervision for such time, being 10, 20, 30, 40, 50 or 60 hours, as is specified in the order; and

(b) during that time, to carry out such instructions as may be given to him by the supervising officer.

(3) The circumstances are where—

(a) the offender is of or over 16 years of age; and

(b) having been convicted of an offence, he has had imposed on him a fine which (or any part or instalment of which) he has failed to pay and either of the following sub-paragraphs applies—

(i) the court, prior to the commencement of this section, has imposed on him a period of imprisonment under paragraph (a) of subsection (1) of section 407 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975 (power of court, when imposing a fine, to impose also imprisonment on default) but he has not served any of that period of imprisonment;

(ii) the court, but for this section, would also have imposed on him a period of imprisonment under that paragraph or paragraph (b) of that subsection (power of court to impose imprisonment when a person fails to pay a fine or any part or instalment thereof); and

(c) the court considers a supervised attendance order more appropriate than the serving of or, as the case may be, imposition of such a period of imprisonment.

(4) Where, in respect of an offender, a court makes a supervised attendance order in circumstances where sub-paragraph (i) of paragraph (b) of subsection (3) above applies, the making of that order shall have the effect of discharging the sentence of imprisonment imposed on the offender.

(5) Schedule (Supervised attendance orders: further provisions) to this Act has effect for the purpose of making further and qualifying provision as to supervised attendance orders.

(6) In this section—

"local authority" means a regional or islands council;

"place of supervision" means such place as may be determined for the purposes of a supervised attendance order by the supervising officer; and

"supervising officer", in relation to a supervised attendance order, means a person appointed or assigned under Schedule (Supervised attendance orders: further provisions) to this Act by the local authority whose area includes the locality in which the offender resides or will be residing when the order comes into force.'.—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Question again proposed.

3.38 pm

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): I was going to say that I was in full flight—but perhaps that is a little grandiloquent, in view of what was happening at 10 o'clock last night—when these proceedings were brought to a close. However, I was certainly addressing the House, and I now rise with a certain feeling of nostalgia, because this is the last time that I shall start a session on the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill, which to me seems like an old friend. I cannot remember any other Bill to which the Opposition have made more changes or on which they have made more political progress. I doubt whether the Minister's memories of it will be quite so happy, but there we are.

The proposal that supervised attendance orders should be made is of real importance. As I explained last night, the new clause came as a surprise to me. I had not expected it, but I should be misleading the House if I were to suggest that I oppose it in principle.

I have some doubts—this is the point I had reached yesterday—about the basis of the Minister's argument. He explained that because, under clause 51(3), community service orders can be imposed only where the only genuine alternative would be a prison sentence, we will not reach the position that has commonly existed whereby community service orders were imposed in place of a large fine. With the new narrow interpretation of when it is appropriate to have a community service order, the number of large fines will increase, and therefore it is assumed that the number of non-payers will increase. As a result, there has to be some alternative to imprisonment for non-payment to stop our prisons being choked and clogged as they have been in the past.

I should have been happier if the Minister had said that the pressure—perhaps not spectacular pressure but in my case nagging pressure going back to the Criminal Justice Bill in 1981—to see whether there could be an alternative to imprisonment for non-payment of fines had been successful and was being adopted on its merits. The argument about clause 51(3) is esoteric and doubtful. After all, a high fine does not necessarily lead to high non-payment because, presumably, the instalments are set according to the payer's means. If the court is doing its business, there should be no greater risk of non-payment and the penalties that follow than for any other financial responsibility.

I take the view that supervised attendance orders as an alternative to imprisonment might be more appropriate for those who have failed to pay small fines. It is offensive and ridiculous for people who may have failed to pay a fine of £20 or £30 to find themselves doing seven or 14 days in prison to the disadvantage of the prison system. I am not impressed by the Minister's argument, but the reform he is introducing is useful in a modest way.

I have already said that I have argued for and still believe in the abolition of imprisonment as a punishment for non-payment of fines. I have done so for the past decade in this place. I was going to make a graceful reference to the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) but, unusually, he is not in his place during a debate on this Bill. During the proceedings on the Criminal Justice Bill in 1981, he gave me very strong support but expressed a doubt because he thought that there had to be an alternative penalty to just debt collection and diligence. We are now providing that. The Government have suddenly found that it is practical to do something in this way, and we should be thankful for that.

I want to ask one or two questions which I am sure the Minister will be able to answer. I recognise that the cost is to be fully reimbursed. As I understand it, in the year ending 31 March 1989, local authorities spent £3·2 million on community service orders, at an average cost per order —according to a parliamentary question—of £920. In that year, there were 3,492 orders. I asked a further parliamentary question on 11 June and was told that the total number of orders made in 1989 was not under 3,500 but had increased in that short time to 4,190. In other words, the number of community service orders is on a steeply rising curve. Obviously, that raises questions about the Government's expectations for the number of supervised attendance orders that will be made and the cost that that will place on the Exchequer.

The Minister must not get me wrong: I believe that the cost should be met 100 per cent. I have a letter from Professor Fred Edwards, the director of the Strathclyde regional work and social department. He is talking about an agreement whereby local authorities had to meet agreed standards for the quality and quantity of the work—that is, of community service orders—before receiving increased funding. Clearly an incentive was being built in to raise standards in order to attract increased funding. I assume that the same system will apply here. Perhaps the Minister will say a word about that.

It is important that the Minister comments on the form of supervision—this point has been made by my hon. Friend the experienced Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), who knows much about the social work world—and on how attendance sessions will be organised. We are told that they will be for between 10 and 60 hours, so, as an initial response to someone's conviction for a criminal offence, they will be shorter than community service orders. Of the 4,190 community service orders made in 1989, only 802 fell below 100 hours. I presume that some of the new supervised attendance orders will be as low as 10 or 20 hours, so clearly they will raise different practical problems.

I am not clear whether supervised attendance orders will be administered on a different basis from community service orders or whether people on attendance orders will mix and share activities with those performing community service. It may be a matter for the discretion of the local authority, but perhaps the Minister will say a word or two about that.

I notice that the briefing distributed by the Minister says that activities will be "provided in modular form". I am not clear what he means by that, but no doubt he will be able to wax earnest and learned on modular forms in supervised attendance orders.

Whom did the Minister consult? I have tried to find out from Strathclyde regional council—my regional council and social work authority—whether it was consulted before this innovation was introduced. I do not have a clear picture, but my impression is that, if there was consultation, it was cursory in the extreme, which suggests that it was introduced hurriedly. Was the Sheriffs Association consulted? Sheriffs will be involved in deciding supervised attendance orders. If it was consulted, what was its reaction and did it support the proposal?

Having asked these questions, I conclude briskly by making it clear that I welcome the proposal, so far as it goes. The prison system has been handicapped by the number of receptions of prisoners who were not sentenced to a custodial term but who ended up in prison because they failed to meet a monetary penalty. The figures for receptions are spectacular. In 1988, the last figures available to me and excluding remand prisoners, who would be a distorting factor, the number of admissions for default of payment of fines was 9,680, which is 47·1 per cent. of total admissions to the Scottish prison system.

That is a startling figure, but it probably will not startle many of my colleagues, because it is familiar to anyone who takes a passing interest in the prison system. I am aware that it is only just over 6 per cent. of the daily prison population, but the clogging of the system, the problems of reception, of administration and of processing the entry of a prisoner only for him or her to be discharged perhaps two or three weeks later causes enormous destruction to the proper work of the prison system.

I am concerned that the way in which the Minister presented this proposal was that its purpose is to stop the problem getting worse. He has argued that, because of the changes in the initial use of CSOs, which will lead to an increase in large fines, if we do nothing the number of receptions for non-payment, and the pressure on the prison system, will increase. I hope that he can be more positive. I hope that supervised attendance orders will have an impact that does not just stop the problem worsening but improves it. I hope that, after two or three years of experience, we might be in a position to say that that 47 per cent. figure of receptions for non-payment of fines had significantly decreased.

If the system works well, courts could be encouraged —I know that courts take individual decisions in individual cases—to use this alternative and to rid the prison system of at least a proportion of people, not just at the top of the fine scale but at the bottom end of this sad band of people who find themselves in prison for quite the wrong reason, to their distress, to the concern of their families and to the expense of the state. I am afraid that those people make it more difficult for the prison system to deal with those who, for reasons of public safety, must be imprisoned. It is a modest reform, but I hope that it is the start of better things.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): The Bill has many aspects. We are dealing now with a major issue in a piecemeal fashion. That has been one of the features of this Bill. The imposition and collection of fines are major issues, meriting a major inquiry to see where the problem really lies. I know from my mailbag and experience that it is not popular to say that a fine should relate more to the offender's ability to pay than to the crime committed. For many years in the Scottish courts, the fine imposed has related to the offence, not to the offender's ability to pay.

Some years ago, I went to Sweden to study the Swedish penal system. If there was one aspect that impressed me, it was the fact that, throughout my period there, not one person was imprisoned for failure to pay a fine. The reason is simple. In Scotland, a fair amount of research is carried out into an offender's background before the court sentences him or her to a first custodial sentence. In Sweden, extensive research is carried out into an offender's ability to pay a fine. Before a case comes to court, the presiding judge or magistrate knows exactly what the person can pay should he be found guilty and a fine be imposed. Payment is based on earnings and other aspects.

Having taken the trouble to investigate an offender's ability to pay, the Swedish authorities claim the right to collect the fine—a system which I favour. In Sweden, there are no supervised attendance orders or alternatives to paying a fine. Research is carried out and the fine relates not to the offence but to the person's ability to pay.

I make no criticism of the Government or of the Minister, because successive Governments—I take my share of the responsibility—have paid little attention to this aspect of court work. It makes no sense to fine a person £1,000 if he or she is on income support or to impose a fine that is way beyond a person's ability to pay, in the certain knowledge that the fine will not be paid. It would be more honest of a court to impose a prison sentence, because that would be the outcome in any case.

It is time that we all agreed that there must be a major inquiry into the operation of fines in the Scottish judicial system. In many ways, Scotland has led in terms of judicial and law reform, and we should all be proud of that. I am convinced that we can do the same in terms of the levying and payment of fines.

I cannot give the new clause a wholehearted welcome, because I regard it as a piecemeal approach to a major problem. Instead, I want to give it a qualified welcome and to ask the Minister one or two questions about it.

At present, when an offender fails to pay his fine and is sent to prison, he can buy himself out before his sentence is complete. There is a scale governing the length of the custodial sentence that a fine defaulter should serve, and that is determined against the background of the level of the fine. A fine defaulter who has failed to pay a £1,000 fine will serve longer than a defaulter who has failed to pay a £50 fine.

The Minister knows from experience that it is quite common for a fine defaulter to be imprisoned on Monday and for someone to go along and pay his fine on Tuesday morning. All the paperwork surrounding his reception in prison then has to be gone through again and his release arranged. Will a fine defaulter now be able to buy himself out of a supervised attendance order? Suppose that the order requires him to attend for the maximum period of 60 hours. Will he be able to buy himself out when he has completed 20 hours, and what will be the scale used? Clearly, we are not talking about the payment of the total fine, because the offender will have served a third of the supervised attendance hours specified in the order. The Minister must have some sort of scale in mind.

Who will decide whether the offender may buy himself out of the arrangement? How will we decide whether a fine defaulter should be asked to attend for 10, 20, 30, 40, 50 or 60 hours? Under the present arrangements under which a fine defaulter is sent to prison, scales are laid down. I may have missed the reference to such a scale in the new clause; that is not beyond me, I can assure the House. Is a scale to be specified for the proposed scheme? Unless we know what we are doing—unless social workers know in detail whether a fine defaulter can buy himself out—it seems inadvisable to proceed. We should not introduce the scheme until all the details have been put in place. If we introduce the scheme against a background of confusion, matters can only get worse and we shall find that we have added to the problem that we sought to solve.

My welcome for the new clause is qualified because, in my view, we are merely tinkering at the edges of what is now a major problem. We ought to consider other approaches. I urge the Minister to consider the establishment as soon as possible of a commission of inquiry to look into the whole question of levying fines according to the seriousness of the crime of which the offender has been found guilty rather than according to his ability to pay. If I were asked to choose, I would choose a system that related to the offender's ability to pay because if we had such a system, many of the other issues that we are discussing today would disappear.

4 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I promise to be brief, Mr. Speaker. Before asking the Minister a couple of questions about the new clause, may I, too, give it my qualified support? I recently attended a session of the sheriff court in Edinburgh when it was hearing a number of what are colloquially known as "means court" cases. One young man was sent down for 30 days for his failure to pay a fine, much to his deep dismay. Other young men—those appearing were mainly men—suffered the same fate. I should add that I was in good company—I was with Michael Clancy of the Scottish Law Society.

I thought that it was all a disgraceful waste and wondered why we should put that young man's family through such distress. He was bundled down below within 20 seconds of the sheriff making his nonchalant decision. Therefore, although I give the new clause some support, the Minister and his officials should further consider its implications.

I refer the Minister to subsection (2)(b), which states that the offender will "carry out such instructions as may be given to him by the supervising officer."

I believe that I am right in saying that, when answering an intervention from me yesterday evening, the Minister said that the supervising officer need not necessarily be a social worker. I am a little concerned about that. The Minister will recall that, in the explanatory memorandum that he sent to members of the Committee, he stated that, among others, we are referring to ex-drug abusers—those who have fallen by the wayside because of the misuse or abuse of drugs—and others. People who have unfortunately become addicted to drugs need to be supervised and need someone in the team who is highly experienced in such matters. As that rule must be applied to other offenders, I should like to hear the Minister offer a word or two about the non-social work supervisors, because I believe that he is straying into queer territory.

Similarly, the Minister needs to consult more comprehensively—or his officials need to consult more comprehensively—social work departments and voluntary associations whose main concern is the rehabilitation of offenders and those who have transgressed in terms of non-payment of minor fines. I should like to hear the Minister say something positive in response to my reservations on subsection (2)(b).

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I am as concerned as my colleagues about some of the things that go on in the minor courts. I agree wholeheartedly with my hon. Friends who have expressed some shock about the way in which young people are simply sent to prison casually and without much consideration.

I should like to ask the Minister a rather unpleasant question. I am not anti-lawyer, but I have a particular case in mind, which is known to my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) because it concerns Bo'ness, which I represented for many years.

Will the Minister make it an obligation on sheriffs and temporary sheriffs not to take any alcohol during the lunch hour? I once brought a case to the attention of the House, in which a police career was ruined—that of Sergeant Jamieson—by a temporary sheriff who had taken drink during the lunch hour and then took decisions that could not be undone. That case has lived with me and I suspect that the same has happened on a number of other occasions.

As we are on the subject, it might be a good idea if those on the bench took no alcoholic drink during their lunch hours.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): I have been encouraged to participate in the debate only following the remarks of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). For the record, I want to make it clear that I understand that there was an investigation by the then sheriff principal of the circumstances surrounding the case, and that no fault was found to attach to the sheriff concerned. The hon. Member for Linlithgow is perfectly entitled to raise the issue, but it is only right to put the record straight.

Mr. Dalyell: Does the hon. and learned Gentleman deny that the temporary sheriff concerned had taken alcohol during his lunch hour before coming to his decision?

Mr. Campbell: That is not within my knowledge——

Mr. Dalyell: It is within mine.

Mr. Campbell: What is within my knowledge is that an investigation was effected and no fault was found to attach to the sheriff.

Mr. Dalyell: Some of us thought it unfortunate that the sheriff concerned came to the decision that he did, and that the investigation was a matter of lawyers all getting together.

The Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I believe that the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) had an Adjournment debate on this subject some years ago——

Mr. Dalyell: Yes.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It would be rash of me to go into the case without researching all the facts, but I have heard what the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) has said, so I suspect that there are two sides to the issue, of which we have heard only one this afternoon. I shall look into the case.

I warmly welcome what the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) said——

Mr. Dalyell: Airline pilots, drivers, and many other people in skilled occupations are not supposed to drink alcohol in the course of their work, so is it unreasonable to suggest that those who take decisions affecting people's lives should do the same? Many other people are not supposed to drink at work; should not the same apply to those on the bench?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I approach the subject with some caution. If the hon. Gentleman were to table a motion suggesting that hon. Members should not take drinks before they participated in debates, I suspect that there would follow a heated debate in which different views would be expressed. I shall look at the facts of the case and come back to the hon. Gentleman in due course. It would certainly be wrong of me to give a judgment off the top of my head——

Mr. Dalyell: In my opinion, those who are going to take part in debates on the Floor of the House should not take alcohol before doing so.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I applaud the hon. Gentleman's high standards. All I am saying is that he would find this a contentious subject if he were to table a motion banning Members from drinking at lunchtime——

An Hon. Member: Or Speakers.

Mr. Speaker: Just for the record, I never do.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am glad to confirm that. I most certainly do not drink if I am about to speak in the House of Commons.

The hon. Member for Garscadden made a most positive speech; I agree with everyting that he said. The hon. Gentleman asked who was consulted. The Sheriffs Association, local authorities and other interested bodies were consulted. A letter was sent out in April and all the responses were in support of supervised attendance orders for fine default. The bodies consulted included the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, the Association of Directors of Social Work in Scotland, the Association of Chief Police Officers (Scotland), the Howard League for Penal Reform and the Scottish Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders. I am glad to say that they strongly supported the measure.

The hon. Member for Garscadden asked about modular form and the kind of supervision. The programmes will be organised in standard units. For example, there will be two-hour sessions on drug and alcohol misuse and two-hour blocks of unpaid work with groups of from eight to 12 offenders. There might be some sharing with people who do group placements on community service orders, but where practicable the two groups will be kept separate.

I was asked about national standards for supervised attendance orders. Standards will be drawn up in consultation with local authorities and others and funding will be conditional on standards being met. I was asked about the details. Guidelines will be drawn up and, as I said yesterday, a consultative group will be formed to look into these matters. It will include representation from local authorities, the judiciary and other relevant interests.

The hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) asked whether fine defaulters could buy themselves out of supervised attendance orders. I am glad to confirm that the answer is no. Once the offender consents to a supervised attendance order, he will have to complete it. The hon. Gentleman also said that fines should be related to the means to pay and not to the severity of the offence.

Mr. Harry Ewing: The Minister says that an offender will not be able to buy himself out of a supervised attendance order. What sanction is available if the offender fails to complete the allocated number of hours? Is the sanction imprisonment? If that is the case, we are caught in the situation from which we are trying to escape.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is yes. What happens is broadly similar to that which occurs after non-co-operation with a community service order. I hope that that will not happen in more than a few cases. I confirm to the hon. Gentleman that section 395(1) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975—the hon. Gentleman may have played a part in getting that Act on to the statute book—states:

> "A court . . . in determining the amount of any fine to be imposed on an offender shall take into consideration, amongst other things, the means of the offender so far as known to the court."

The High Court has rightly emphasised that in appeal cases. In this connection, I agree with the hon. Member for Garscadden.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), who has left the Chamber for a moment, said that there was a need to do more work on implementation. I agree. Detailed guidance for social work authorities on the operation will be drawn up in consultation with interested parties before the provisions of the Bill come into force. The hon. Gentleman also asked about non-social work supervisors. Their use is well precedented in bringing forward community service schemes. They always have access to support and advice from professional social workers.

Like the hon. Member for Garscadden, I think that it is important for there to be a range of community disposals in which the people of Scotland can have confidence. The hon. Gentleman asked me about this late last night, when he asked me to speak about probation. Fewer than 3 per cent. of offenders appearing before the High and sheriff courts are placed on probation. While probation is not suitable for all offenders, it has the potential to make a much bigger contribution. It has been somewhat neglected, so we saw 100 per cent. funding as important, not just for community service orders and supervised attendance orders, but also for probation.

When we gave 100 per cent. central funding for community service orders, it resulted in a 25 per cent. increase in the number of such orders in the first year. Obviously, that is an important consideration.

Mr. Dalyell: Why does the Minister think that the level of provision has fallen back like this? When I was first elected to the House, there was a tough probation officer in West Lothian who was a father figure and who sorted out a number of boys by using common sense and know-how. That sort of thing does not happen to such an extent these days, unfortunately.

4.15 pm

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Our information is that local authority social workers are often reluctant to recommend this course of action in social inquiry reports, possibly because of the work load consequences for them, so 100 per cent. funding will assist.

Clause 51 makes other necessary changes to improve the effectiveness of the services. It ensures that community service orders are reserved for those offenders who would otherwise have been imprisoned. As the hon. Member for Garscadden said, the result would be to increase the number of fines. We believed it to be essential to do something about the problem of fine defaulters, or the Bill would inadvertently result in more people going to prison than was the intention of any hon. Member who served on the Standing Committee that considered the Bill, or the House as a whole.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: Like others, I have been critical of the Minister from time to time during the passage of the Bill, but I warmly welcome what he has just said. It betokens an enlightened and sensible attitude from the Department. I echo the sentiments expressed by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). The effectiveness of the probation service before the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 was a watchword in penal circles. If we can, by a more generous allocation of funds, return to probation officers the stature that they enjoyed and the successes that they were able to achieve, that would be a good thing for many young people in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I thank the hon. and learned Gentleman for what he has just said. I think that this move will also be welcomed by prison officers, who have the duty of looking after those who are in prison because of serious crimes. If a young person who has committed a minor misdemeanour and finds difficulty in paying his fines—there are hundreds of such cases—can be dealt with in this way, that will help with the administration of the prisons.

Mr. Dewar: It seems to me that the drive of some of these comments is a move away from generic social workers and back to specialisation in the social work department. I should be interested to hear whether the Minister embraces that proposition.

I wish to clarify what the Minister has just said, because it is important. The thrust of his central argument is that there will be large fines, leading to fine defaults and the use of the new supervised attendance order, which is aimed at preventing a specific increase. Do the Government hope that the supervised attendance order will be widely used, perhaps for small defaulters—people who are fined under £50 but who have not paid, perhaps because they are on benefit or have a number of social pressures on them—who will benefit from the flexibility that this allows, with the result that there is a reduction? In other words, I want to know what part the Minister thinks that a supervised attendance order will play, and whether it will largely replace, over time, the imprisonment factor.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My view is that it will be seen as a lesser form of community service, shorter in scope and easier to carry out by those concerned. A range of disposals is important. The 100 per cent. funding for the probation community service order and supervised attendance orders will give the court a choice, which will depend on the seriousness of the case.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow also asked about the role of the social workers. Social workers should be deployed where their special skills can be used to the best effect. They will be responsible for the planning of supervised attendance orders and for generally overseeing their operation. The day-to-day supervision can be provided more cheaply by other local authority staff, and many of the components of the programme could be brought in from other providers, such as voluntary organisations. For example, local councils on alcohol could provide speakers on alcohol abuse.

It is important to distinguish supervised attendance from probation. In probation, the focus is on the individual offender and his offending behaviour. A probation order combines control of the offender with assistance to help him to solve his personal problems and stay out of trouble. Probation calls for the special skills of the social worker in one-to-one counselling and small group interaction. In contrast, supervised attandance will not be concerned with tailoring the approach to the individual offender. In essence, it is a fine on the offender's free time, and the supervisor's main function will be to ensure punctual attendance and good behaviour of a group of about eight to 12 offenders, whose activities will follow a standardised modular pattern.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow may have missed my earlier comment. In answer to his point, I can say that the Government do not believe that it would be a sensible use of scarce social work skills to have professional staff solely carry out this work. They will be much better employed in doing the things that only they can do—providing supervision and help to offenders on probation and parole, and preparing social inquiry reports to enable the courts to choose the most appropriate disposal.

Dr. Godman: I sincerely apologise to the Minister for the fact that I have been racing around for the past few minutes and therefore missed his comments.

It is essential that any activity-centred scheme is realistic and constructive, so that it helps such people to come back into the community. I know that ex-drug users at some centres spend many empty hours that could be more usefully spent preparing them to find jobs. That is why it is essential that the supervision is carried out by highly qualified and trained people.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I agree with the hon. Gentleman, but there are degrees of specialisation within the social work department. As the hon. Member for Garscadden suggested, we want to encourage greater specialisation in working with offenders.

In response to the point raised by the hon. Member for Garscadden, I confirm that supervised attendance orders will be widely used for defaulters of small fines. They will be highly appropriate in that category. The provision fulfils an important need.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): I am carefully following the Minister's arguments, and I agree that there is a need for qualified, trained social workers to be involved. Will there be additional recruitment into social work, and will additional funding be made available to colleges and universities involved in the training of social workers? The necessary resources and back-up facilities must be provided, because social work departments are already under severe strain.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: That is obviously a matter for the consultative group, which will have representation from local authorities, the judiciary and other relevant, interested bodies. We shall keep closely in touch with the position.

We believe that the new penalty will be of great value in helping to reduce the pressure on the prisons, while continuing to provide a disincentive to fine default and enabling those who do default to make amends for their offence through loss of their free time, disciplined attendance and constructive activity.

New clause 21

EFFECT OF MENTAL INCAPACITY ON POWERS OF ATTORNEY ETC.

'.—(1) Any rule of law by which a factory and commission or power of attorney ceases to have effect in the event of the mental incapacity of the granter shall not apply to a factory and commission or power of attorney granted on or after the date on which this section comes into force.

(2) In subsection (1) above, "mental incapacity" means, in relation to a person, that he is incapable of managing his property and affairs by reason of mental disorder within the meaning of section 1 of the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984.'.—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 8—Further provisions as to judicial factors—

'.—After section 35 of the Judicial Factors Act 1849 there shall be inserted the following section—

"35A—(1) Subject to subsection (5) below, where an individual grants a factory and commission or power of attorney which includes a declaration of intention to which this section applies, the factor and commission or power of attorney shall not be revoked only by reason of any subsequent mental incapacity.

(2) This section applies to a declaration of intention which is in the prescribed form and includes a statement that the granter intends the factory or commission or power of attorney to continue despite any subsequent mental incapacity of his, provided that—

(a) the factory and commission or power of attorney has been subscribed by the granter and attested by two witnesses before a notary public and has been registered in the Books of Council and Session or in the books of the appropriate sheriff court of the sheriffdom in which the granter habitually resides;

(b) the notary public has made a statement in the prescribed form that the granter has read or has had read to him prescribed information explaining the effect of the declaration; and

(c) the granter has sworn or affirmed before the notary public that the declaration was made freely and without coercion of any kind.

(3) In subsections (1) and (2) above 'mental incapacity' means, in relation to a granter, that he is incapable of managing his property and affairs by reason of mental disorder.

(4) 'Mental disorder' has the same meaning as in section 1 of the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984.

(5) A factory and commission or power of attorney which includes a declaration of intention to which this section applied shall be revoked by appointment of a curator bonis or tutor-dative and may be revoked on application to the court by any person having an interest.

(6) In this section—

(a) 'prescribed' means prescribed by regulations made by the Secretary of State:

(b) 'the court' means the Court of Session or the sheriff court".'.

Government amendment No. 108.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: New clause 8 in the name of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) and new clause 21 have similar aims. They seek to overcome a problem faced by an increasing number of families where a relative, who has granted a factory and commission or power of attorney, subsequently becomes mentally incapacitated. In Scotland, unlike England and Wales, a power of attorney terminates if the granter becomes mentally incapacitated. A curator bonis could be appointed, but in view of the costs involved, a curatory is not usually considered worthwhile except for fairly large estates.

New clause 8 mirrors for Scotland provisions in the Enduring Powers of Attorney Act 1985 which apply to England and Wales, but the simpler provision in new clause 21 will achieve the same end. It will ensure that, after the commencement of the provision, any existing rule of law by which a factory and commission or power of attorney ceases to have effect in the event of the mental incapacity of the donor shall have no effect. Mental incapacity is as defined in section 1 of the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984.

The provisions will apply only to powers of attorney granted after the provision comes into force. It does not seek to alter the effect of powers of attorney already granted, nor does it revive powers of attorney that have lapsed because of the mental incapacity of the donor. In the former case, the granter can revoke any existing power and grant a new power.

Amendment No. 108 seeks to ensure that the new clause will come into effect as soon as possible—that is, on commencement of the Act. New clause 21 is sufficient to achieve the objectives sought by the hon. Member for Garscadden. It has been deliberately kept simple, since the Law Commission intends to publish later this year a discussion paper on powers of attorney and other matters relating to guardianship of the adult incapacitated.

It may turn out that, on the basis of the commission's consultations, and a more wide ranging consideration of the matter, a different solution to the problem may emerge. Accordingly, I ask hon. Members to recognise that it may be necessary to return to the subject when the commission issues its report and recommendations. In bringing forward the new clause we recognise that a social need exists which should be met now, and new clause 21 is sufficient to achieve that end. Therefore, I ask hon. Members to accept new clause 21 and amendment No. 108, and I ask the hon. Member for Garscadden to withdraw new clause 8.

Mr. Dewar: I have no difficulty about falling in with the Minister's request on this occasion. I do not always think that a shorter clause is a better clause but there is no doubt that we are attempting to obtain the same result and I am perfectly happy to take the Minister's word that his new clause encompasses the meaning more conveniently. It is an admirable means of curing a difficulty, which, as he fairly said, has faced many families who unfortunately, have had to deal with the situation where a close relative no longer has the faculties to look after his or her affairs. It is right in those situations—in a sense anticipated, because a power of attorney has been granted—that the power of attorney should run on and allow the proper administration of that person's affairs. I am glad that the Minister has acted to achieve that. I welcome his new clause, and will not press new clause 8.

Dr. Godman: I, too, welcome new clause 21. Will the Law Commission, as part of its brief, comment upon the code of practice which was produced under the auspices of the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984? I ask that question because I am fairly confident that neither the House nor the Scottish Grand Committee has ever had the opportunity of scrutinising the workings of that important Act.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The remit is for the Law Commission to consider later in the year matters relating to the guardianship of the adult incapacitated. In so far as the code relates to this, it would be perfectly competent for the Commission to comment on it as it so wished.

New Clause 24

EVIDENCE OF CHILDREN THROUGH TELEVISION LINK IN CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS

'.—(1) Subject to subsections (2) and (3) below, where a child has been cited to give evidence in a trial, the court may, on an application being made to it, authorise the giving of evidence by the child by means of a live television link.

(2) The court may grant an application under subsection (1) above only on cause shown having regard in particular to—

(a) the possible effect on the child if required to give evidence, no such application having been granted; and

(b) whether it is likely that the child would be better able to give evidence if such application were granted.

(3) In considering whether to grant an application under subsection (1) above, the court may take into account, where appropriate, any of the following—

(a) the age and maturity of the child;

(b) the nature of the alleged offence;

(c) the nature of the evidence which the child is likely to be called on to give; and

(d) the relationship, if any, between the child and the accused.'.—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may take the following: Government new clauses 25 to 27.

New clause 1—Evidence of children on commission in criminal proceedings—

'.—(1) Notwithstanding section 32 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1980 and subject to section (Circumstances in which procedures may be authorised) of this Act, where a child has been cited to give evidence in a trial, whether under solemn or summary procedure, the court may, on an application being made to it at an appropriate time, appoint a commissioner to take the evidence of the child.

(2) The proceedings before a commissioner under this section shall be recorded by video recorder.

(3) The accused shall not be present in the room where the proceedings under this section are taking place except with the leave of the commissioner, but the accused, if not present, shall be entitled to watch and hear those proceedings by such other means as seem suitable to the commissioner.

(4) In subsection (1) above "at an appropriate time" means—

(a) in relation to solemn proceedings, at any time before the oath is administered to the jury;

(b) in relation to summary proceedings, at any time before the first witness is sworn, or

(c) in exceptional circumstances, in relation to either solemn or summary proceedings, during the course of the trial.'.

New clause 2—Use of screens in taking evidence of children in criminal proceedings—

'.—(1) Subject to section (Circumstances in which procedures may be authorised) of this Act, where a child has been cited to give evidence in a trial, whether under solemn or summary procedure, the court may, on an application being made to it, authorise the use of a screen to conceal the accused from the sight of the child, notwithstanding that such use of a screen is objected to by or on behalf of the accused.

(2) Where a screen is used in pursuance of this section, arrangements shall be made to ensure that the accused is able to watch and hear the child while the child is giving evidence.'.

New clause 3—Evidence of children through television link in criminal proceedings—

'.—Subject to section (Circumstances in which procedures may be authorised) of this Act, where a child has been cited to give evidence in a trial, whether under solemn or summary procedure, the court may, on an application being made to it, authorise the giving of evidence by the child by means of a live television link.'.

New clause 4—Circumstances in which procedures may be authorised—

'.—(1) The court may grant an application under sections (Evidence of children on commission in criminal proceedings), (Use of screens in taking evidence of children in criminal proceedings) or (Evidence of children through television link in criminal proceedings) of this Act only on cause shown having regard in particular to—

(a) the possible effect on the child if required to give evidence in open court; and

(b) whether it is likely that the child would be better able to give evidence if not required to do so in open court.

(2) In having regard to the matters referred to in paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (1) above, the court may take into account, where appropriate, any of the following—

(a) the age and maturity of the child;

(b) the nature of the alleged offence;

(c) the nature of the evidence which the child is likely to be called on to give; and

(d) the relationship, if any, between the child and the accused.'.

Government amendment No. 127.

4.30 pm

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This is perhaps the most important issue before us this afternoon. The clauses concern the protection of children in criminal cases, about which there has been widespread concern, and it is right that they should be before us today. There has been considerable concern about criminal trials where child witnesses under stress have been unable to give their evidence properly. The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) tabled a number of amendments in Committee, and made it clear that he wished to return to the matter on Report.

The discussion is centred on the use of a live television link arrangement, under which the child witness would be in a room separate from the court room and would give evidence through closed-circuit television. We have decided that the arrangement should be progressively introduced in Scotland. It is intended—subject to consultation with the judiciary—that appropriate equipment should be available initially in Edinburgh and Glasgow.

The arrangement is based on the recommendation of the Scottish Law Commission in its "Report on the evidence of Children and Other Potentially Vulnerable Witnesses", published earlier this year. The Commission believes that, in many cases, children will be able to give evidence in court by conventional means.

Live television links should be required in relatively few cases. Their use is accordingly to be at the discretion of the trial judge, according to the statutory criteria set out in the first Government amendment. It would of course reduce the expected benefits from the use of the live television link if the child witness still had to identify the accused in court in a face-to-face dock identification. Accordingly, a further Government amendment deals with evidential requirements.

There are also further provisions dealing with sheriff court jurisdiction and the transfer of sheriff court cases within a sheriffdom. The jurisdiction provision enables a case to be taken anywhere in a sheriffdom, and the transfer of a case within a sheriffdom will be allowed when an application for the use of a live television link has been approved. Without these transfer provisions, it would be difficult to operate the new procedure efficiently.

We have reached the view that we should not—at least, in the meantime—implement the Scottish Law Commission's recommendations with regard to a video—recorded pre-trial deposition procedure and a statutory provision relating to the use of screens. The deposition procedure would involve an examination of the child witness, ideally before the judge who was to preside at the trial. Much the same purpose will be served by a live television link. We have decided that it is appropriate to introduce the live television link procedure first, and monitor its operation carefully before considering other statutory measures.

Mr. Dalyell: Will the Minister say why he thinks that he and his Department know better than the Law Commission? I thought that the Law Commission was rather convincing.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I would not say that I knew better than the Law Commission. I have discussed the matter in detail with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn). [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Garscadden is expressing scorn, but my hon. and learned Friend probably has more experience of criminal cases than any other Scottish Member of Parliament. He has considerable knowledge of the subject.

Mr. Dewar rose——

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I will give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker), as I have not done so yet.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) asked me, if the opportunity arose, to express his apologies for not being present, and to state clearly that he supports what the Government are doing and believes that it is right.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I thank my hon. Friend. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross told me the same.

The Government take the view they do because to adopt another arrangement could be prejudicial to the accused. I myself have been involved in a court case in which a child witness identified a boy as guilty of murder, but under cross-examination admitted that he had told a lie on the instructions of relatives. I have seen that happen. That case involved youths who had kicked another youth to death. If that child's claim had not been broken down under cross-examination, an innocent person could easily have been convicted of murder. As well as the protection of children, we must bear in mind the importance of fairness to the accused.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I cannot help making the observation that, if the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) now has power of attorney for the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn), we may have to examine the capacity of the latter.

Taking the three new clauses together, I find it difficult to grasp the practicalities of defending an accused person in circumstances in which a television link has been allowed by the court, and the extent to which cross-examination of a child may be possible. If I read new clause 26 correctly, cross-examination of a child on the issue of identification may not be excluded by way of statute. Practical difficulties exist that remain to be explained.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In the case of a child who had been abused in one way or another, dock identification could be very upsetting and distressing for that child. We believe that a video link could provide an effective means of taking evidence. Identification might be made on some former occasion. One Glasgow police station has a one-way mirror that allows women who have been raped, for example, to identify their attackers without suffering immense additional distress.

Dr. Godman: I am confused by the Minister's use of the terms "closed-circuit television link" and "video link". I refer him to a comment that he made at the beginning of our debate yesterday afternoon:

> "I intend to accept the central point on video evidence. That does not include every aspect of new clause 1".—[Official Report, 16 October 1990; Vol. 177, c. 1060.]

Why has the Minister changed his mind?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I want to make it clear that I do accept the proposals for a video link, but the evidence goes further than that, and suggests that there is a risk that it could be prejudicial to the accused.

As to cross-examination, the television link would be continuous. The provision concerning identification would apply only where the court had granted an application for use of the television link procedure. Where a child gives evidence that he or she recalls having previously identified the person alleged to have committed the offence, the evidence of a third party of that identification would be admissible as evidence of such identification. There remains for determination by the court the sufficiency of that evidence—whether the Crown has sufficiently proved the identification. Accordingly, fairness to the accused would not be prejudiced.

Mr. Dalyell: This is a complex subject, and Ministers are certainly entitled to make decisions on the basis of their own experience. I personally would greatly value the views of the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir

[Mr. Dalyell]

N. Fairbairn) on such a subject. Equally, the House is entitled to know in detail why the Government have overturned the Law Commission recommendation, especially since its Lord President, Lord Hope, is currently proposing a scheme.

Do the Government have the agreement, in their view, of the Lord President? Has he given advice to the effect that the Government, rather than the Law Commission, are correct? I do not want to make a party point, because none is to be made, but it is a matter of considerable importance to a number of our constituents. Again, I can think of a personal case in which I was tangentially involved on a constituency basis.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I genuinely do not think that the Lord President has been approached to ask whether he supports the Law Commission's view in opposition to any other point of view on this matter. He is certainly aware of the Government's proposals, as the hon. Member for Linlithgow will be aware.

The Scottish Law Commission in its report recorded a number of reservations expressed to it about the use of screens. The Scottish court is exploring technical aspects of the use of screens and we would wish to monitor the present use before reaching a concluded view as to the needs of the statutory provision on the line recommended by the Scottish Law Commission.

Undoubtedly hon. Members are aware of the welcome memorandum on guidance on child witnesses which was issued by the Lord Justice-General at the end of July. The purpose of the memorandum is to provide assistance to judges in the exercise of their discretionary powers to put a child at ease—for example, by removing wigs and gowns. The adoption of other measures recommended in the Lord Justice-General's memorandum can be expected to make a substantial contribution to reducing stress for child witnesses. We wish to know how wider use of such measures will help before we consider further statutory or other innovations.

Two other Government amendments provide necessary definitions and make necessary adjustments to the long title of the Bill. The Government amendments provide a coherent and practical set of provisions. We wish to respond quickly to the opportunity to legislate now to bring in closed circuit television for child witnesses.

The new clauses tabled by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow are not workable as they stand, in the absence of a provision enabling cases to be transferred and doing away with dock identification. Accordingly, I invite the House to support the Government amendments.

4.45 pm

Dr. Godman: I thank the Minister for responding as he did to my new clause 3. However, I wish to speak to new clause 1 which is also in my name. Incidentally, I shall not press new clause 3 as it was intended to elicit a comprehensive response from the Minister and I thank him for his positive response.

New clause 24 not only brings Scots law into line with English law in terms of section 32 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988, but is an improvement on that English legislation. I think that I am right in saying that there are now 22 English Crown courts with closed circuit television and that there is a fair geographical spread throughout England of what has become known as "CCTV". There is some confusion between closed-circuit television and video recordings. The Minister was talking about closed circuit television.

My aim in new clause 1 is simple: to give added protection to children when they give evidence in criminal proceedings involving sex abuse or physical abuse.

In the past 10 months, two major reports on this deeply troubling matter have been published in England and Scotland. I refer to Judge Pigot's Home Office advisory group's report on video evidence published in September 1989 and to the 125th report of the Scottish Law Commission entitled, "Report on the evidence of Children and Other Potentially Vulnerable Witnesses" which was published about nine months ago.

In the context of new clauses 1, 2 and 4 and of the Minister's new clauses, English and Scottish legal systems have a good deal to learn from each other. I was much taken by the observations offered by Spencer and Flin in their book, "The Evidence of Children. The Law and the Psychology"—Spencer is a Cambridge fellow and Dr. Rhona Flin is a psychologist at the Robert Gordon's Institute in Aberdeen. In their book, published by Blackstone Press earlier this year, they said about evidence given by children:

> "It is now almost 400 years since James VI of Scotland became James I of England, and nearly 300 years since the Act of Union: yet little knowledge about the Scottish legal system seems to have spread south of the Border. In Cambridge University Library there has been a copy of Dickson's classic treatise on the law of evidence in Scotland since 1864, and when the first author consulted it in 1989, he found that every page remained uncut!"

I believe that if the English were more familiar with our system of children's hearings, which was set up in 1971, they would establish something akin to that system in England. It is a matter of considerable regret to me that, despite a near consensus in the House, the Government have failed to use the Children Act 1989 as a step towards the creation of an informal system of courts south of the border. In that regard, England and Wales are some 20 years behind Scotland. However, in the matters dealt with by my new clauses Scotland lags behind England. The Minister is rectifying that to some extent in his new clauses.

In support of new clause 1 and the use of video-recorded interviews with children as evidence, I intend to quote from both the reports that I mentioned. I am disappointed by the Minister's comments on the use of such video-recorded interviews as evidence. I understand that such legislation, involving the use of such video-recorded interviews, will be introduced south of the border. If that is the case, we shall again be lagging behind in Scotland.

I confess that to draw up my new clause I plagiarised the draft Bill that was appended to the Scottish Law Commissioner's report. I make no apology for that, because, among other things, it has elicited a most heartening response on closed-circuit television from the Minister. I still hope to persuade the House on the need for a similar response to new clause 1. My aim is to lessen the appalling burden imposed on children, without harming the interests of the accused.

I think that the Pigot report may lead to new legislation south of the border. On page 69, it states:

"We recommend that at trials on indictment for violent and sexual offences and offences of cruelty and neglect and at comparable trials in the juvenile courts"—

which is the English system—

"video-recorded interviews with children under the age of 14 conducted by police officers, social workers or those whose duties include the investigation of crime or the protection of the welfare of children should be admissible as evidence. Where the offence charged is of a sexual nature this provision should extend to child witnesses under the age of 17".

That is a radical proposal, but I accept it wholeheartedly.

At page 18, paragraph 416, the Scottish Law Commission's report said:

"On the whole matter we accordingly recommend: 10(a) where a child has been cited to give evidence in a criminal trial, whether under solemn or summary procedure, it should be competent, as an alternative to adducing the child as a witness in court, to take the evidence of that child on commission prior to the date of the trial or, exceptionally, during the course of the trial."

This excellent report goes on:

"(b) the taking of evidence on commission should, so far as practicable, take place in a room which is congenial and non-threatening so that the child may feel at ease during the proceedings."

I heartily endorse that recommendation.

The video-recorded interviews to which I refer are far removed from precognitions under Scottish law. Precognition is

"The preliminary examination of witnesses or persons likely to know about the facts of a case, in order to obtain, with a view to trial, a general knowledge of the available evidence; especially in criminal law, an examination by a procurator-fiscal of those who can give evidence regarding a crime or offence (in older practice conducted by or before a sheriff or other judge ordinary)".

That quotation is taken from "The Oxford English Dictionary", second edition, volume XI. "The Concise Scots Dictionary" simply states that precognition is "a statement made by a witness during this investigation."

Such precognitions are usually conducted by ex-police officers, but it is not unknown for others to carry out such work, even though they may have had no training. The video-recorded interviews provided for by my new clause 1 would have to be spontaneous and voluntary. They should certainly not be based on interrogation and they should not be conducted by over-zealous professionals. I recognise that there are major difficulties; they do not have to be pointed out to me by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell), or by my hon. and old Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). Precognitions have always caused difficulties for our courts.

I am reminded of Lord Justice Clerk Thomson's comment in Kerr v. H.M. Advocate, Scottish Law Times 1958, volumne 82. He said that

"Precognosers as a whole appear to be gifted with a measure of optimism which no amount of disillusionment appears to damp."

As with precognitions, the interviews of children present problems because of their limited powers of conversation and their immaturity.

In the Butler-Sloss report the observation is offered that "Not all members of the judiciary"—

this is the English judiciary—

"are in favour of video recordings."

That comment, however, appears to be based on anecdotal evidence, perhaps obtained during conversations with fellow judges over a glass of sherry. No research evidence is offered in that report for the reservation concerning video-recorded interviews being used as depositions.

The commissioner to whom the Law Commission refers would need to be chosen carefully, perhaps initially from the ranks of reporters to the children's panels. I have every confidence in their integrity. My hon. Friend the Member for Garscadden will readily agree with that comment, because he was employed for a short time as a reporter. Professionals of that kind could, in the early days, take on the role of commissioner in order to obtain such evidence. A young child is much better able to remember dreadful incidents shortly after the perpetrator has committed them rather than in a courtroom six, eight, 10 months, or even a year or 18 months later. That is why I say that video-recorded interviews should be used as evidence in such cases.

I regret that we are dealing with these important issues on Report. They are worthy of lengthy and tough-minded debate. There are cases under investigation in Scotland to which I cannot refer because they are sub judice. However, they have aroused a sense of horror and repugnance among all decent-minded people throughout the land, despite the conservative reservations of lawyers. I have much respect for lawyers, despite some of the observations that I have made, but, by heavens, they form part of a conservative profession. They always offer, as the Minister has done, the classic conservative argument that the moment is not right for change, that the moment is not propitious. It is the classic argument of the conservative lawyer, irrespective of political affiliation.

New clause 2 provides for the use of screens. Again the Scottish Office is lagging behind the English. I refer to Home Office circular 61/1990, published in August 1990. The title of the circular is

"Use of Screens in Magistrates' Courts."

That circular was sent to the clerk to the Magistrates' Courts Committee and to clerks to the justices, with a copy for the chairmen of the bench, for information. The circular has also been sent to the chief officers of police in England and to the chief probation officer. The circular says about screens:

"The purpose of this circular is to bring to the attention of courts a recent decision of the Court of Appeal on the use of screens in courts in cases of violence and/or sexual abuse involving child witnesses.

2. The Court of Appeal, in the case of R v X, R v Y, R v Z [1989] 'The Times' November 3 ruled that the use of screens was not unfair or prejudicial in order to prevent children from being intimidated by their surroundings.

3. Justices' clerks may also wish to be aware that the Advisory Group on Video Evidence, chaired by Judge Pigot, in its Report published in December 1989 recommended that screens should be used in proceedings in magistrates' courts in cases of violence against and/or sexual abuse of children. This would help child witnesses to bear the burdens of appearance in open court, cross-examination, face to face confrontation with the alleged perpetrator and repeated and unnecessary worry about matters which may be extremely distressing or even traumatic."

If the measure is regarded as necessary for English children, why is it not necessary for Scottish children?

During the summer recess, which was not all holiday for hard-working Members of Parliament, I examined—not with an architect's eye but with a shipwright's eye—all the court rooms in the sheriff courts in Edinburgh. On some occasions I sat in on cases. I have examined all the High Court courtrooms and the courtrooms in the sheriff court in Glasgow. That court must be the most modern in Scotland. God knows what the architects were thinking when they placed the witness box in each of those courts within 12 or 15 ft of the dock.

5 pm

In those circumstances, young children may have to give evidence about members of their family—their nearest and dearest—within three or four yards of the accused. If the English can introduce screens and such a circular can be sent out by the Home Office, why cannot the Minister send a similar circular to Scottish sheriffs?

On page 19, paragraph 4·17 the Law commission report says:

"we expressed considerable reservations about the use of screens as a means of concealing an accused from the sight of a child who is giving evidence in court. Those reservations were based, first, on a concern that screens might not in fact be effective in reducing a child's anxiety".

I recognise and reaffirm the distinctiveness of our legal system, but in this case we in Scotland have a good deal to learn from the English experience, just as they have a good deal to learn from our excellent system of children's hearings. Screens could be used in some of our courts and, given the architecture of those courts, they would provide an essential protection for children.

As I have said, I have no wish to continue with new clause 3 in the light of the Minister's comprehensive new clauses. However, although I am heartened by the Minister's new clauses, I am deeply disappointed and saddened by his obduracy about the use of screens. He is a courteous and civilised adversary in debates, but, in the light of the Home Office circular to English magistrates, I am appalled at what appears to be a contradiction between what he said in the House last night—column 1060 of Hansard—about the use of video evidence and what he has said today. I am fairly confident that it is a genuine mistake. Like many other hon. Members and many people outwith the House, he has confused closed circuit television links with video recordings. I do not think that there is any such thing as a video link. He is talking about a closed circuit television installation that allows a child to give evidence while sitting in congenial surroundings in a room adjourning the court. There cannot be a video link in those circumstances.

The video-recorded interview is a change. It has been argued for by police officers, police surgeons, social workers and the Royal Scottish Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children. I visited the society's unit in the east end of Glasgow last week. It has a video camera with a two-way mirror. I do not know why they are called two-way mirrors because those being observed cannot see the observers. People such as Norman Dunning and Sam McTaggart of the RSSPCC should be allowed to interview a child following abuse or an assault. That interview should be used in its entirety as a production and should be admissible as evidence. The aim is to reduce the appalling distress that is inflicted upon children following such abuse.

Apparently my new clause has some technical deficiencies, but, if the Minister were to produce something along similar lines, I believe that it would lead to a significant improvement in the rehabilitation and treatment of children caught up in horrendous circumstates. Also it might persuade mothers, in some cases the fathers, or those responsible for the care and protection of children to come forward so that the alleged perpetrator may be proceeded against.

My response to the Minister is mixed. I am pleased with his new clause concerning closed circuit television, but I am deeply disappointed, indeed angered, over his obdurate response to my new clause 1. He still has a chance to change his mind about my new clause.

Mr. Dewar: There was some laughter when the Minister said that he had consulted the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) about new clause 24. There was a voice from afar, a sort of thought transference, as the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) told us of the hon. and learned Gentleman's support for this proposition. It meant no disrespect to the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross, but the Minister has spent all his time in Committee disagreeing with him on everything and it seems odd that he should now pray in aid his agreement as a conclusive argument.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: All advocates at the Bar will recognise that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross is an exceptionally experienced criminal lawyer. He has had immense experience in the courts. The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) has been his junior counsel, as have my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and I.

Mr. Dewar: I accept that. I do not wish to spend my time discussing the hon. and learned Gentleman's views except to say that I am not surprised that he supports new clause 24. I should have thought that he would have great doubts about new clause 26, which deals with identification procedures, but I shall come to that.

This is an important announcement. It has come late in our proceedings and I regret that, because we have no opportunity for amendment. My hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) might have made more progress if this had been carried out on a different timetable. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend, who, as we know, has long been involved in this matter. He has done an enormous amount of hard work and has shown tremendous interest and commitment in the cause of helping children through the stressful and difficult occasion of having to give evidence in court. The change in views must owe something to my hon. Friend's work and efforts.

I speak perhaps from a prejudiced position. For a short period, I earned my bread and butter as a defence lawyer, practising mainly in the criminal courts. As a counterweight to that, I spent five years as a reporter to the children's panel, which might have given me a rather different perspective. I welcome the new clause on the use of television links to take the evidence of children. I hope that it will work well, because it is important to protect children in that difficult position.

We have heard much about the Scottish Law Commission report, which was published in February and is the fundamental basis of this debate. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow about the fundamental point made in paragraph 4.8, which says that there is "a range of available options from which can be selected the one which appears likely to be the most beneficial in a given case."

There were three available options, and I have some sympathy with the point about the reasons why one of the three has been selected. However, the Minister's argument was not clear on that point.

The Minister should say more about pre-trial deposition, the use of screens and why it was decided not to proceed with them; there is some confusion. My hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow made a strong plea on pre-trial deposition, but what he was advocating in his new clause is different from what the Law Commission advocated in its report. He kept saying that it is an excellent report and that it should be implemented, but the key to pre-trial deposition is that it is not just a recorded voluntary statement by the child but a formal examination of the child. A key factor recommended by the Law Commission was that there should be cross-examination of the child by the solicitors appearing for the Crown and defence which should take place at the latest possible date and as near to the trial date as is administratively possible. That is very different from what my hon. Friend was advocating. I do not want to enter into the details of that point because of the constraints on time, but pre-trial deposition can be interpreted in rather different ways. I sympathise with my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow about the use of screens and the Minister should say a little more about them.

It came as a surprise to me that closed circuit television was now selected for debate in this way, and I stress the word "now", because, as anyone who has the most cursory interest in this matter will recognise, it has a curious history. Paragraph 4.28 of the Law Commission's report says:

"In the Discussion Paper"— that was the basis of its findings—

"we suggested that live closed circuit television should not be introduced in Scotland as a means of enabling child witnesses to give their evidence. Our principal reason for reaching that conclusion was that we considered that a child who was too frightened to give evidence in court was unlikely to be any less frightened if required to sit in a distant room, surrounded by a mass of cameras and screens . . . No doubt in view of the negative position which we ourselves had adopted at that stage, the majority of consultees simply agreed with us without making any further comment."

The Law Commission came down decisively against the proposition that it then advocated in its final report because, as I understand it, it reached the conclusion in paragraph 4.31 that

"a closed circuit television arrangement along the lines which we have described appears likely to be helpful."

Paragraph 4.29 says that English experience

"has persuaded us, first, that a closed circuit television arrangement need not be obtrusive or threatening from the point of view of the child, and second, that it need not, and does not, present problems from the point of view of judges, counsel and, so far as can be ascertained, juries."

It therefore reached its conclusions on the basis of English experience. I want to make a confession to the House which is probably shared by most hon. Members present: I have not seen the English experience in action. I do not know whether the Minister has done so; perhaps when he replies he will say whether he has.

5.15 pm

I do not want to found too much on this, but perhaps as a corrective and a warning I say that we shall have to monitor this practice carefully. I have seen a report of a solicitor whom I know extremely well and who has very wide knowledge of these cases. He is noted for his work in welfare law and cases involving children. He recently visited Guildford Crown court—he showed much enthusiasm in doing so—and I have the report that he wrote for the benefit of the Law Society. He says that he visited that court in a positive frame of mind. He states that he is strongly in favour of reform and

"Given that I approached this task in that frame of mind I was disappointed by what I saw at Guildford. The most abiding overall impression is that the use of the live television link is very obviously more conducive to an inquisitorial process and is very much out of place grafted on to adversarial proceedings."

He mentions several technical difficulties that he witnessed and records the fact, in a rather legal phrase which may prejudice his testimony in some people's minds, that

"There is no doubt that the use of this television link system generates an aura in the court which is not conducive to a vigorous defence case."

He backed that up from what he saw in that court.

That is one of the difficulties. We are trying to produce such an atmosphere, but, as was fairly acknowledged by my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow, the balance must be maintained, and it is sometimes difficult to achieve that.

I do not want to quote that report at length, because it would not be fair to do so, but it is clear that that solicitor, having seen the system in operation, took a rather different view from the Law Commission. We shall obviously have to monitor these matters carefully, although I am certain that we are right to try to strike at the problems of children giving evidence and to create an atmosphere that is fairer and will put them more at ease.

We tend to argue these matters in the context of child abuse cases, but the Government's proposal is available —I stress the word "available"—for any witness under the age of 16. It is perhaps not always true to say that it will be used for a small child who perhaps has been sexually abused by a member of the family.

My hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow mentioned the excellence of the report, but he will not have forgotten that in paragraph 4.7 the Law Commission states:

"Any new techniques or procedures will, we anticipate, be required in a relatively small number of cases."

I find that a little disappointing. If the Law Commission is right, such new techniques or procedures may not make as big an impact as perhaps some people expect.

I suspect that most of the evidence that is given by children about sexual abuse, perhaps in the home and involving members of their family, will be given not in criminal trials but in children's panel hearing proofs. Although that is not a criminal trial, and although some courts try to put the child at his or her ease, many of the inhibitions and the problems that will exist for the child giving evidence would exist for him giving evidence in a criminal charge. The effect for the child in terms of what may happen and whether he may continue to live at home is perhaps just as traumatic and drastic. We may have to consider how we run our children's hearing proofs because that may become a matter of some importance.

Does the Minister intend to accept the Scottish Law Commission's recommendation in paragraph 4.40 that guidelines should be laid down for the courts on when these television arrangements should be used? Perhaps he feels that it would be better to leave the matter entirely to the discretion of the courts. The hon. Gentleman should say something also about the Scottish Law Commission's recommendation that, if this system is used, it must be founded on an application before the trial by one of the parties to the trial, be it the Crown or the defence.

Presumably, some thought has been given to that aspect. It would be useful to know whether a pre-trial application must be made and when this system will begin to operate.

The report on the Guildford Crown court proceedings referred to a child who was in a separate room with someone who knew that child—I was going to say "minder" but it sounds a little inhuman. In that case, it was the mother. The counsel who conducted the examination-in-chief and cross-examination remained in the court-room. I gather that in Canada counsel go into the room with the child and the whole case is examined there. This is a fundamental difference in approach. I suspect that some of the difficulties on which my colleague reported in the Guildford case may have arisen from the fact that there was a preference for counsel on both sides to speak "from afar" through the television mechanism.

Dr. Godman: One can think of variations. Why not put the accused person or persons in a room adjoining the court, with links to the courtroom? One can think of a number of ways in which life can be made much easier for the child without harming the interests of the accused.

Mr. Dewar: That matter can be discussed. It is a fairly basic principle—this may sound like a lawyer's point—that an accused man or woman is entitled to be present throughout his or her trial. If that person is in another room with a television link, there might be problems. However, I take my hon. Friend's point. All these matters can be discussed.

New clause 26 will be of particular concern to many people involved in court work because it involves identification of the accused. Paragraph 3.7 of the Scottish Law Commission report states:

"The identification of an accused person as the perpetrator of an alleged offence is always an essential matter which the prosecution requires to establish in the course of a trial."

If this is an essential matter, careful arrangements must be made to ensure that identification can be fairly tested and challenged by the defence if it wishes.

I recognise that "dock identification"—to use the Scottish Law Commission's words—has been in disfavour in England and Wales since 1914 and I recognise all its shortcomings. I have often been struck by the fact that it is not very difficult for a person to know who he is supposed to identify if the other person is sitting in the dock between two policemen. Memory may be unreliable after a period has passed and not be as sound when the trial comes around. Identification is important. I accept that in many of the cases in which this procedure may be used, involving allegations of child abuse within a family, identification may not be a big issue. But for all that, there is a much more wide-ranging power in new clause 26 and we must pay some attention to it.

The Scottish Law Commission dealt at some length with this matter and concluded that in a case where there was identification parade evidence or some other recognised identification procedure—perhaps involving a young person and identification from a group of photographs—evidence of that should be lodged as a production 14 days before the trial. The Scottish Law Commission concluded that, during the period before the trial, the defence should have the right to challenge, and if that evidence were challenged presumably identification would have to be made during the trial in a more traditional fashion. That may seem a little clumsy. Clearly, an attempt was made to ensure that there was a right of challenge.

New clause 26 states that where

"the child gives evidence that he recalls having identified, prior to the trial, a person alleged to have committed an offence, the evidence of a third party as to the identification of that person by the child prior to the trial shall be admissable as evidence as to such identification."

How does the defence challenge that identification? The Minister must address himself to that point. The defence can challenge the third party who is giving evidence, but the third party is not the primary person involved. Is it envisaged that, in those circumstances, the child can be cross-examined? Presumably, one would be able to cross-examine the child about the circumstances in which he made the identification.

It is important to establish exactly what is envisaged because the identification may be vital in some cases. Even in sexual abuse cases, assumptions may be made about who is responsible. In my experience, such assumptions are not always justified. Another person may have been responsible, even if the incident took place as described. We all know that identification can be shaken. I know even from my limited and lowly experience in the sheriff court that identification has been decisively shaken under cross-examination in terms of the jury's decision.

I am concerned about new clause 26. I recognise that we do not want to put undue pressure on a child, but some cases relate to charges that are peculiarly damaging to the reputation of the accused and have disastrous consequences. We must be careful to ensure that there is a right to challenge identification evidence. I am not sure whether, on the face of new clause 26, that will apply as well as the Minister would like. I hope that he will comment on that matter.

My fears may be exaggerated. For example, there may be a pre-trial application by the Crown to protect a child. The defence may say, "The essence of our defence is that my witness was not involved. There has been a mistake in identification." The court may take that information into account in deciding whether this procedure is entirely appropriate. There is a difficult balance to strike and there are unanswered questions about the identification issue.

I have taken enough time to express some of my anxieties. We are right to go down this road. I have some sympathy with the screen proposal. I feel that much more work should be done on the matter of pre-trial depositions than is possible during these truncated proceedings. I hope that what the Minister offers will protect the child, remove the threatening majesty of the system, allow the child to speak more freely and in a more relaxed fashion and allow the court to get the truth with more certainty, which is the point of the exercise. It is difficult to strike a balance, but I am happy with the idea that we should introduce these provisions, that we should monitor them carefully and that we should learn from experience and consider what further steps are necessary.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I have grave reservations about these provisions. Those reservations are in no sense ameliorated by the fact that we are discussing these matters against the background of a time restraint. What we are discussing represents a substantial innovation in criminal procedure and the law of evidence in Scotland.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) spoke with great sincerity and on the basis of considerable analysis and work. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not think that my reaction is the automatic reaction that one might expect from someone involved in the law.

I do not claim to have the experience of defending in the criminal courts that the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) has, but I have had the advantage of prosecuting and defending and I suspect that that may entitle me to claim a rather more rounded view of the difficulties to which the new clauses may give rise. The hon. Member for Glasgow Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) has referred to some of those difficulties already. But it is also important to realise that new clause 24 applies not simply to cases involving assaults on children, as its language makes plain. It says that the court will have the power available to it

"where a child has been cited to give evidence in a trial".

That means any trial.

5.30 pm

There may well be cases in which it is not the prosecution but the defence that seeks to take advantage of the new clause. The defence may judge it in the interests of the accused to create the kind of artificiality to which we shall undoubtedly be subjected if the child is in another room while the proceedings of the court are taking place in the courtroom.

One important issue has not been addressed so far. The accused person is not represented by counsel or solicitors in every case; he may choose to represent himself. In such cases, the court is slow to allow anything to happen that may be prejudicial to the accused by reason of the fact that he or she is not legally represented. It has been suggested that we might follow the Canadian model and have counsel or solicitors in the same room as the child witness. The whole purpose of the new clause would be defeated if the accused was representing himself and went with the prosecutor to the room where the child was being kept. The proposal is by no means straightforward.

Moreover, one should not underestimate the difficulties for the prosecutor if the child is to be kept in a room away from the court. Often a stage is reached in a child' evidence at which, for a whole variety of reasons—some of which have been canvassed—the child becomes reluctant to continue and needs to be prompted. Those who have prosecuted in cases that involve children giving evidence know that there are certain devices that one can use. One may adopt a slightly different tone. Within the bounds of proper questions, and not transgressing by the use of leading questions, one may remind the child of some factor that may persuade him to remember his evidence. We should not discount, or be unaware of, the difficulties that may be caused to both prosecution and defence in the ordinary conduct of criminal proceedings if those proceedings are conducted in accordance with the new clause.

The new clause lists a number of factors that the court must take into account in considering whether to allow such an application. Absent from that list of factors is something that is an essential feature of all criminal proceedings—fairness to the accused. As the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow said, the purpose of this innovation is to prevent children from having to suffer the additional traumatic effects of having to give evidence about extremely unpleasant events in which they may have been involved. But however laudable and desirable that purpose may be, it must always be subordinate to our overriding purpose, which is to convict the guilty and to ensure that the innocent are not convicted. The absence of any reference to fairness to the accused in the critieria set out in the new clause is certainly worthy of note and, in my view, gives rise to some concern.

Like the hon. Member for Garscadden, I am especially apprehensive about the effect of new clause 26. I intervened in the Minister's opening remarks to say so, and you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, had to chide me for the length of my intervention. It was only a reflection of my concern.

Suppose that, on a previous occasion, a child has identified someone who is subsequently charged and who is an accused person in criminal proceedings. It would appear that, however informal the circumstances were, and whatever the nature of the relationship between the child and the person to whom the identification was made, it would be open to that person to come to the court and say that that identification was made.

Those of us who have participated in criminal trials involving children know that there is the constant fear of coaching. Such an identification may well have been made in response to a series of leading questions—to questions of an interrogatory nature and questions that might contain some threat or inducement. Nevertheless, the identification would become admissible in evidence. Moreover, under new clause 26, the fact of the identification having been made would still be a matter on which the child, and the person to whom it was made, could be cross-examined.

No doubt the Minister has given careful consideration to the cases of Muldoon v. Her Majesty's Advocate and Bennett v. Her Majesty's Advocate and will know the extent to which the High Court of Justiciary has departed from the apparently inflexible rule that identification could be carried out only in the presence of the accused in the course of the proceedings. But I wonder whether careful consideration was given to the effect that this new clause, which is designed to protect children, would have and to the extent to which it may innovate in respect of the principle of fairness to the accused person.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): I apologise for not having been here throughout the debate.

I support new clause 24 because I think that it represents the best way of not putting odium upon an accused person. The protection of the accused lies in the fact that there must be an application to justify. It is not a matter automatic; the procedure must be justified by application to the court. That is most important.

I should also like to bring to the attention of the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) something that I did not know until last week. Apparently, in England, an identification in court—which I have always thought pretty suspect—is not valid.

Mr. Campbell: On the latter point, I have never known the hon. and learned Gentleman to be anxious to import into the procedure of the law of Scotland things that take place in England. At the centre of our criminal procedure has been the fact that identification must be live identification, although that was watered down to some extent by the views expressed by the court in the case of Muldoon v. Her Majesty's Advocate.

[Mr. Campbell]

In respect of new clause 26, I have tried to illustrate the kind of difficulties that may arise when one embarks on an innovation in the established procedures. The motivation behind such innovations may be of the best but they may raise important and significant issues of principle none the less. I understand that, as the hon. and learned Gentleman said, any application under new clause 24 can be granted only by a court if an application is made to it. The language of the new clause states "on cause shown". I understand that, but, as I said before the hon. and learned Gentleman joined us in the Chamber, fairness to the accused must stand at the centre of our criminal proceedings. My concern is that the absence of an express reference to that among the factors that the court must take into account is a serious omission.

The mood of the House, the country and those who are concerned with these matters is that something should be done to try to assist the giving of evidence by children. It would be churlish and small-minded to try to stand out against that. However, as the hon. Member for Garscadden seemed to imply, I believe that we are embarking upon a substantial innovation that may well give rise to difficulties of which we have not yet conceived in the short time available for our debates.

In those circumstances, there is a substantial obligation on the Minister to give an undertaking that there will be the most careful monitoring of what takes place. On the issues of identification and the effective representation of an accused person, we need an undertaking that those matters will be examined with great care to ensure that no prejudice arises. It would be most unfortunate if, in our anxiety to do well by children, either through inadvertence or omission, we created circumstances that caused great unfairness to accused persons.

As has been said many times, it is a question of balance. I am prepared to take a bet on the balance being established by these provisions. None the less, I feel it important to enter these reservations and to urge the Minister to ensure that this innovation in our law does not pass unmonitored and that its effects are properly taken into account and understood.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: I intend to be brief, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wish first to congratulate the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) on his assiduous work over a considerable period, which has brought this matter eventually to the Floor of the House. It is a pity that we did not have an opportunity to explore this issue in more detail in Committee, because this is a significant innovation. I share the hon. Gentleman's concern because I, too, do not belive that the provisions go far enough. I share his disappointment that pre-trial video depositions are not to be introduced because that would have been a major step forward.

I listened with great interest to the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell). I found it difficult to understand many of his technical legal arguments. He seemed extremely pessimistic about the venture upon which our legal system is now embarking. We have a responsibility to take such steps forward. My background is in social work training. Anyone who has read case studies of children who have been physically or sexually abused knows the trauma through which those children have lived and which they are asked to relive time and time again when asked to give evidence.

This week, many people have been thinking about the horrendous case of the 11-year-old girl who was raped in a ward at St. Helier hospital. We must think of the trauma that that girl and her family have undergone. In similar circumstances in Scotland, we would want to ensure that that child and her family would be spared as many difficulties as possible when bringing the accused to justice and to ensure that it never happens again.

From a humanitarian point of view, the provisions are a step forward for children in our society. I not only wish the new clause every success, but hope that its provisions will be extended to take account of the other points raised not only by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow, but also by the Scottish Law Commission.

The Minister said that television circuits would be introduced first in Edinburgh and Glasgow. When will that happen? The hon. Gentleman also mentioned monitoring. How long does he envisage the monitoring period lasting? Will it be for a short period or for two or three years? I should like to know how long it will be until a final decision is taken. We should also like to know who will decide whether the experiment has been a success, and the criteria for deciding whether it is a success or a failure.

I know that the Minister will respond positively—I can tell by the look on his face that he intends to refer to these important points. Many people in Scotland are waiting to hear the exact details of his proposals.

5.45 pm

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), without whom I am sure that the House would not be discussing these issues. I also want to put on record my great condemnation of the fact that this House saw fit to discuss such relative trivialities as the conduct of the financial affairs of charities for many days in Committee, and yet something as important as this issue has been pushed in at the tail end of our consideration. That is a deplorable sense of proportion. I hope that, when the House is considering a future Scottish law reform Bill, it will give such issues far greater prominence.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow that screens could be an important and valuable part of setting a child at ease, reassuring him or her, and making it possible for the child to feel less fear. I hope that we shall see some progress on that in the future.

On the issue of the stage at which a child should be interviewed, I accept that both prosecution and defence must cross-examine the child in the interests of justice. However, I do not understand why anyone should think that that cross-examination should invariably take place as near as possible to the date of the trial. I should have thought that, in most cases, the nearer the date of the interview, carried out by both sides, to the events being complained about, the better. Obviously, when the child already knows the person or persons who are accused, recognition of those individuals is irrelevant. However, when the accused persons are not known to the child, it is clear that the sooner the proceedings take place after the event the more likely it is that the child will properly be able to recall events and to recognise those concerned.

I was once a witness to a crime and reported the person to the police as having long, greasy red hair, of slim build and about 5 ft. 6 in. tall, but if that person had turned up in court a year later with his hair cut and washed and wearing different clothes, I might not have recognised him if he had not been standing in the dock. It is nonsense to expect a child—possibly a young child—to have clear recall many months after an event.

I turn now to the claim that children never tell lies. They are not capable of telling lies involving events that are outside their experience. A child cannot invent something which he or she has never encountered, because a child could not recognise such things. Children do not invent things that they could have learnt about only from pornographic magazines, for example, if they have never set eyes on them. That means that children are likely to be telling the truth. In the Cleveland controversy, in their anxiety to protect persons from unjust accusations, some people were far too prone to go around saying that children generally tell lies about such events. For the reasons that I have explained, I do not believe that.

Although I accept that, in justice to the accused person, the questioning must be partly adversarial, it should be carried out in such a way as to ensure that it is a seeking out of the truth. The adversarial aspect of a normal trial might rattle and unsettle a child and cause him to keep silent. That is to be deplored and it must be avoided.

Not enough account has been taken of the fact that it is not only the court that might intimidate a child. A child witness in a high court or a sheriff court might have to travel a long way to take part in a trial and might have to stay overnight in an unfamiliar setting. He might have to have breakfast in an hotel dining room and sleep in a strange bed—all that can be unsettling, as any parent will know. Since little can be done about these unsettling events, it is all the more important to try to create as much of an atmosphere of confidence as possible for the child.

I was interested to receive in my mail this week—most hon. Members must have received it too—a newsletter from the Scottish Child Law Centre. It contains an inquiry page on which a social worker dealing with a number of abused children who would be appearing in court to testify had asked the writers of the publication what could be done to ease the position of such children. We have already heard about a memorandum that came out in the summer describing some improvements which have already been made, such as people no longer wearing wigs and gowns, but I think that the advice given to the social worker shows that there is a long way to go yet. It was that "preparation can sometimes be difficult because of lack of consistency in approaches by judges to the protection of child witnesses".

Such inconsistences must be reduced as much as humanly possible. It should not be left to a judge to decide how he or she should approach the protection of child witnesses. I hope for some code of practice on such matters.

The same publication goes on to refer to a Crown office leaflet entitled "Going to Court", which can be helpful, and to a leaflet which is apparently used for children in English courts, entitled "Susie and the Wise Hedgehog go to Court". It seems that that could be used to some extent in Scotland, and such publications should be used for the benefit of young children. In rarefied debates such as this, we often forget about the language in which young children think.

All these aspects must be examined much more thoroughly than is possible in these circumstances. The fact that so many judges are elderly and upper class shows the chasm between them and children who may speak broadest Glaswegian. They may not be able to communicate with each other at all.

I agree with other hon. Members that these measures must be carefully monitored. I hope that, next time we discuss Scottish law reform, we shall draw up a comprehensive programme on how to deal with children in Scottish courts and make it an important part of future Scottish legal legislation, instead of treating the subject at the tail end of a Bill as if children hardly mattered.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This has been an important debate in which the need increased protection of children has been accepted.

The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) asked whether television links were novel. They are not; they are already used in England and Wales, and we shall monitor them carefully.

All courts will be directed in matters concerning fairness to the accused and the interests of justice in all criminal proceedings, so these aspects do not need to be expressly provided for.

I agree about the importance of identification, which the hon. and learned Gentleman and the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) mentioned. At pre-trial identification, the accused will have the right to be represented, but if his representative wishes to challenge the identification at the trial he is free to do so, and if necessary to examine the child on the identification procedures.

Informal identification is admissible, and the court can take that evidence into consideration, but it is not required to believe it or to decide the case in accordance with it. The court must weigh the evidence.

I have not seen the television rules in operation in England, but my Scottish Office officials certainly have. We shall draw on their assessment and make certain that the procedures and equipment operate effectively in Scotland. The Guildford courts use voice-activated television rather than fixed television, and that confirms the need for careful monitoring.

I was asked whether the procedures would be applied to proof before a children's hearing. The answer is, not at this stage. We have decided that it is appropriate in the first instance to introduce the live television link procedure for child witnesses in criminal trials, but we shall have to monitor that closely, too.

There are views that screens do not operate effectively to reduce a child's anxiety, so the Government want to proceed initially relying on the Lord Justice General's memorandum and advice to judges, and also on live video links. Screens can be used at present with the consent of the accused and the defence.

Evidence on commission is a judicial deposition. There may be difficulties in taking the child's evidence in parts. We think it better in the meantime to take all the evidence at the trial, if necessary using television links.

Subject to consultation with the judiciary, the starting date in Edinburgh and Glasgow will be 1991; and thereafter, following monitoring, throughout Scotland.

The hon. Member for Garscadden asked about regulation. It can be done by Act of Adjournal as appropriate.

[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton]

I was asked whether counsel would be in a court room or in a side room with a child. Counsel would remain in the court room. The television link would provide the link between the court room and the adjacent room where the child was.

I was asked about the Home Office circular which follows an English appeal about the use of screens in English courts. In Scotland, screens have been used successfully with the consent of the accused.

New clause 24 provides for the court to determine whether these circumstances are appropriate to the use of these special procedures. Before the court reaches a decision, it will have to consider an application from one of the parties, and it will be open to the other party to seek to oppose the application if he or she so wishes. If the application is granted and one of the parties subsequently considers that the trial was not fair, it would be open to that party to lodge an appeal.

This is a major step, and I think that we are right to take it, but we are also correct to proceed cautiously, because we must consider not only the protection of the child but also fairness to the accused.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 25

TRANSFER OF CASES IN WHICH CHILD'S EVIDENCE IS TO BE GIVEN THROUGH TELEVISION LINK

'.—(1) Where a sheriff to whom an application has been made under section (Evidence of children through television link in criminal proceedings) of this Act would have granted the application but for the lack of accommodation or equipment necessary to achieve the purpose of the application, he may by order transfer the case to any sheriff court which has such accommodation and equipment available, being a sheriff court in the same sheriffdom.

(2) The sheriff court to which a case is transferred under this section shall be deemed to have granted an application under that section in relation to the case.'.—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 26

IDENTIFICATION OF ACCUSED BY CHILD

'. Where a court has, or is deemed to have, granted an application made under section (Evidence of children through television link in criminal proceedings) of this Act in relation to a child cited to give evidence in a trial, and the child gives evidence that he recalls having identified, prior to the trial, a person alleged to have committed an offence, the evidence of a third party as to the identification of that person by the child prior to the trial shall be admissible as evidence as to such identification.'.—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 27

INTERPRETATION OF SECTIONS (EVIDENCE OF CHILDREN THROUGH TELEVISION LINK IN CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS), (TRANSFER OF CASES IN WHICH CHILD'S EVIDENCE IS TO BE GIVEN THROUGH TELEVISION LINK) AND (IDENTIFICATION OF ACCUSED BY A CHILD)

'. In sections (Evidence of children through television link in criminal proceedings), (Transfer of cases in which child's evidence is to be given through television link) and (Identification of accused by a child) of this Act, unless the contrary intention appears—

'child' means a person under the age of 16 years;

'court' means the High Court of Justiciary or the sheriff court; and

'trial' means a trial under solemn or under summary procedure.'—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 28

CRIMINAL JURISDICTION OF SHERIFF COURT

'. The following subsection shall be inserted at the end of each of sections 3 and 288 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975 to form subsection (4) and subsection (5) respectively of these sections—

'( ) Where an offence is alleged to have been committed in one district in a sheriffdom, it shall be competent to try that offence in a sheriff court in any other district in that sheriffdom.'—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 29

EXECUTION OF DOCUMENTS BY COMPANIES

'.—(1) For section 36B of the Companies Act 1985 (execution of documents: Scotland) there shall be substituted the following section—

"Execution of documents: Scotland.

36B.—(1) This section has effect in relation to the execution of any document by a company under the law of Scotland on or after 31 July 1990.

(2) For any purpose other than those mentioned in subsection (3) below, a document is validly executed by a company if it is signed on behalf of the company by a director or the secretary of the company or by a person authorised to sign the document on its behalf.

(3) For the purposes of any enactment or rule of law relating to the authentication of documents under the law of Scotland, a document is validly executed by a company if it is subscribed on behalf of the company by—

(a) two of the directors of the company;

(b) a director and the secretary of the company; or

(c) two persons authorised to subscribe the document on behalf of the company, notwithstanding that such subscription is not attested by witnesses and the document is not sealed with the company's common seal.

(4) A document which bears to be executed by a company in accordance with subsection (3) above is, in relation to such execution, a probative document.

(5) Notwithstanding the provisions of any enactment (including an enactment contained in this section) a company need not have a common seal.

(6) For the purposes of any enactment providing for a document to be executed by a company by affixing its common seal or referring (in whatever terms) to a document so executed, a document signed or subscribed on behalf of the company by—

(a) two directors of the company;

(b) a director and the secretary of the company; or

(c) two persons authorised to sign or subscribe the document on behalf of the company, shall have effect as if executed under the common seal of the company.

(7) In this section "enactment" includes an enactment contained in a statutory instrument.

(8) Subsections (2) and (3) above are—

(a) without prejudice to any other method of execution of documents by companies permitted by any enactment or rule of law; and

(b) subject to any other enactment making express provision, in relation to companies, as to the execution of a particular type of document."

(2) Where, on or after 31 July 1990 and prior to the coming into force of this section, a document was signed or subscribed, in accordance with section 36B(2) of the Companies Act 1985 (as inserted by section 130(3) of the Companies Act 1989), by—

(a) a company; or

(b) a body corporate to which section 36B of the 1985 Act (as so inserted) applied by, under or by virtue of any enactment, that document shall be deemed to have been validly executed by the company or body corporate in accordance with subsection (2) of section 36B of the 1985 Act as substituted by subsection (1) above.

(3) Where, on or after 31 July 1990 and prior to the coming into force of this section, the presumption in section 36B(3) of the Companies Act 1985 (as inserted by section 130(3) of the Companies Act 1989) applied in relation to a document, that document shall be deemed to have been validly executed in accordance with subsection (3) of section 36B of the 1985 Act as substituted by subsection (1) above, and subsection (4) of that section as so substituted shall apply to the document as if it bore to be so executed.

(4) For the avoidance of doubt, in determining, for the purposes of subsection (3) above, whether the presumption in section 36B(3) of the Companies Act 1985 (as inserted by section 130(3) of the Companies Act 1989) applied in relation to a document, the reference in section 36B(2)(b) of the 1985 Act (as so inserted) to the last page shall be construed as a reference to the last page of the document excluding any inventory, appendix, schedule, plan or other document annexed to the document.

(5) Any reference to section 36B of the Companies Act 1985 (however expressed) in any enactment (including an enactment contained in a statutory instrument) shall be construed as a reference to section 36B of that Act as substituted by subsection (1) above.'—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 129 to 135.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The clause has the full support of the Law Society of Scotland. It deals with a complex legal point. It has unanimous support, and it is important for lawyers' practising in commercial law in Scotland.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We now come to new clause 5. I call Dr. Norman Godman.

Dr. Godman: With a heavy heart, not moved.

New Clause 9

PROCEDURE AT TRIAL OF PERSONS SUFFERING FROM MENTAL DISORDER

'(1) Sections 174 (Insanity in bar of trial or as the ground of acquittal) and 376 (Power of court to order hospital admission or guardianship) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975 shall be amended as follows—

(2) After subsection (3) of section 174 there shall be inserted the following subsection:—

"(3A) An Order made by a Court in pursuance of the last foregoing subsection, concerning the detention of a person in a State hospital or such other hospital specified, shall cease to have effect if the person the Order refers to is reprosecuted and the case disposed of by a Court."

(3) After subsection (1) of section 376 there shall be inserted the following subsection:—

"(1A) An Order made by a Court in pursuance of the last foregoing subsection, concerning the detention of a person in a hospital or the placing of a person under the guardianship of a specified local authority or person, shall cease to have effect if the person the Order refers to is reprosecuted and the case disposed of by a Court.".'.—[Mr. Menzies Campbell.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

6 pm

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I shall try to adopt the spirit of the proceedings. The clause is important but I shall try to deal with it briefly. It seeks to address an issue that has been brought to my attention by Dr. Derek Chiswick, an eminent consultant forensic psychiatrist at the Royal Edinburgh hospital. It seeks to deal with the circumstances that may arise if an accused person is found insane in bar of trial under solemn procedure and is thereafter automatically committed to the state hospital at Carstairs without limit of time by virtue of the provisions of section 174 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975. When such a person subsequently becomes sane and fit to plead, he may be brought back to be reprosecuted. However, there is now an automatic procedure whereby the original hospital restriction orders are terminated after reprosecution. Thus it may be the case that accused persons acquitted after reprosecution could, theoretically at least, find themselves still liable to be detained without limit of time in the state hospital at Carstairs.

Along with two other eminent colleagues, Dr. Chiswick has written a helpful article on this matter in the Psychiatric Bulletin 1990, volume 14, pages 208-10. That article sets out precisely the kind of circumstances to which I have referred and draws attention to two cases, one arising from proceedings in December 1986 at the High Court in Edinburgh and the second in January 1985 at the Dunoon sheriff court. In each of those cases there was reprosecution. In the first case the accused was acquitted by reason of the judge determining that there was insufficient evidence against her to allow the case to continue and the prosecution to proceed. The second case was slightly different, but in both cases it was necessary for the Secretary of State to authorise an absolute discharge some time after the second set of proceedings had been concluded. I understand that in England and Wales there is a power, similar to the one sought by the new clause, in the Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964.

[Mr. Menzies Campbell]

As the Minister will readily appreciate, the new clause applies not only to solemn proceedings but to summary proceedings. That is precisely the kind of issue which a Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill should address, and it should find favour with the Minister because it involves what I suppose one might describe as a tidying up of the legislative situation in Scotland. Such a situation has not arisen in England because of relevant statutory provisions. I urge the Minister to give the new clause a favourable reception. It can hardly be regarded as contentious and would remove a statutory anomaly which the two cases referred to by Dr. Chiswick and his colleagues plainly demonstrate is urgently required.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. and learned Gentleman has raised an extremely interesting matter. I have considerable sympathy with what he is trying to achieve and there is some force in the new clause. I shall look carefully at the matter with a view to dealing with it comprehensively at an appropriate time in the future. I am grateful to the hon. and learned Gentleman for raising the matter.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: If the Minister would give a little more urgency to "an appropriate time in the future"

I should be satisfied, because cases clearly have arisen and may be likely to arise at any time. The longer the delay, the more likely is the continuation of this statutory anomaly. If the Minister will inject a note of urgency into his undertaking, I shall not find it necessary to press the matter.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: We shall do our best in the light of what is possible.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I do not wish to be seen as unreceptive to the Minister's generosity but he could do a little better than that. He is like the drowning man, and I offer him a third and last opportunity to say that the matter will be treated urgently.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I cannot commit the Government to immediate legislation. I do not know exactly what will be in the Queen's Speech, although its terms will soon be revealed. Obviously, we shall do our best.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I accept that. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 19

SETTING ASIDE OF CONVICTIONS

'In section 453 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975 (consent of prosecutor to set aside the conviction) the words in subsection (3) "not exceeding £40·00" shall be deleted and the words ", the amount of which to be decided at the discretion of the Court," added.'.—[Sir David Steel.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Sir David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I express my gratitude to Mr. Speaker for selecting this new clause. It was not in the provisional selection list yesterday, but Mr. Speaker paid some heed to my representation which was, in short, that one of the purposes of our being here at all is to seek the redress of grievances. The new clause seeks such a redress which cannot be achieved for one of my constituents, whose case I shall shortly outline. However, it will be of benefit to others who find themselves in a similar position.

Time is short and I shall not go into the details of the case. Suffice it to say that in 1987 a constituent living in Melrose was convicted in the Clydesdale district court in Lanark on a charge of speeding. Some two years later it came to light that the conviction was an error and should not stand. He then received a letter from the procurator fiscal in Lanark setting out the procedure to be adopted in order to appeal by way of bill of suspension. It was explained to him that the procedure is laid down in section 453 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975. That is the section which I seek to amend. This is the only procedure that Parliament has provided for such cases where a conviction is in error and the Crown, like everyone else, must follow it.

The procedure is relatively straightforward. In particular, the parties do not require to be heard in a court at all and the matter can be dealt with expeditiously by a judge sitting in chambers. Section 453(3) of the Act allows expenses not exceeding £40 to be awarded to the appellant and paid by the Crown. My constituent pursued this procedure and his solicitor's fees were a not unreasonable £170. He was therefore out of pocket in achieving the lawful redress of his grievance which Parliament has allowed. I took the matter up with the Lord Advocate and had a helpful reply from the Solicitor-General. It states:

"I recognise that in fact your constituent was left out of pocket. I have noted this point and can reassure you that any future review of procedure will consider whether this particular aspect can be further simplified in some way."

I received that letter during the summer recess. It seems wrong to allow a miscellaneous provisions Bill of this kind to go through the House without taking the opportunity to put this matter right since it is acknowledged by the Crown Office that an amendment should be made.

The 1975 Act allowed for expenses of £20 and by statutory instrument in 1984 that was raised to £40. I am assured by those who know about these things that inflation alone means that in real terms £40 in 1984 should now be £150. My basic point is why we have a fixed sum in the principal Act at all. My proposal is that the expenses awarded to an aggrieved person should be at the discretion of the court. I do not think that that discretion would be used irresponsibly. The new clause is a sensible amendment to the criminal law of Scotland and the House should seize the opportunity to adopt it.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel) described the position accurately. I was interested to hear the details of his constituent's difficulties. The amount of compensation—£40—was set by statutory instrument in 1984, and the time may have come to review that figure. When it was set, it represented an appropriate limit on expenses. In the light of the circumstances mentioned, I propose to consider—in consultation with interested parties and taking account of the terms of the 1975 Act, which enables the Secretary of State to substitute a new sum, having regard to the changes in the value of money —what adjustment is necessary by means of a further statutory instrument.

The right hon. Gentleman wanted me to go a little further and consider whether this matter could be dealt with more thoroughly by further legislation. I will consider that matter in the future, but the immediate option is a statutory instrument, and that can be proceeded with relatively quickly.

Sir David Steel: I shall press the Minister on two points. First, this is not compensation—the hon. Gentleman may have made a slip of the tongue—because we are talking about the expenses incurred by an aggrieved individual in seeking redress of a grievance. My contention is that, within reason, these expenses should be met. It is far better for a court to judge that matter than for the House to judge it in abstract.

Secondly, if I simply accept the Minister's assurance on a statutory instrument, I shall not have done my duty. We all know the pressure on both the Scottish Office and the time of the House. How do we know when a statutory instrument will be introduced? The erosion of money values since 1984, when the matter was last examined, is serious. Would it not be more simple to accept the principle that the court should determine the right limit on expenses, rather than establishing a sum that has to be constantly updated by statutory instrument? I hope that the Minister will give me a rather more cheerful reply.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I hope that we can introduce a statutory instrument before too long. There should be no problem.

On the second point, before we introduce any legislation, it will be necessary to consult the interested parties.

The right hon. Gentleman has raised relevant points and we shall consider them carefully.

Sir David Steel: Is the Minister saying that a statutory instrument will be introduced fairly quickly?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Yes.

Sir David Steel: On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 59

BLOOD AND OTHER SAMPLES IN CIVIL PROCEEDINGS

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 102, in page 63, line 7, leave out 'direct' and insert 'request'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 103 to 107.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: These are technical amendments on DNA, and I commend them to the House.

Mr. Dewar: I accept that these are technical amendments, but they relate to an important clause, which introduces into civil actions in Scotland a new power, which will probably be brought into play most commonly in paternity cases. The DNA test, or genetic fingerprinting, allows deciding the truth of the matter to be put beyond any significant chance of error. I was pleased when the new clause that I moved in Committee on this subject was accepted by the Government. I hope that it will end the bitterness and humiliation that is all too often built into paternity cases. I have been involved in such cases—in a professional sense—and they are not a pleasant experience.

The Committee and the House spent some time on the protection of children giving evidence in court, and spoke of the stress put on them. There is a strong case for introducing the change set out in this clause as it protects those who might otherwise become entrenched combatants in paternity cases. I am delighted that this will reach the statute book, and it is a worthwhile part of the Bill.

Will the Minister say something about commencement? I know that there is a citation and commencement clause in the Bill—clause 62—under which certain parts of the Bill come into force within two months, beginning with the date on which the Act is passed. Clause 59 is not one of them, which means, as I understand clause 62(2), that it will be brought into force.

"on such day as the Secretary of State may appoint by order made by statutory instrument".

This is not just idle curiosity. I have had inquiries, in particular from solicitors who have an active interest in this machinery, about when the commencement order will be laid. It would be useful if the Minister could help me on that point.

6.15 pm

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It will come into force two months after Royal Assent. I understand that this is covered in the clause.

Mr. Dewar: Can I press the Minister on that point? I may be becoming obtuse and goitered in my old age——

Mr. Menzies Campbell: That is not true.

Mr. Dewar: Thank you for that loyal all-party vote of confidence from behind me.

Clause 62 refers to the provisions of part III, which is the licensing part, and says that it and

> "section 55 of this Act and so much of section 61 as relates to those provisions; and
> (b) section 56 of this Act and paragraphs 21 and 32 of Schedule 7 to this Act, shall come into force at the end of the period of two months beginning with the day on which this Act is passed."

Therefore, clause 59 is not included, so it must be covered by clause 62(2), which provides that it will commence when an order is laid before the House. If the Minister is saying that he intends to lay an order so that the clause will be brought into effect two months after the passing of the Act, I am happy with that, but that seems an unlikely promise, so I should like him to confirm it.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I can confirm that that is the intention. I believe that we can proceed along those lines under the terms of the Bill. There should be no problem and the provisions will commence two months after the passing of the Act.

Mr. Dewar: I am obliged.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 103, in page 63, line 13, leave out 'direction' and insert 'request'.

No. 104, in page 63, line 14, leave out 'given' and insert 'made'.

No. 105, in page 63, line 16, leave out 'directed' and insert 'requested'.

No. 106, in page 63, leave out lines 22 to 28 and insert—

[Mr. Dewar]

'(3) In section 6 of the Law Reform (Parent and Child) (Scotland) Act 1986 (determination of parentage by blood sample)—

(a) in subsection (1), for the words "blood sample" there shall be substituted "sample of blood or other body fluid or of body tissue"; and

(b) in each of subsections (2), (3) and (4), for the words "a blood" there shall be substituted "such a".'

No. 107, in page 63, line 31, leave out 'Act' and insert 'section'.—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Clause 62

Citation, commencement and extent

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 58, in page 64, line 12, leave out 'subsection (3)' and insert 'subsections (3) and (3A)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 59.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: These amendments put the law back to what everyone thought that it was. I commend them to the House.

Mr. Dewar: We have made such good progress so suddenly and unexpectedly that I can allow myself the luxury of asking a question. As I understand the situation, the means test courts have been operating in a way that is not justified by the law of Scotland, so that these amendments give them the powers that they always thought that they had to act in the way that they have always acted. If that is the position, I am curious about what happens if someone challenges the competence of what the courts have been doing. Will it be necessary to allow for compensation, or to make provision to undo the damage that has been done if, for example, someone has gone to prison as a result of this misunderstanding of the law? I am in favour of things being put right, but will the Minister say a word or two about the consequences for those who were dealt with under a misapprehension?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I do not think that there will be a problem. The amendments clarify the position. They implement the provisions to empower the means inquiry courts to allow a fine defaulter more time to pay his or her fine and at the same time to impose a period of imprisonment in the event of future default. As hon. Members know, a recent High Court ruling cast doubt on this practice and the necessary clarification was agreed unanimously in Committee. It is right, as the courts in Scotland are conducting means inquiries daily, that the legal position should be clarified as soon as possible.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: Has anybody been sent to prison as a result of non-payment of fines on a misunderstanding of the legal powers of the sheriff?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I will have to check on that, but not to my knowledge. The point is that doubt was cast on the process by a High Court ruling, so that it was necessary to clarify the matter to make certain that that would not happen.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 108, in page 64, line 19, leave out 'section 56' and insert 'sections 56, 59 and (Effect of mental incapacity on powers of attorney etc.)'.

No. 59, in page 64, line 22 at end insert—

'(3A) Paragraph 27(4) of Schedule 7 to this Act shall come into force on the day on which this Act is passed.'

No. 129, in page 64, line 23, leave out 'subsection (5)' and insert 'subsections (4A) and (5)'.

No. 130, in page 64, line 23, at end insert—

'(4A) Section (Execution of documents by companies) of this Act, paragraph 31A of Schedule 7 to this Act and Schedule 8 to this Act so far as relating to the Companies Act 1985 and the Companies Act 1989 extend also to England and Wales.'—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Schedule 1

Scottish Conveyancing and Executry Services Board

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 60, in page 65, leave out from 'securing' in line 17 to end of line 23 and insert—

'(a) that members of the Board have expertise or knowledge of—

(i) the provision of conveyancing and executry services;

(ii) the financial arrangements connected with the purchase and sale of heritable property;

(iii) consumer affairs; and

(iv) commercial affairs; and
